The majority of the photographs depict crowds of fashionable people lining a river bank. There are enough clues to identify that they show spectators at the University Bumping Races at Fen Ditton and one even contains an advertisements for a special newspaper supplement that will feature pictures of May Week. Some show people on the Pitt Club lawn, others in front of the tea rooms, or The Lawns, a large house that is up for sale on one picture. Behind the crowds are the cars parked on the grass, and in the distance several larger vehicles with their chauffeurs. There is even a horse-drawn carriage. On one is the ferry that would convey people across the river, alongside the bank in another is a punt with a gramophone and there is a boat with an outdoor motor. But most of all there are face after face in all their finery. Catherine would love to put names to them all, but the pictures were probably taken in the 1930s and that is impossible. [SCAN OF CROWDS]

Amongst the other negatives were pictures including a Pye rowing group with their flag bearing the 'Rising Sun' logo & dinners of what seems to be the Ceylon Society. There is also one of the Quinquaginta Babes dance band. Presumably this is related to the Quinquaginta Ramblers dance band, formed in 1926 by two Cambridge undergraduates and enlarged by Fred Elizalde who went on to lead his own band at the Savoy Hotel. The Cambridge band made various gramophone recordings and even took part in a broadcast from the B.B.C. Studios at Savoy Hill. One of its members was Jack, later Lord, Donaldson one-time Minister for the Arts who in those days played bass saxophone and clarinet. [SCAN OF PYE ROWERS & BAND]

And there are wedding scenes; one shows a group outside what is thought to be Meadowcroft on Chesterton Road and there is what seems to be a very posh wedding of a Naval man – but who are they? If you can identify faces please let me know and I will pass the information on to Catherine. [SCAN OF WEDDINGS]

As for the photographer who recorded the scene. The most likely candidate was the firm of Kidd and Baker who had premises in St Mary's Passage from about 1905 to 1939 when they were forced to close due to lack of materials during the war. The firm comprised James Henry Kidd who died in August 1941. He had previously worked for Messrs Faulkner-White & Scott & Wilkinson photographers in Cambridge before opening a studio in Great St Mary's Passage where he was joined by a Miss Baker who'd also worked for Scott & Wilkinson. Do any of these names ring a bell, can anyone explain why some of their negatives might have ended up in Surrey – and where are the rest of their pictures?

Identifying the who, what and where of photographs is always difficult but Cottenham is fortunate in that it has two experts, Francis Garrett and Mervyn Haird who have for decades been building up a photographic record of their community, drawing on old negatives taken by Fred Smith and a wealth of other snaps by many local amateur photographers. Time after time they have packed village halls as people flocked to their slide shows, and at each show they have learned a little more about the pictures. The problem was that they were so busy collecting, sorting and refiling their slides that they never had the time to write down all that they knew about them. So Liz Milway took a tape recording of one of their performances and then typed each word out. She passed the script to the historical duo who were then stimulated to add even more details to produce a new book of over 150 pages. On Saturday half of the village seemed to be queuing at the Cottenham Village Society's stall at the Charity Gala for their own autographed copy and most of the 2,500 print run must surely have been sold. It contains fascinating stories of the 'Cottenham Gulpers' – such was the village's reputation for drinking when they had 34 public houses for a population of just 2,414. But it was not just beer they consumed. Mr & Mrs Thoday made a fruit drink called 'Penny Monster' which they sold from their shop in High Street until one day in June 1931 when a fire started in the roof. The call went out for the village fire engine, but it had been so long since it had been needed that the grass had grown so long in front of the engine house doors that they could not get the fire engine out. So they went for the hoses stored at David Ingle's workshop opposite the Jolly Millers public house and loaded them into a wheelbarrow. Despite the urgency one of the men pushing it stopped to light his pipe three or four times on his way to the fire. The Chivers fire engine, called out from Histon, did eventually arrive, but the Cottenham one never did! "Cottenham in Focus" is available in the village or by post from Cottenham Village Society c/o Liz Milway, 90 Rooks Street, Cottenham CB4 8RB. It costs £7.50 plus £2.50 postage. Family photographs are a great way to get into history; often you can seek physical similarities over the generations – same eye colour, shape of ear etc, or you can get some idea of their age and then track them down through parish registers, or census returns. You might then trawl through the photographs in the Cambridgeshire Collection to try and find a picture of the house they were living in, or identify the job they did and then dig up a picture of that. Many hundreds of people do just this – but it is not an exercise just for the elderly. Now the Cambridge University Heraldic and Genealogical Society – which sounds much less daunting as CUHAGS – has launched the Eve Logan Prize for an essay or video produced by a pupil at school which examines these or other aspects of their family heritage. It is a prestigious prize that could contribute to the Duke of Edinburgh's Award scheme and will bring complimentary membership of the Society amongst other benefits. There will be support and advice from members of the Society, giving students an excellent opportunity to work alongside some of the country's top experts in the field. The first step is to apply for an application form which is obtainable from Dr G. Wright of Clare College, Cambridge CB2 1TL or by e-mailing president@one-name.org. Closing dates for entries is 20th September which may supply just the stimulus needed to get to grips with a summer-time project that could enhance your future academic career.

Dr Harry Porter from Cambridge has dropped me a card to say that the author of the book on Night-climbing who disguised himself under the name 'Whipplesnaith, was a King's college graduate, Noel Sympington. He became a farmer in Leicestershire. Henry Button, of Christ's College, recalls another climbing incident, this one in May 1932 when two parties of students, most of whom were skilled mountaineers, climbed to the pinnacles of King's College chapel to fix open umbrellas to the tops. They found it a hazardous operation as the stonework crumbled under their hands and a fragment of masonry crashed down whilst the Dean was walking across the court below. Henry has sent a fragment from the student newspaper, Varsity that reported the incident on 14th May 1932. But like all such cuttings it poses another mystery. If the grads got the umbrellas up there, how did they get the brollys down. The clue lies in a headline, "Umbrella shot down by don's son; Tenth bullet scores direct hit" - but the rest of the article is missing. Can anybody help? [SCAN OF VARSITY ARTICLE]

Mrs K. Mansfield of Green End Road, Cambridge has responded to my mention of church organ-blowers; she says her husband first pumped the organ at Arbury Road Baptist Church at the age of 11 and was paid 15/- (75p) a quarter for his efforts. After a while he moved from behind the organ to the front and played for his first service at the age of 12. Apart from National Service and a spell at three different Anglican churches is is still playing at Arbury, some 45 years later. Can anybody match his long-service?

Memories, 31st July 2002, by Mike Petty

One of Cambridge's great old companies has come under the spotlight in a new book on C.O. Stanley. The name will be immediately familiar to hundreds of Cambridge folk as the man who bought a small radio manufacturing business from the Cambridge scientific instrument maker, W.G. Pye, and transformed it into one of the world's leading electronics firms. They diversified from radios designed to bring entertainment to peoples' homes to radios needed for a world at war and then developed the country's first transistor radios. They pioneered work on radar and mobile telephones, becoming the world's leading exporter of radio-telephones in the mid 1960s. They brought out gramophone records – and much more.

Many of their greatest developments were in the field of television. While some lucky people were watching the Queen's Coronation on small-screen back and white sets Pye was broadcasting the only colour television pictures from two cameras overlooking the route. Few saw the pictures that were only beamed to the Great Ormond Street Hospital for Sick Children, to the Daily Express offices in Fleet Street and to a private flat in Park Lane where C.O. and a few of his friends had gathered to watch. One who will not forget that day was Bill Wakefield, who now lives in Stretham. He was then a young engineer selected to look after the screen in the Park Lane flat. Like others he was delighted at the success of the experiment, but did not celebrate the occasion quite as much as his boss. Though he went on to pioneer many developments for the firm Bill will forever be recorded in its history for his achievements that day. But the official account of how he guided an 'overexcited' Stanley to the bathroom, put him to bed and brought him a cup of tea lacks something of Bill's own graphic version of events.

Pye became involved in every aspect of television: the provision of cameras, the equipment used in the studio, the transmitters needed to broadcast and the sets themselves on which people watched. They were even involved in making programmes for C.O. was a leading figure in the battle for the Independent Television that increased the demand for cameras, transmitters and sets.

By 1966 C.O. Stanley had built Pye into an international enterprise employing 30,000 people in Britain and abroad. And then it collapsed.

The account of the dramatic reversal of fortune is explored in detail by Mark Frankland in "Radio Man: the remarkable rise and fall of C.O. Stanley", published by the Institution of Electrical Engineers at £25.

The author has interviewed many local people in his researches and News readers played their part in the story. Several months ago Nicholas Stanley appealed in "Memories" for any accounts of outworkers during the war. As German bombers flew over Cambridge the Government was urging factories engaged on vital war work to move some of their production elsewhere. In Pye's case they suggested Swansea as a good site. But C.O. Stanley was adamant that he had no wish to be lumbered with a split workforce should the war be won. So he claimed that Cambridgeshire people would be reluctant to move and came up with the idea of establishing small groups of workers in villages. Some of the workers came from boys at the Cambridge College of Arts and Technology who had their own benches and tools but most of the new workforce were women who turned village halls and their own kitchens into workshops. The scheme proved such a success that the Ministry of Production sent a team to study the experiment and adopted it in other parts of the country. When a Trade Union official accused him of asking too much from his workforce his workforce sprang to C.O.'s defence. But there was one subversive element. When a pile of Communist Party leaflets attacking the war was discovered in the Cambridge plant Stanley was incensed and broadcast an announcement over the factory loudspeakers challenging whoever had brought them to a fight in the canteen. No one turned up. Perhaps they will now come forward and enable another detail to be added to a most readable account of a Cambridge enterprise. Ernest Harvey of Waterbeach has been quick to e-mail to say that he recognises some of the faces in the photograph of Pye rowers featured in last week's Memories. He identifies Bob the custodian in his trilby hat, Ken Walker, Nat Bell, Bert Whiffen, Archie Carder, Gill Anderson and L.W. Jones. He thinks the picture would have been late 1920s.

[IF YOU NEED TO CUT PLEASE HOLD THIS STORY OVER]

Andy Hall from Huntingdon has sent me an early photograph of a mother and baby, a label on the back says that was taken by a photographer named J.H. Priest from Bridge Street, Cambridge. He asks for further information.

Joseph Henry Priest is listed in directories from the 1900s up to the 1920s as the University Stationery stores and picture dealer with premises in Bridge street and Ram Yard. The Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library has a collection of his original negatives which include a series of street scenes of Fen Drayton and Fenstanton. He had an eye for the news photograph too. A view of the Leather Gaiters public house at Hauxton after the fire of 23rd October 1909 comes with Priest's caption giving researchers all the necessary details to enable the event to be read up in the columns of the local newspapers. He did not restrict himself to Cambridgeshire and some depict seaside scenes at Gt Yarmouth whilst a dramatic set of negatives show the effect of what seems to be some type of depth-charge explosion with a sailing boat passing serenely by.

The Cambridge Mammoth Show was the highlight of the August Bank Holiday when areas of Jesus Green were fenced off to provide a showground for a vast array of activities. Joseph Priest found it a rich source of photographs with pictures of the obstacle race with men running with a bucket over their heads or Master M. Townsend winning the final of the 100 yards boys race when just 2 years 10 months old. But it was the cycle races that attracted the crowds, especially when Cambridge had champions like Arthur Markham who held the world endurance tricycle record in 1907 for riding 307 miles in 24 hour. Other sports which caught Priest's eye included football, rugby, cricket, rowing and skating with S. Greenhall pictured wearing the National Skating Association champion scarf. Cambridge had a veteran running champion in Charles Rowell of Chesterton who won the Long distance world championship belt in the USA in 1879 but who nearly 30 years later took part in a professional marathon.

Out of training he dropped out but the strain contributed to his death in 1909. It was that year that Priest photographed military manoeuvres by the University Officer Training Corps whilst a most interesting a series showing a march past along Petty Cury about 1910 apparently showing the OTC in mess uniform. There is also a snap of a funeral procession along St John's Street, but whose? [SCAN OF PRIEST VIEW OF FUNERAL, ST JOHN'S STREET]

Memories 7th August 2002, by Mike Petty

It is that time of year when many people finish their schooldays; some move on to other schools, some to colleges or universities, others on to retirement. All will have memories that they will carry with them and next term their places will be taken by others

But for Sedley Infants School in Malta Road, Cambridge, there will be no next term. The school has closed after 70 years; next term pupils will start at the new Ridgefield school. But it has not bowed out quietly and has produced a book of reminiscences by former and present pupils.

Many things will bring back memories to schoolchildren everywhere. Take school milk which cost a halfpenny for a third of a pint when introduced in the 1930s. Those families who couldn't afford the milk were given it free - by 1936, this was a quarter of the children, an indication of the hardship in this area of Cambridge. When war broke out milk was subsidised to the extent that all children were given it free, alongside Cod Liver Oil and Mal. It was discontinued in the early 1980s. Miss Thynne remembered collecting the five halfpennies from the children for their school milk on Mondays and staff had to make sure the right money was laid out for the milkman each morning.

Not everybody appreciated it as Malcolm Campbell who attended the school between 1958 and 1961 recalls: I was ordered to drink another boy's milk! I had already drunk mine and put the bottle back but many had left theirs half drunk and he grassed me up falsely to the teacher and nobody believed me. I can still see his grinning face as teacher stood over me until every drop of his milk had gone down my throat - I nearly threw it up!

But there were benefits at being at primary school, Malcolm recalls: "I remember getting engaged at Sedley! Linda and I were going to marry each other when we grew up, it was all sorted out. I backed up my proposal by voting Linda for May Queen, sadly it was the only vote that she got. For some reason that I can't remember the girls also had to vote for a boy (perhaps to be the May Queen's suitor or something), Linda voted for me - it was also the only vote that I got. I didn't care, she was still May Queen in my eyes. But true love never runs a smooth course and on 26th July 1961 Linda went to Romsey and I went to St Andrews (now St Albans), I never saw her again."

Different generations have different memories of schooldays: "We learned to write by putting sand on slates and tracing letters out with our finger". "Memories of the dental treatment remain with me vividly to this day. The clinic was opposite Romsey. The lady dentist operated the drill by foot power, so had varying speeds and when it hit the nerve all Hell was let loose. There was a card system if you needed dental treatment. The teacher used to come in with the cards and if your name was on a coloured one you had to have something done, if it was a white one you were OK until the next visit." "I would like to apologise to the little girl whose dolly I stuffed down the girls toilet, that poor girl was so upset - so was I when they sent for my mum to join in the dressing down". "What amazed me most, when I looked around the school recently, was how minute everything seems now and how large it looked when I was so small 44 years ago. The hall where Uncle Dennis and Auntie Jean entertained us with puppets teaching road safety has shrunk with age, the sandpit has been replaced with an adventure playground and the green in the centre, that hosted so many Maypole dances, has been replaced with a Secret Garden"

As for the modern pupils: "I like doing jigsaws in the corridor", "It's a very fun school", "The school is nice because it has toys and my friends play with me on the grass", "I like singing old songs, I like "How much is that doggie in the window?" "It's been here a very long time and I don't have to wear a school uniform"

One thing that all pupils, young and old, recall is the May or Rose Queen festival held at Sedley School from 1934 right through to 2002. All voted for someone who was kind, honest, helpful, hardworking and a good friend. Page after page of the school's history is taken with snaps of young girls each wearing a crown of flowers and a cape. But there is no picture for 1964 for that year the boys rebelled and demanded a May-King, so no ceremony was held. Can anybody add further details to this outbreak of male equality, which lasted only one year - the rebels moved on and the Queen regained her throne in 1965

Sheila Glasswell, a teacher at the school has spent many hours compiling a volume of memories of 70 years of the Sedley school. Her success is summarised by Malcolm Campbell: "I think it is a fantastic job that you are doing in collecting and preserving the history of a lovely old school, thanks to your efforts, even when the building has gone the memories will live on" [SCAN OF GROUP OF MAY QUEENS FROM THE BOOK, SCAN OF CHILDREN IN GARDEN AT THE SCHOOL IN 1930S, OTHER PIX FROM NEWS LIBRARY]

Alan Radford asks for you help in locating any photographs of a business that has traded in the Kite area of Cambridge for nearly 30 years. Jays Records and Tapes started at number 2 Burleigh Street – now demolished, moved to 22 Fitzroy Street – also demolished, after which they moved to 17 and later 50 Burleigh Street. Now it is closing with the retirement of Jed and June Radford. Sadly they have few mementoes of their various premises since their snaps were stolen in a burglary some time ago. If you can help please write to me and I'll pass things on. In the meantime I have found one picture of Fitzroy Street to puzzle you; it was taken in 1974 and shows crowds queuing for bread – do you remember why, or spot anybody you know? Memories 14th August 2002, by Mike Petty Television pictures of a Harrier jet crashing into the sea at Lowestoft the other week have brought back vivid memories for Harry Bye of Littleport.

As a lad at Shippea Hill Harry was plane-crazy so when he learned that there was to be a flying display and parachute drop at Littleport show he felt he had no option but to take half a day off work and bike across the fen to see it. In those days – July 1932 – times were hard and money harder to earn but Harry was thrilled to find two Gipsy Moth biplanes at the show, each giving flying trips. One would take you looping the loop for 10/- (50p), the other flew a circular trip to Chettisham and back to Littleport. This cost 5/- - which was a third of his weekly wage. But he paid up and still remembers folk in Granby Street looking up at him as he flew over.

Afterwards he watched the aerobatics and waited for the highlight of the show, the parachute descent. The weather was blustery – too rough some said – but the 21 year-old parachutist would not let down those who had come to watch him perform. Harry saw him climb in to the plane and off it flew. Soon it was back and the crowds watched as the stunt man prepared for his descent. But sadly he did not descend. His parachute became entangled in the rudder of the plane leaving him swinging in the slipstream – a ghastly sight. The pilot tried looping-the-loop to release the helpless man, but to no avail. He had no option but to attempt a crash-landing in a nearby cornfield. The crowds rushed to the site, ignoring the pleas of the farmer who tried to stop them doing more damage to his crop. But the efforts of the ambulance crew in attendance at the Show were in vain, the parachutist had been killed. The pilot however was alive, though badly injured. The Show ended with the band playing the National Anthem.

Harry has a picture of the crashed plane taken by George Butcher of Main Street. Littleport but needs no help in remembering. He writes: "The unhappy incident happened 70 years ago, but I can still remember seeing the helpless man in white swinging from the tail of that plane. The recovered pilot paid a visit as a guest the following year (minus plane), apologising to Mr Martin for the damage to his cornfield. Only once has an aeroplane been to the Show since, when in 1987 a lone plane gave a flying display. People prefer the Dagenham Girl Pipers, Cilla Black, Willie Carson or other personalities to air showers". [SCAN OF CRASHED PLANE, PIX FROM NEWS FILES OF LITTLEPORT SHOW, INCLUDING PARACHUTE DESCENT]

Harry Dison has also been reliving memories of flying dangers. He was born in Liverpool in 1925 and, aged 16, joined the Merchant Navy taking war supplies to the Eighth Army in Egypt, then crossing the Atlantic and running the gauntlet of U-Boat attacks. As ship after ship was torpedoed he decided that this was no life for him, he was young enough to leave and turned from sea to air. He trained as a Flight Engineer and in August 1944 found himself in a transport vehicle driving along the Ely Road, destination the new RAF station at Waterbeach.

His first operation saw him in a Lancaster bomber in a daylight raid over marshalling yards in northern France. Over the target the aircraft directly behind theirs was hit by a bomb falling from above; it failed to explode but bits and pieces fell from the plane, including the body of the bomb aimer. On his second operation they were attacked by night-fighters and in the vicious corkscrew manoeuvres the pilot tried in order to break away the hatch cover above his head flew off with a bang, sucking up the navigator's black-out curtain. Somehow they returned safely. Harry still wanted to become a pilot, and occasionally was allowed to take over the controls, giving the pilot an opportunity to visit other parts of the plane. He finally achieved his ambition – but not until he was 65!

Many of his companions did not survive to reach that age. Harry has tracked down many of those who served with him in 514 Squadron and recorded their memories of Lancasters at Waterbeach. It is not just a record of names and numbers, this is the personal testimony of those who experienced the terror of war such as anti-aircraft fire “a shell splinter smashed through the front Perspex window and hit Ben, the Flight Engineer, in the back of the head, killing him instantly”. It recalls the agony of having to make decisions: “... the aircraft was doomed and the pilot ordered ‘Bale out, bale out’. I at once prepared to jump, but Roy called on the intercom to say he couldn't get out of his turret. I felt in a dilemma, whether to open the forward escape hatch and get out, thereby clearing the way for three others to follow, or to go back and help Roy. I opened the escape hatch and rolled forward into 22,000 feet of very cold dark sky. Andy McPhee still speaks of his relief at getting down into my compartment and finding it empty with the escape hatch open. The aircraft went out of control soon afterwards and the five other lads just couldn't make their escape”

But danger could come much closer to home as Cedric Thomson recalls: “One evening at dusk the first aircraft at take-off raised it's undercarriage too soon and with full bomb and petrol load skidded along the runway on it's belly, stopping with it's nose hanging at the edge of the Cambridge - Ely road. The bombs on this operation had time fuses which once set could not be defused. All other aircraft took off but were recalled before reaching the coast. We were ordered to reduce landing weight by jettisoning fuel and then to discharge our bombs on a disused bomb practice site. All aircraft eventually landed and taxied to their dispersals. As our dispersal point was close to the main runway where it adjoined the Cambridge road, we were instructed to stand by as the fixed fused bombs were removed from the damaged Lancaster and transferred to our plane. When fully loaded we took off into a lowering cloud base and flew to the Wash where we dumped the bombs with just twenty minutes to spare before some were timed to go off.” But things did not always work out so well; Group Captain Michael Wyatt recalls how just one bomb, falling from a bomb rack, blew up one aircraft and damaged others, killing several of the ground crew.

Once the war was won Waterbeach continued as an operational airfield until August 1963. Even then it had not ceased to resonate with the sound of aero engines and continued to host major air displays organised by the Burma Star Association. Thousands of spectators flocked to witness a variety of aircraft and other attractions, such as motor cycle displays and parachute jumps. But just 25 years ago, in September 1977, the organisers staged their final event, the old soldiers felt they had earned a break, having contributed over £20,000 to ex-service charities. They bowed out with a bang, making record profits, attracting record crowds – and fittingly the star of the show was a Lancaster bomber escorted by a Spitfire and Hurricane.

It is now more than 50 years since 514 squadron was disbanded but thanks to Harry Dison there is now a record of the experiences of some of those who fought and died from this one English field. "Lancasters at Waterbeach" is available at Waterbeach airfield museum or from Harry Dison, Cottage Bungalow, Manley Road, Alvanley, Frodsham, WA6 9DF for £6 plus £1.50 postage [SCAN OF WATERBEACH AIRFIELD ENTRANCE 1962 – SCAN 52.89, PIX OF BURMA STAR DISPLAY INCLUDING AMERICAN FLYING FORTRESS FROM THE FINAL, 1977, SHOW, COVER OF FINAL PROGRAMME]

The little village of West Wratting was also home to a wartime airfield and various army units were based at the Hall or in tents in the meadows, the troops complaining about a plague of earwigs which tormented them at night. Now Suzanne Langford and Elsie Webb have started to compile a photographic record of how things used to be. They are staging a display of their pictures in the Village Hall next Saturday and Sunday afternoons and would be grateful for any assistance in adding to their files, or understanding what they already have. [OLD PHOTO OF VILLAGE FROM NEWS FILES]

But it is unlikely that anyone will be able to add personal memories of the earliest flying from their village. For it was at West Wratting in 1867 that E.P. Frost designed a flying machine with flexible wings that would flap up and down and lift it into the air. By 1877 he had built it and all that was needed was a 25 horse-power engine. But in those days there was only steam available and the power was not there, so the machine was left under the trees in the park. By the time a petrol engine was available, 30 years later, the weather had left it a wreck. [SCAN OF FLYING MACHINE]

But the village has another claim to fame – its windmill. In 1932 Philippa Burrell came upon it by chance having boarded a bus to the highest point in East Anglia - which she decided was West Wratting. Taking lodgings in the village she soon bought the windmill for £600 - including cottage, granary and 20 acres of good farming land. High & isolated she found it a little paradise – and promptly left to study in Paris! She returned to help the Labour candidate in the 1934 Cambridge by-election but when the excitement of the campaign was over, Burrell found herself once more in an undecided state. She visited the Public Library and read the literature shelves from end to end. She wrote plays and tore them up. She learned about planting and pruning – and all the while the windmill was watching her with its broken sails, cap all out, windows rotten and rain going in. It was an unwelcoming part of the property, and one she used to hide in when the bailiffs called.

A millwright gave her an estimate of £100 for repair and to raise the money she studied cookery books and made date cakes which she sold from an old pram on Cambridge market, a picture of the mill fixed to the side. It was an immediate sensation and soon she was selling teas to the hundreds of people who journeyed to see the mill, sitting contentedly on rustic tables in the orchard. After two seasons however she closed the business as the mill was restored. It was not the end of the story for she wrote a play "The wind and the mill" which was performed by the Festival Theatre Company in the fields around – England's first Theatre Camp. Memories 21 August, by Mike Petty

For the last two weeks the eyes of the world have been focused on the tragedy being played out at Soham; how could such things happen in such a small peaceful community. But sadly Soham has seen tragedy before and its church of St Andrew was then, as now, at the heart of it.

In the very earliest days of Christianity Saint Felix became the first Bishop of the East Angles. He founded a cathedral at Soham about 630 AD b Felix moved away to Dunwich, close to the town that commemorates his name. When he died his remains were brought back to Soham to lie in peace. But he was not to lie peacefully. Danish raids prompted fear of destruction and his bones were removed further inland for safety. Monks from Ramsey rowed over by boat to take them to their own Abbey. But such relics were important and would bring pilgrims, pilgrims would bring income with them. Monks from Ely decided to intercept them & to take the remains by force if need be. They too set off by boat towards Soham with a large force.

A chronicler from Ramsey recorded what happened next: "It came to pass that just as the ships of either party were approaching one another under a bright and cloudless sky, suddenly, to the discomfort of the large force and the benefit of the smaller, a dense fog arose which separated the two parties. And so, while their adversaries were vainly wandering in different directions, our boat was carried onward in a straight course and safely deposited by the aiding waters on the bosom of our native shore"

If the body of St Felix was safe, the people of Soham were not. The Danes ransacked the town about 870. They drove the priests and all the people into the cathedral and set fire to it. All perished in the flames and such was the destruction that nobody now knows where the building stood, though it is thought that the present church may have been built on the site.

Soham subsequently suffered the trials and tribulations of most communities; but it was in June 1944 the town was nearly destroyed for a second time.

On the night of 2nd June 1944 engine driver Benjamin Gimbert and fireman James Nightall set off from March marshalling yards with a consignment of fifty-one wagons full of bombs and detonators. Their journey proceeded without incident through Ely and on towards Soham at a steady 20 mph..

Then driver Gimbert noticed the leading wagon with its forty 500-lb bombs was ablaze and knew that something had to be done. He stopped the train and fireman Nightall ran back to the blazing bomb load; he disconnected that one wagon from the other fifty and rejoined his driver on the footplate. Together they steamed through the station pulling the burning load clear.

When the train stopped Guard Herbert Clarke noticed the burning ammunition wagon and he walked the length of three wagons toward it, within seconds he found himself thrown the length of six wagons back. In the signal box "Sailor" Frank Bridges looked along the track & could see the danger. He came down on to the platform to offer assistance.

Soham citizens slept soundly until their windows shattered and their beds shook as five tons of high explosives detonated and a crater fifteen feet deep and sixty-six feet wide appeared where once their station had stood. Those first on the scene found the twisted machinery, the shattered signal box and the wrecked bodies of Fireman Nightall and Signaller Bridges. They also found the heroic Driver Gimbert and fifty other fully-loaded ammunition wagons amazingly still intact. And because of their actions Soham survived, though the streets were covered in shattered glass.

The community of Soham have never forgotten the heroism of the railwaymen who saved their town. St Andrew's church was packed for a service although fragments of glass were still dropping down from the windows as the Reverend Percy Boughey began his address with the words: "But for such men as these ..." They are commemorated at Soham Village College.

But the loss of children is particularly poignant, and Soham has known this too, though this time as a neighbour. For at Burwell, just across the fen, in September 1727 children were getting very excited and asking permission from their parents to attend a marvellous entertainment that would be acted out on the Friday night at Burwell - a visit from Mr Shephard and his puppets. Everybody was careful to save up the penny that would pay the admission charge and as the great night came the fens were alive with people making their way. John Blinkensop from Reach went along with Benjamin Collis, Rose Rooke & Thomas Leggitt; John Prigg's daughter Mary travelled from Upware. Mary and Elizabeth Killingbeck were there from Swaffham Prior - in all over 140 people.

Amongst them was Thomas Howe aged 16 years. He paid his penny and entered the great clunch barn, its walls nine feet high with the great thatch roof overhead. The barn was nearly seventeen feet wide and stretched over 45 feet in length. But only one third of it was available for the show; much was packed with bundles of straw and at the far end was a stable. Thomas squeezed through the one narrow door just three feet wide and scrambled up to a beam just under the great thatch roof - and quite close to the old dead cobwebs that hung there. From there he could look down on the people he knew below - Lettuce Starling, Ann Bye, Sincere Warren and the rest. He recalled what happened next. "First there was the conjuring tricks they done on the oval table then they moved that out of the way and started the show proper. Old Mr Sheppard acted the part of a lover and his wife the coy mistress - you should have seen how they jigged the puppets and how they danced; then they acted out St George and the dragon".

Outside it was about 9 o'clock when Richard Whitaker the hostler came to feed the horses. He worked in the barn - but tonight they would not let him in unless he paid his penny. But taking his candle and lantern he went into the stable and climbed up to the top of the partition which divided it from the puppeteers. Pushing some of the hay aside he wriggled over the bundles of straw until he could look down from just under the great thatched roof on to the performance below.

"The dragon he was going at St George, blowing out fire and smoke ..."; meanwhile in the barn itself a small fire had in truth started. Thomas Howe saw the fire when it was small enough to have been extinguished by his own hands; saw it before Richard Whitaker screamed out the alarm; such a small fire but it spread along the thatched roof like lightning.

"Everybody was thrown into terror. They rushed towards the door but that opened inwards and they'd put the table they used for the conjuring tricks against it & the crush was so great they could not open it."

Outside people could see what was happening - already sparks from the thatched roof were spreading to surrounding buildings. Thomas Dobedee from Wicken broke down the door and dragged as many as he could from the burning ruin. Before he left his task the very hair on his head had been singed by the flames but out of the small hole he made 60 people scrambled to safety. Thomas Howe was amongst them: "I sprung down from the beam and landed on the people lying upon one another to the depth of three or four feet - one had fallen down, then others fell on top of them - there was nobody near the door that was standing up". Shortly afterwards the great thatched roof fell in - and the anguish, the cries, the shrieks of the sufferers were ended in one universal silence and death.

"In the Morning that was a hideous scene - skulls, bones and carnage. The mangled relics was gathered up, shovelled into carts and buried in two a large pits dug in the churchyard". Scarcely a family in the area escaped the tragedy. Thomas Howe's own sister perished - not a single woman had survived. Parents bewailed the loss of their children, children mourned lost parents, sisters lost brothers, brothers sisters. Over 80 people died. For years the ruins of the barn were visible; now they are gone. But a gravestone containing a representation of a flaming heart still stands in the churchyard at Burwell. The horror of that night has become part of the story of Cambridgeshire, as have the events of the last few days at Soham.

Margaret Wilsher from Frinton-on-Sea writes following my mention in last week's Memories of the West Wrattling windmill. Her father knew the owner and in the 1960s Margaret went to have a look at the mill close up. She is a real windmill collector and has recently managed to find a postcard of Balsham windmill which was taken down in the 1960s. This a fate that has befallen many such mills and in a paper read to the Cambridge Antiquarian Society on 5th November, 1928, H.C Hughes reported: "Windmills are disappearing so fast that in many parts of the country they are a forgotten race. Some day antiquarians will be examining and digging in mounds, having quite forgotten that they were the mounds of old windmills made to raise them a little above the surrounding land."

Together with J.H. Bullock he set about making a record of windmills existing, in whole or in part, in Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely in the winter of 1930-1, in conjunction with a Windmill Survey being undertaken by the Society for Protection of Ancient Buildings.

They found the oldest mill at Bourn had been out of commission for some six years. The sails had been smashed in a gale in 1925, finishing its working life. But the tenant would not let the owner pull it down & it was subsequently given to the Cambridge Preservation Society and restored. [PROBABLY A PIC IN NEWS FILES]

Although French's Mill in Cambridge was still standing, [PIC FROM NEWS FILES] as was the tower of the windmill in Hurst Park Avenue, of the mill at Long Road Trumpington there was no sign. But a Miss Moore, the daughter of the last miller could report it had been built in 1812, with part of the works coming from an old mill which had then recently been pulled down near Barrington. It stopped working in the spring of 1887 and a year later was sold to John Peile, the Master of Christ's College. He tried to let it but failing to do so had it pulled down that same year. Photographer R.L. Lord snapped it in its prime [SCAN ATTACHED]

One danger was that if the corn ran out the friction of the millstones made the stones very hot, sometimes causing fires. A windmill with the sails burning at night is one of the most terrifying of all sights, Hughes reported, adding that many Fordham people still remembered the sight of their mill burning

The drainage mill used to be a very familiar sight throughout the fens, and the Antiquarians have a picture of a group of small mills at Soham taken in 1914. [PIC FROM NEWS FILES]. There was also a large mill at Soham mere, belonging to the Cambridgeshire County Council with the old type of tail beam and old types of sail. "Long may they be preserved by the bodies that own them" he exhorted. Sadly it was not to be. By 1947 the mill was thought to be dangerous and the Council that the only answer lay in demolition. Enthusiasts protested at the loss of this rare survival of a drainage mill but to no avail - it was just too dangerous. So the demolition men moved in to pull it over with a tractor. They failed. Undaunted they returned with gunpowder. They failed. So in the end eight charges of gelignite had to be used to topple the "dangerous" structure. Ironically just eight years later another drainage mill, much younger, much less impressive and in a much worse state, was re-built and erected just next door, at Wicken Fen, where it is lauded as the last of the fenland wind drainage mills.

[PIX IN NEWS LIBRARY]

In 1928 Hughes reported: "To those who regard the windmill as a piece of useless antiquated machinery it is surprising to find how many mills are still working, though their number grows less every year, and it is almost useless to depend on a list for long. The long irregular hours needed to make the most of windy weather and the long spells of enforced idleness are a great difficulty without some auxiliary power; while the absence of a fuel bill is counteracted by the expense of repairs. There is no room for the elaborate cleaning machinery of the modern mill. Some windmillers, however, still make wheat flour. A notable example is Mr Lawrence of Stretham, who keeps quite a good business going".

The mill at Stretham lost its sails during the Second World War when it was taken over by the Royal Observer Corps as a look-out post. Now there are plans to put the sails back, though the machinery has gone for ever. [PIC FROM NEWS FILES]

Tony Manning has E-mailed to say that in 1953 he bought Mill House and Ingle's mill in Willingham. At this time the Mill had only three sails, the fantail was incomplete and old heavy tarred boards were falling off. He contacted every organisation that he could think of but no one was interested, so in the interests of safety having two young children playing under it daily he decided to pull it down. He found it was obviously built from second-hand timbers and has been told then often came from Battleships. Is this true, he asks and are there any records of the mill. Meanwhile another Willingham mill, Cattell's, was been restored.
[PIC OF CATTELL'S MILL IN NEWS LIBRARY]

The News files has pictures of several Cambridgeshire mills which supplement those taken by the Cambridge Antiquarians, whose files are deposited in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library. But do you have others, and stories to go with them? [PIC OF FULBOURN MILL WITH TRACTOR IN FOREGROUND]

Memories 28th August 2002, by Mike Petty

Last week a reader from Barton Seagrave in Northamptonshire wrote to complain of the number of trees along Queen's Road, Cambridge: "I thought I would inspire my son by driving along the Backs to see the magnificent architecture. We might as well as driven through a forest. Not a college to be seen, just overpowering foliage. Nineteen out of 20 of these post-mature specimens need to come down to reveal the magnificent vistas which probably looked their best in King George's Golden Jubilee year", lamented Dr J.H. Fitton.
[NEWS 21ST AUG]

Indeed the Backs are probably one of the areas of Cambridge that have changed most radically since the celebrations of 1935, but not in the way one might imagine. For many of the present trees are mere saplings compared to what was there before.

The demise of the previous giant trees has sometimes been dramatic. In November 1950 Cambridge was rocked by a series of explosions. Newspaper reporters scurried round to find the cause. Was it yet another fire at the Cavendish Laboratory - there had been two within eight months earlier in the year, or were the Civil defenders rehearsing their plans to see how the town would cope in the event of attack.

The Laboratories still stood intact, there was no broken glass in college courts yet Cambridge had undergone a radical transformation. Sixteen giant elm trees each older than the buildings they framed had been dynamited along the Backs.

It was just the latest stage in the removal of the mature trees in that area. The Avenue at Trinity College had been removed in 1948; that at St Johns was to follow in 1951. There was more felling along the Backs in July 1974 and the winter of 1981-82 when Dennis Gifford of Victoria Park, recalled: We were felling the elms on the Backs when my outside thermometer went down to five degrees Fahrenheit. Our contractor had to thaw out his diesel pipes, which were frozen solid, with a lighter rolled up newspaper before he could grind out the stumps. We were not able to replant before March”

Elms have been the victims of many attacks. As early as 1922 those lining Brooklands Avenue were being described as dangerous; 180 had been planted in about 1850 but disease was taking its toll. By 1937 50 had been destroyed & the disease was so endemic that there was no point in planting new. By 1950 only 92 of the trees remained and they were coming down at the rate of between one and five a year. Elsewhere Parker’s Piece trees were dangerous by 1962, a decade before the notorious outbreak of Dutch Elm Disease which led to the removal of a particularly rare specimen from the corner of Drummer Street in 1978.

Trees have a finite life but in 1894 perfectly good trees were being uprooted in Victoria Avenue to benefit farmers. The Royal Agricultural Show was to be held on Midsummer Common and people feared that the rows of trees newly planted to soften the impact of the great new roadway carved across the common to carry traffic to and from the new Victoria Bridge would be damaged. So they were dug up, to be replanted in Chesterton and replaced once the Show had departed.

New trees have often been planted for special occasion. In 1897 limes along Chesterton Road were seen as one way of celebrating Queen Victoria’s Jubilee. The willow population along the River Cam was greatly enhanced to commemorate the centenary of the Cambridge Evening News in 1988

The lost trees along the Backs were replanted as part of a Blue Peter [CHECK] project in GET DATE FROM LIBRARY OR OMIT. Dr Fitton’s letter is testimony the success of that replacement programme but it will be generations before residents and visitors will once more witness the magnificent trees of King George’s time, most of which have vanished, unrecorded and unremarked in the years since 1935. [PIX OF MATURE TREES ALONG THE BACKS C1910, TREES BEING FELLED & CLEARANCE PRIOR TO REPLANTING; PIC OF BROOKLANDS AVENUE & PARKERS PIECE – FROM LIBRARY FILES, ON ROS’ DESK]

In one respect the Backs have in recent months been reminiscent of the Second World War. This year the yellows and blues of the famous springtime flowers were supplemented by multi-coloured builders’ vans, helping to frame the view of King’s College chapel, and Degree Day saw the area converted into a large car park for the cars of proud parents. This was something anticipated by the News some years ago when they produced an impression of what the area would look like with an underground car park. But in the dark days of war the vehicles sheltering under the trees were military lorries, the leaves concealing their presence from German planes. [SCAN OF VANS THIS SPRING]

Following the events in New York last year the world will soon be remembering September 11th. But as Mrs E. Nightingale of Cambridge reminds me there is another September date etched in the memories of many people; September 3rd 1939 and the declaration of the Second World War.

She has lent me a faded newspaper cutting that means a great deal to her; it shows a group of Cambridge boys in the 250th Field Company, Royal Engineers who were then stationed at Parkside. It was taken just after the momentous news of the declaration of war had been made. Her husband is amongst them, on the back row, in front of Sergeant Riggs. How many of those happy lads are still around today, she wonders. [SCAN]

Albert Waldock of Fulbourn has also sent in another wartime photograph. This one shows members of no.18 Platoon of C Company, 1st Battalion Cambridgeshire Regiment Home Guard and was taken in 1944 when the units were disbanded. Beneath the picture someone has listed the names of all the soldiers, though these are now fading. Albert has managed to decipher most of them including O.Z. Barnes, recently deceased, from whom he obtained the picture. The Company had been formed in February 1941 and been commanded initially by Major J.S. Chivers and from April 1943 by Major H. Payne.

On 14th May 1940 Mr W Eden, secretary of state for war, had broadcast an appeal for a citizen force to be called the Local Defence Volunteers, to be organised within various regions. People flocked to the call and were entitled to claim expenses - a bicycle allowance, payment for underclothes torn on barbed wire - but it remained a volunteer force until 1942. Some weapons were available, in 1940 standard issue at one checkpoint was packets of pepper, short lengths of lead casing and iron tubing. But many had their own shotguns. Then in July Cambridgeshire received its share of the million rifles sent by the United States when 8,000 arrived at the Cambridge Corn Exchange - all thickly covered in grease. For two weeks hundreds of helpers were kept busy cleaning them - and ruining many garments in the process

What could they have done these ordinary people, lacking discipline and cohesion without proper weapons against a victorious army of young ruthless fighting men armed to the teeth. They would have had no chance in a pitched battle but that was not their role. They were the local defence of their homes, farms and village where intimate knowledge of every hedge or ditch could have delayed or harried the invader, and there was also the danger of landings by parachute, spies who could flash lights to guide enemy bombers or sabotage electricity stations

Initially the LDV were subject of much merriment – their initials, it was said, stood for 'lousy, dirty and verminous'. One wag at Ely remarked: "it won't matter now if Hitler does come for when he sees this lot he'll just die o'laughing". But they provided a home defence, blocking roads and potential landing sites, guarding bridges and power stations - jobs which a would otherwise have needed regular troops. When they posed for their photograph in December 1944 any feelings of regret that their fighting training had not been fully utilised was tempered by the relief that the bloodshed and destruction in which they would have played their part had been avoided and the objects for which they were established had been accomplished without the need to fight - as they said at Barton - to every last round, or bomb, or man.

Mr Waldock's picture will be passed to the Cambridgeshire Collection at Lion Yard Library, where the original negative may well be stored. For it was taken by Stearn and Company of 72 Bridge Street who continued to record the local scene during the war - a scene which included many of the organisations evacuated to the safety of Cambridge. But after the bombing raids in central Cambridge Stearns sent their glass plate negatives to be processed in Brighouse, near Leeds for safety from which they were later returned for addition to the Cambridgeshire Collection. Sadly the rest were destroyed when the Bridge street premises were vacated following the firm's merger with Eaden Lilley's photographic business in 1970. [SCAN OF HOME GUARD PHOTO]

Memories 4th September 2002, by Mike Petty

When I met Margaret Curran at the Hill Top Club, Primrose Street, Cambridge, she shared some of her memories of living in Park Street in the 1920s. Her father, Arthur Stone, was an upholsterer who had lost his leg in the Great War, and the family lived over William Thompson's shop. He was a clockmaker who would cycle in to Cambridge every day from his home in Barton and spent much of his time winding up clocks in the colleges & at Addenbrooke's Hospital. From their attic windows Margaret could look down on the activities in the street and witness the comings and goings at the ADC Theatre and Friends Meeting House. Margaret attended Park Street School until she was about nine years old, then moved on to Brunswick School on Walnut Tree Avenue, Newmarket Road. She asked if anybody had set down their memories of the Park Street area.

In May 1964 the News sent its reporter, Erica Dimock to survey the views of residents as part of her 'Down Your Street' series of articles. Originally a street just sufficient for two cars to pass along it had been transformed by the building of the new multi-storey car park. This had started in September 1962 and been officially opened by the Mayor of Cambridge, Coun J.B. Collins in October the following year. It was the first major car park in Cambridge and formed an integral part in catering for the needs of Cambridge's harassed motorists; a scheme that had seen the arrival of parking meters.

But the parking meter system now made it impossible for residents to leave their own cars outside their houses during the day. "Husbands coming home to lunch or before 6.30 in the evening, are obliged to put a shilling in the meter or else walk quite a distance from wherever they have managed to park their cars outside the city centre", she reported. One or two people had found a solution to the problem, though it had meant some sacrifice on their part - they had decided to park their cars in their precious front gardens.

The increased traffic which inevitably accompanied the opening of the car park did not seem to have worried local people unduly, Erica found. "One lady who does not manage to get out very often says she thoroughly enjoys watching the people going in and out of the park: 'It's like Piccadilly on a Saturday morning'"

The car park had replaced some 50 small cottages that used to stretch back to St John's Street. Mr and Mrs. A. Beaumont who had lived in Park Street since 1929, regretted the loss of some of their neighbours in the demolished cottages but liked it even more now that the street had been widened - there was more to watch as people went by on their way to the car park.

More change was in the air with the Maypole public house due for extensive alterations when it would be turned back to front, so that it faced along Park Street. The licensees, Mr & Mrs Collins had been there just over a year, having moved from Romford. They were enjoying running their first public house, the bar decorated with dolls from foreign countries. Their trade was mainly locals but they included undergraduates amongst its customers.

Erica sketched the history of the ADC Theatre, formerly part of the taproom of the Hoop public house and subsequently used as billiard rooms until converted to its present use. It had been badly burned in 1933 and entirely rebuilt with a seating capacity of 200 people. But, she added, it was "hardly of the standard of which a University which rears many of the country's greatest actors could be particularly proud".

Park Street school then catered for just over 100 children, aged from five to eleven, most of whom lived in the area, or had recently moved following the demolition for the car park. The head, Miss V.B. Pratt, had a staff of three full-time and two-part time teachers. Although the playground was not adequate for football games this proved little problems since Jesus Green proved an ideal place for more energetic parts of the school curriculum.

Those who actually live in this curve of Park Street have a most attractive outlook over Jesus Green and across to the river, Erica found. Their children, tired of their own back gardens, had plenty of freedom on the green, which is also an ideal place on which they could take their dogs for a walk.

But there was a problem: “The only disadvantage of living in these small terraced houses is the lack of a bathroom and indoor toilet. Some of the slightly larger houses round the corner have managed to have bathrooms installed and, with this very necessary amenity, have turned their homes into lodgings for undergraduates.” So what with new bathrooms and parking in their gardens Park Street had come a long way in a few years – did you live there?

Erica surveyed many other areas of Cambridge in the early 1960s; are there any that have special memories for you that you would like to see featured? [PICS OF PARK STREET FROM NEWS FILES, SCAN OF BUILDING CAR PARK, AUG 1963, OPENING OF MAYPOLE PUB 1965. PARK STREET IN 1920S AND 1930S]

Memories of Diana, Princess of Wales, have been evoked by a new video produced by the East Anglian Film Archive. “Royal Century” features various regional celebrations and includes footage of Diana’s visit to Cambridge in 1993 when she met crowds on Market Hill. A few years earlier, in 1975, another Royal, Princess Anne opened the Lion Yard redevelopment and there is most interesting footage showing the old Petty Cury and the work of rebuilding as well as the actual opening walkabout in the presence of many of the city’s dignitaries of the day. Cambridge also features briefly on ‘The Home Front, 1939-45’, a record of Home Guard, rationing and all the events of the period. A third video features the Singing Postman, Allan Smethurst in a film intended to launch his career in America in 1966. The promotion never happened and the film never broadcast but it is a most interesting record of how life has changed over the last 35 years. Today his hit song “Have you got a light, boy” would be banned as promoting smoking, there would need to be several pages of notes explaining the significance of “They’re all playing dommies in the bar” – and what was a postman on a bike anyway? The films are obtainable from the East Anglian Film Archive, University of East Anglia, Norwich NR4 7TJ or at any of the public showings that are given around the county by the Archive’s staff, who are always on the lookout for additional films for their files. Andy Hall from Huntingdon has sent me an early photograph of a mother and baby, a label on the back says that was taken by a photographer named J.H. Priest from Bridge Street, Cambridge. He asks for further information.

Joseph Henry Priest is listed in directories from the 1900s up to the 1920s as the University Stationery Stores and Picture Dealer with premises in Bridge street and Ram Yard. The Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library has a collection of his original negatives which include a series of street scenes of Fen Drayton and Fenstanton. He had an eye for the news photograph too. A view of the Leather Gaiters public house at Hauxton after the fire of 23rd October 1909 comes with Priest's caption giving researchers all the necessary details to enable the event to be read up in the columns of the local newspapers. He did not restrict himself to Cambridgeshire and some depict seaside scenes at Gt Yarmouth whilst a dramatic set of negatives show the effect of what seems to be some type of depth-charge explosion with a sailing boat passing serenely by.

In 1909 Priest photographed military manoeuvres by the University Officer Training Corps whilst a most interesting series showing a march past along Petty Cury about 1910 apparently showing the OTC in mess uniform. There is also a snap of a funeral procession along St John's Street, but whose? [SCAN OF PRIEST VIEW OF INSPECTION OF UNIVERSITY OFFICER TRAINING CORPS MOTOR CYCLE SECTION 1909]

Memories, 11th September 2002, by Mike Petty

On Monday morning members of Chatteris Probus Club stood in tribute to the memory of Maurice Kidd, who has died following a fall in the house in which he had been born 92 years before.

Maurice was a true fenman. But he was not the sort of fenman under the spotlight 25 years ago when in September 1977 'New Society' devoted some paragraphs to a controversial article on Fen Tigers. I had been at the Probus meeting to talk about this ancient breed of people and their battle to preserve their landscape from the changes of the seventeen-century, but their survey was more up-to-date.

It presented a picture of an area close to suave, metropolitan, cosmopolitan Cambridge which remained remote and uninvestigated. Its people were mysteries and its ways seen as tough, primitive and atavistic, the author, Anne Garvey, reported.

In 1977 she found it an area struggling against poverty: "Land work is badly paid. Wages are as low as anywhere in the farming world and struggling to maintain a family on £27 a week is a monumental fight. Women working is a longstanding tradition and a modern necessity". Yet when the News sent Pauline Hunt to investigate she found wages were double that figure and the fen farmworkers higher paid than in most parts of the county. Certainly on Monday many of those born and bred in Chatteris seemed to be thriving. True there were no ladies present but not, I suspect, because they were labouring in the fields.

Mechanisation was emptying the land. "The people are going and so are the animals. Littleport's retired vet recalled the days of community, of horse competitions and a dozen animals in every smallholding. Now there are few. Farming for the big fen farmer means machinery, investment, crops and produce. The land is farmed so fiercely that cabbages, sugar beet or maize hug the roadside where they are abruptly fenced off by barbed or electric wire." On Monday this week there were few signs of electric fences or heavy horses. There were steam lorries and smoking monster traction engines making their way home from the rally at Haddenham, but no traditional carrot lorries. "Chatteris is the carrot capital of the country", Clement Freud claimed in his recent autobiography when recalling his election as the local Member of Parliament. But today there are no carrots grown in the fields around the town, the soil will no longer support them.

Workers in 1977 were kept down in the tied cottage system or lived in council houses with a good show of vegetables in the garden – "huge cauliflowers, beetroots sprout and multiply, cabbages and sprouts crowd up to the front doorstep". Today few front gardens grow vegetables, most have been turned into lawns or car parks – for transport is a necessity.

But the population was growing. The new residents were uprooted families of dispossessed East Enders from London, almost all depressed and subject to a rash of psychosomatic complaints, who have given up trying to find houses in the capital. The huge housing estates built to welcome the newcomers were known in each village and town as ‘Colditz’ or ‘Auschwitz’. The locals lived in council homes that were “grim and comfortless within”. True Maurice Kidd’s home was not one that would feature in the glossy magazines; it was the home of a bachelor – a somewhat eccentric one at that - full of homely comforts and mementoes. Ever since he could walk Maurice had climbed the stairs to his bed, it was some mischance that on his last night at home he should have stumbled and fell.

A bachelor living in his family home – that was surely unusual even in 1977; but then, claimed New Society life in the fens was different from other areas. “The old patterns of courtship, marriage and family contact hang on. The result is damaging. Inbreeding, between related families throws up recessive genes which, with a less stable pool, would remain hidden. Inherited subnormality is exacerbated by this sort of inter-family contact - to a pathological degree”. No wonder the article raised a stir.

“Children in the fen are a good barometer of expectation at its lowest, they have very little experience of the outside world. They learn very little at home not even about the land and the countryside”, it claimed. But Maurice was a fen child who had visited virtually every country in the world, apart from China. And he used that knowledge as a teacher at the Cromwell School, Chatteris inspiring generations of children with his love of history, geography, and the fens.

His own education had been gained at King Edward School, Chatteris, where his father was headmaster, and the County Boys School, Cambridge, making the journey each day by train. From there he went to Fitzwilliam College, Cambridge and obtained a Master of Arts degree. In 1977 Pauline Hunt found three Fellows of the college had also been born in the fen, as had the former Master – hardly evidence of backwardness!

“Fen villages sleep. There are few clients for the little churches and chapels. The picture places are gone and there are only the bingo halls left for entertainment. Solutions for fen boredom are slow in coming” New Society found. In Chatteris today there are two social clubs, the Working Men’s and the Conservatives, back to back, where meetings such as Probus attract dozens of residents both old and new and which Maurice enjoyed attending.

Chatteris also has a thriving branch of the Worker’s Educational Association which sees upwards of 60 people meeting in an old schoolroom to study topics as diverse as the history of food and dining, or the local history of their area. Maurice Kidd used to give such lectures, illustrating them with slides from his travels or of old pictures of Chatteris and the fen. I was privileged that he agreed to act as guest lecturer at one of my classes there a couple of years ago, when his great knowledge and enthusiasm shone out, keeping the class entranced.

It was typical of Maurice that he should ensure that his great wealth of local history materials should be passed for safe keeping to the Chatteris Museum, just around the corner from his house. Here the community has collected a wide range of local artefacts that they display in a former doctor’s surgery, using the skills of local people to arrange and exploit. It is a hidden treasure in a fenland town too often overlooked by both tourists and locals.

As I drove home through driving rain a dull grey fenland morning I wondered whether to pause there with a coach load of members of Melbourn University of the Third Age on Wednesday. But as the article of 1977 says: “No one on a country jaunt would touch the fens; it’s too flat and boring to the visiting eye”. Certainly it now lacks one less character than it did.

Yes with his mixture of a wide range and breadth of knowledge, humour & colourful language Maurice Kidd was a true fenman. He will be greatly missed and lovingly remembered.

In September 1977 Cambridge children were following the Pied Piper of Westwick. Veteran charity fundraiser Snowy Farr led about 150 of them around the city centre. It was part of a new television series being filmed for foreign networks. But the sun refused to shine, Snowy took a wrong turning and helpful police had to radio around the route trying to locate him. Over-exuberant children kept overtaking his bike; cats fell off the trailer and the goats couldn't get through the crowd. Then to cap it all, sirens screamed and blue lights flashed as three fire engines raced up Trinity Street to the Whim Restaurant where a fire had broken out in a chip pan. After that things calmed down and the children, their parents, granddads, grannies, dogs and bicycles joined the Pied Piper procession again singing "Old Macdonald had a Farm". It was an exhausting day for all concerned. Sadly the series never went ahead. But were you one of the youngsters? [NEWS NEG 2643.77.25]

Pictures of soldiers in Memories for 28th August have brought responses from several readers. Cyril Moore and his wife from Impington were both interested in the picture of the Home Guard as both their fathers served in it. They recognise several faces including Corporal Nathan Wakefield while the officers seated in the centre are Charles Unwin of Unwins Seeds and Cyril Williams who owned the Histon Chemists shop. Norman Summers from Cambridge saw himself in the picture of the 250th Royal Engineers and Eric Maxim from Cambridge has further details. He writes: "The Royal Engineers (250th) were situated at the Drill Hall, East Road, before the war, but increasing numbers on the outbreak caused them to be moved to Parkside, now occupied by Cambridge Police and Fire Service. There were three Sections of 'RE's,' one was under Sgt. Riggs the other by Sgt. Roper and the third by my Father Sgt. (Bob) Maxim. Bob joined the 'Engineers' as a Territorial in 1932 but like many others were called up just before the outbreak of war in 1939. The three Sections were very popular as well as being very friendly, competitively, and I should imagine many people can remember the drills my father, Bob took the troops through, on New Square on Saturday mornings. The units were soon split-up, the 250th going to France, and the newly formed 287th Field Co. were earmarked to go to Singapore with the Cambridgeshires. My father volunteered for Bomb Disposal, and was sent near to Guildford, to a new section, placed around the Vickers aircraft factory at Weybridge" Eric has lent a picture of the 250th at one of their summer camps, showing his father, Sgt Bob Maxim and Sgt Riggs. [SCAN]

Eric himself was an apprentice the Unicam Instrument Co, a reserved occupation but with the help of a friendly recruiting Naval Petty Officer, managed to secure entry into the Navy. Last week I was speaking to the Cambridge Naval Association where I met Albert Freestone. He recalled the old bandstand on Christ's Pieces where dances were held to music from Josephine's Gypsy Band, while on Sundays the Salvation Army and Military Bands played concerts. In those days there were six-foot-high railings all round the Pieces and you had to pay to attend. Albert lived in Willow Place, now the Grafton Centre car park, and used sometimes to go to Coldham's Common where there were rifle butts with railway sleepers to stop stray bullets going over the top. He and his friends used to dig out bullets to take as playthings. He also recalls stories of an ox being roasted on the frozen river Cam at Quayside about 1900. Does any of this ring a bell with anybody else, and do you have snaps? [SCAN]

It was a day that Mother Duck and Mrs Chicken were unlikely to forget. They were off to Cambridge again, as they often did. But this time it was different. The cats and mice would be there too, along with the goat – but they usually joined in their Cambridge excursions anyway. There would be children – but children always stopped to look and stroke them, and a particularly brave kitten would decide that this was his day to climb on top of the hat. There would be cameras – but everybody took pictures. Only this time they would be television cameras.

The animals would have to be on their best behaviour & look their smartest. Their whiskers were preened, just like the whiskers of their chauffeur who would convey them to international stardom. Their carriage was given an especial polish, its paintwork gleaming as never before, the bunting flying.

In September 1977 Veteran charity fundraiser Snowy Farr from Oakington and his menagerie were off to recreate the story of legend, how the Pied Piper of Hamelin had led thousands of rats a merry dance. Only this time it would be 150 children and their parents who followed his progress around Cambridge. And it would all be filmed as part of a new television series to be shown around Europe.

But it did not quite go according to plan. The sun that was to reflect off the polished roadman's trike refused to shine. Over-exuberant children on bikes kept overtaking them – they had not had to cycle in from Oakington to start with. Some of the cats fell off the trailer and the goats couldn't get through the crowd. Then to cap it all Snowy took a wrong turning.

For a moment it was panic – how could a mass procession of children and their parents get lost in central Cambridge; surely somebody must have seen a man with snow white whiskers, wearing a red coat and top hat? Police radioed round the route to track them down, and soon they were on the right road again.

But then sirens started to scream and blue lights flashed as three fire engines raced up Trinity Street to the Whim Restaurant where a fire had broken out in a chip pan.

After that things calmed down and the children, their parents, granddads, grannies, dogs and bicycles joined the Pied Piper procession again singing "Old Macdonald had a Farm". It was an exhausting day for all concerned. Sadly the series never went ahead. But were you one of the youngsters? Do you have memories of your reaction when you first saw Snowy and his animals – or those of your children. For all that was 25 years ago and Snowy has been a regular part of the Cambridge scene for generations.

My appeal for memories of Park Street, Cambridge has brought responses from several readers.

Mrs Rita Dench e-mails to say that her parents, Mr & Mrs Sidney Frost lived in the first house and that her husband owned the white Ford Popular car shown parked in the driveway. Mrs J. Pearson from Girton went to Park Street school in the 1940s and remembers seeing the air raid shelters on Jesus Green. She recalls the corner shop selling vegetables and everyday items, the Maypole pub run by Mr & Mrs Shepherd and the large house next door where Mrs

Harper ran the Birdwood Club for local kids. "I remember playing 'Charades', having Christmas parties, Halloween, apple dunking with a big bowl of water with apples floating about which we had to get with our mouths. There were also lots of maps and globes of the world", she tells me. She has lent me a snap of a nativity play and can remember some of the children were from the McLean, Cook, Griffen and Collier families. [SCAN OF PLAY]

Patrick Schicker from Cambridge both shares and seeks information. He writes: My memories of Park Street date from late 1940s & 1950s when my mother was warden of the Friends' Meeting House on the corner and we lived above F M Wilson & Sons insurance agency. My room was in the attic, the further dormer window shown in the picture with your article. The writing on the end wall of our flat was an advert for beer. Our flat & Wilson's offices had originally been a Pub, until a benefactor bought it for the Quakers, to stop the rowdy Sunday morning beer drinkers disturbing the quiet of the Quaker Meeting next door! Evidence of the building's previous use was still very much in evidence when we lived there. The central heating boiler was housed in a magnificent Wine cellar beneath Wilson's office. At the Jesus Lane end of Park Street there was barely room for a car & a bicycle to pass each other. I could tell if the driver of an oncoming car, met on my way down to Park Street School, was a stranger by the look of horror on his face as I approached on my bicycle. Few believed there would be room for me to pass them.

I still have memories of the night in June 1949 when the Friends' Meeting House burnt down and we had to escape into the street at about 3 am. My father had been woken by the central heating feeder tank, for some unknown – but lucky- reason situated in our flat, overflowing. The heat of the fire had caused the water in the radiators to boil forcing water back into the feeder tank.

The fire is the tenuous connection to my second reason for writing. It was traced back to a cigarette end dropped into the back of a sofa by a member of Cambridge International Club, who at the time were using the Friends' Meeting House for their meetings.

Cambridge International Club was founded in 1932, so we are celebrating our 70th birthday this year. My mother has been associated with the club ever since she was their organising secretary in 1934. Unfortunately now that her memory is less sharp (she's 91) I realise how many gaps there are in my knowledge of the history of the club.

When the International Club was founded it had a Clubhouse in St Peter's Terrace (behind the trees opposite Browns Restaurant) with meeting rooms, dance hall, offices & even residential rooms to let. My impression is that it was based on a "gentleman's club" in London. It was mainly, but not entirely, University orientated with overseas students providing a large part of the membership, which was probably several hundred. At some point before 1934 the club became part of APA (All Peoples Association). APA then went bust & Eva Hartree - who was I believe Cambridge's first Lady Mayor - rescued Cambridge International Club by purchasing their assets from the receiver. The lease of St Peter's Terrace was then in her name. When Eva Hartree died (I think in about 1947) Peterhouse declined to renew the lease & the club became homeless. Until the above-mentioned fire they met in the Friends' Meeting House. [SCAN OF TRUMPINGTON STREET 1963, THE CLUB MET BEHIND THE TREES ON THE LEFT]

Then follows my main gap in my knowledge. By the time I joined the club in 1958 we were renting a grotty little house, from the YMCA, in Falcon Yard, (almost exactly where the Red Lion statue in Lion Yard now stands). Activities included Sunday night talks, informal Saturday afternoon teas (a rest from shopping!), sing songs & parties. A record Dance was held each Friday in the YMCA & every Monday there was (& still is) International Folk Dancing in St Columba's Church Halls. In those pre race-relations act days it was one of the few places where Asian & African members could ask a local girl for a dance without the danger of racist comment, or worse. Membership was probably a couple of hundred. Then Lion Yard redevelopment made us homeless again. St Columba's Church came to the rescue with an old storeroom which we converted to a clubroom. But over the years use of the clubroom declined, due in part to stricter security measures making access difficult. [SCAN OF FALCON YARD c1973]

Many of the needs addressed by the original International Club have, luckily, now gone. Not only has the race relations act removed the fear of racial incidents at most places of entertainment, but the whole of life has become more cosmopolitan. Cambridge International Club now has about 40 members. Folk Dancing continues on Monday nights (although with only a dozen or so attending not as fun as in the '60s when 40+ was the norm), we meet for a meal each Sunday night in the "Grad Pad", and try to arrange some other activity, often in member's homes, most weeks. A small & friendly group always happy to welcome new members! [PERHAPS PIX OF INTERNATIONAL CLUB FROM NEWS LIBRARY]

Patrick would love to contact old members who might be able to fill in some of these gaps, and also to invite them to the celebration party which they hope will take place one Saturday in November. If you can help or would like to join the party, or the club, please write to Patrick Schicker at 138 Milton Road, Cambridge CB4 1LE

I received a phone call the other day from one of the good folk at the Arthur Rank Day Centre, Cambridge. They provide hospitality, companionship and a nice meal to a variety of mainly older people to give them a break from those who care for them at home, and those at home have a few precious hours to themselves.

Was Union Lane one of the streets that had been featured by Erica Dimock in her 'Down Your Street' series in the News, she asked. Indeed it was – and this is what she found in February 1963 – nearly 40 years ago.

Union Lane, the link road between Milton Road and High Street, Chesterton, was the home of the old Chesterton Union Workhouse and the stark building still dominated the road, though memories of the harsh and bitter regime of that institution had almost disappeared. By 1963 it was a Hospital dedicated to the care of elderly people and along with Langdon House on the other side of the road was setting an example for similar projects elsewhere.

One of the oldest residents of the houses near Milton Road 1963 was Mr. Ernest Mansfield, then 85 years old, who had lived there for 60 years. He had seen changes as new people moved in and there was far more traffic. He preferred the older days: "People tell me these are better times, but I can't see it. If you get more money you only have to spend it because everything costs more", he reasoned.

He could remember some old cottages that stood on the corner of Union Lane and High Street until the 1940s. They projected so far out that the corner was virtually blind for traffic & it was said they incorporated beams that had been floated down the River Cam. Two of them had been used as a Wayfarers' Rest. Tramps waiting for a night's accommodation at the Union were not permitted into that institution before a certain time, and so they spent a few hours in the cottage where they could get a cup of tea and something to eat. They were then taken upstairs into what was known as "the chapel", a section of the Bible was read to them, and afterwards they moved on to the Union.

In about 1925 the East Chesterton Conservative Association set up its headquarters on the other corner next door to the Premier Dance Hall and roller skating rink. The property was acquired by Mr. L.W. Hallen in 1937 and part of the old dance hall incorporated into a garage and workshops. By 1963 it was their main service station and operational headquarters with a modern service showcase called Chesterton Autocars at the Herbert Street corner of Chesterton Road and premises in Hawthorn Way devoted to mopeds, motor cycles and motor scooters. The firm had pioneered a motor cycle and scooter training scheme, giving instruction off-road to prepare customers for taking their Driving Test. The old Hallen's Garage has now been replaced by flats. [SCAN OF HALLENS GARAGE UNION LANE 1963]

But Union Lane was home to other firms. The Cambridge Electro Plating Company had moved there at the end of the war and specialised in painting and electro-plating items from car bumpers to silver or the large copper urns used in college kitchens to prevent them rusting. The in-thing in 1963 was cleansing, polishing and lacquering of old-fashioned gas lamps which people were using for all sorts of purposes, from hanging outside their front doors to garden ornaments. About 50 people were employed and golf trolleys, car accessories and dustbin lifters were also manufactured on the premises. The lifters had proved very popular, making it possible to wheel away a dustbin without strain and without getting dirty – a forerunner of the wheelie-bin.

Renbros Radio and Television used a converted garage for repairs to radios, televisions and record players while the Leys Laundry had done a considerable amount of business – including employee's overalls from Chivers' factory at Histon - and had employed between 50 and 60 people until it closed about 1960. [SCAN OF CHIVERS GIRLS OUTSIDE FACTORY]

But the dominating feature was the old Union Workhouse, then Chesterton Hospital. The Union had been built in the 1830s and for many years was surrounded by open fields. It was intended for paupers or for those who had got into debt. At Chesterton there was also a maternity ward for the wives of casual labourers who went round from place to place doing odd farming jobs, with a schoolroom was provided for their children.

As time went by some of those accommodated became old and ill and eventually a one male and one female ward were opened to cope with them. The County Council had taken control of the building in 1931 and ran it until the establishment of the National Health Service in 1948 when it became part of the United Cambridge Hospitals, though the Council maintained 64 social welfare beds. By 1963 it was functioning as a dual-purpose hospital with 141 beds devoted to hospital cases. New wards had been opened and attempts made to brighten up the interior of the bleak-looking building. Groups of volunteers were raising money and organising excursions for patients and matron, Mrs N. Mace was experimenting with increased visiting times – though she stressed she did not want people staying for hours and hours. Patients should be encouraged to remain active – too often relatives did too much for their loved ones, which encouraged early senility. The elderly should be allowed to do things for themselves, no matter how long it took. [SCAN OF HOSPITAL 1963, SCAN OF BEGGAR 1930S]

Almost opposite the Hospital was Langdon House, one of the most up-to-date residential homes for the elderly in Cambridge, which had been officially opened by Princess Margaret in July 1957. Already it had proved its worth and an appeal was about to be launched for a new wing, including a unit for those who fell sick. The warden, Mrs Findlay, was finding working with elderly people very rewarding. But it was also frustrating: "Sometimes it is pathetic the numbers of requests we get to take in elderly men and women. There is a crying need for more of these homes". She had organised entertainment and illustrated talks to keep her residents stimulated and active.

This is something repeated these days at day centres throughout the region where visitors are privileged to meet so many interesting folk with tales to tell. [UNION LANE PIX FROM NEWS FILES]

One person who appreciated this more than most was Enid Porter who devoted nearly 30 years to recording memories to add to the treasures housed in the Cambridge Folk Museum. No person, especially no person aged over 70, should be neglected as a possible source of folklore, she believed. It took infinite patience, and an ability to know what to believe, and what not – skills she demonstrated with her interviews with W.H. Barrett out at Brandon Creek, who was stone-deaf when she met him, meaning that all her questions had to be put in writing. The result of hours of story telling was distilled into two books, Tales and then More Tales from the Fens which continue to be read and enjoyed 40 years later. Then there was Arthur Randall, a fenland railwayman and molecatcher who could have rid the fens of moles, but of course did not – for then he would have no job. But her notebooks were also filled with a mass of reminiscences of old Cambridge folk who would pause in their struggle up Castle Hill to join her in her little office at the front of the Museum, taking care not to scorch their legs on the one-bar electric fire, as they talked of days long gone. Much of their knowledge was distilled into the monumental book 'Cambridgeshire Customs and Folklore' published in 1969 and in numerous articles in the News. But then Enid's own health failed and she retired from her one-woman crusade and her curator's cottage behind the Museum, but not before she had been honoured by the Folklore Society and the University of Cambridge. Now Enid too is part of Cambridgeshire history, her name fading from memory. Or at least it was. For two Cambridge Academics, Carmen Blacker, an expert on Japan, and Hilda Davidson former Lecturer in Anglo-Saxon and Vice-President of Lucy Cavendish College, have included her in a volume of essays entitled 'Women and Tradition: a neglected group of folklorists' alongside other enthusiasts from the 1750s.

Memories 2nd October 2002, by Mike Petty

In September 1972 the News sent a reporter [I'LL TRY AND FIND THE NAME] to interview Jean-Jacques Burnel, BA, Hugh Cornwell, B.Sc. and their friends. But before he could reach them he had to get past Rat Rancid and Garry Gangrene.

He met Rat and Garry outside the Cambridge Corn Exchange patiently queuing for a concert, having travelled down from King's Lynn. It was obvious they were music fans – perhaps it was the safety pins through their cheeks, or it may have been the chains through their noses – they were horrible, but precisely what he had come to meet - punks that looked every bit as vile as the ones he'd read about. "They snarled and leered while my colleague, Mike Manni, took their pictures. And then something rather sweet happened. Rat put down his can of Party Seven and scribbled his address. Could we send some prints when we had a spare moment? 'To Rat Rancid', I asked. 'Oh, no', he gasped. 'My mum wouldn't like that. You'd better put Reg Smith on the envelope' In a second all the rebellion, all the punk symbols, crumbled and the green-haired punklet became plain Reg Smith"

Soon the reporter had got inside to interview the group that had attracted such a wide following: The Strangers. Jean-Jacques was the bass-player- "Come and talk to Hugh, he said, dragging me across the room. 'There's someone here wants to interview you', he shouted to a locked door. No reply. Whereupon Jean-Jacques, former Hells Angel, leaped at the door and smashed it open. Hugh Cornwell, lead guitarist was revealed sitting on a lavatory seat, his trousers around his ankles. He looked a little put out”

In the event they were not quite what he’d been led to expect. He found four individuals quietly eating cold sausages. They had no rings through their noses, their clothes weren’t held together with safety pins, they didn’t fake East End accents. Perhaps they were getting too old for all that. Certainly one of the fans thought their aggression was put on and did not come out as naturally as some of the other punk bands. It was even said that Hugh disliked being ‘gobbed at’ (spat at) – the traditional punklore form of adoration. And shock was what the punk movement was about - shocking people out of apathy.

Then came the transformation as the time came for them to take the stage. Over 1,000 people were packed into the Corn Exchange, another 400 were still pushing outside. Inside the building was dark, hot, cavernous and violently loud. The group prowled the stage like menacing rats, pointing their guitars like sub-machine guns. The sound was just a barrage of unrelenting, stationary noise. The songs, when you could hear the words, were songs of protest. Even when the words were inaudible the music screamed rebellion. Everyone stood and faced them, some doing the punk dance – jumping up and down like pogo sticks.

Analysing the punk scene the reporter concluded that the worst thing was the lack of any positive values. It was rebellion for its own sake. The punks were rebels without a cause. Their preoccupation for excrement, sewers, disease and physical ugliness had diverted them from shocking people with the facts of war, torture, mechanisation and pollution. The best thing about the punk movement was its commitment & its energy. It had given a whole generation an awareness of the need for change. It forced people to think. And in the case of Rat Rancid gave him a photo to treasure amongst the family snaps. I wonder if he still has it.

I never attended a Strangers concert, and every time I use a safety pin it sticks in my finger. But were you a punk, do you have memories of those days, or snaps to share? [PIX FROM NEWS FILES 26 Sep 1977]

Meanwhile a more gentle form of music, that played at Cambridge Christ’s Pieces bandstand, has continued to bring back memories for Mrs Jean Pope of Comberton. She recalls the dances and Sunday band concerts held there; “As children living close by, my mother used to take us there often & on Thursday evenings during the summer months they used to put on Varsity Concerts. I can remember enjoying them very much. What a pity the bandstand was pulled down. Cambridge was such a lovely place in those days”.

Beryl Bonner from Whittlesford has lent me her own picture of the bandstand, taken in 1933 on her Box Brownie. Beryl was born in Cambridge in 1920 and lived with her grandmother in Malcolm Street. She writes: “My grandfather used to take me to listen to the band on a Sunday. We rarely sat on the slatted seats, price 6d., but he used to hold me on the railings outside so I could be close to the band.” She continues: “I went to Park Street School and in the snow of the winter of 1926 I slipped on the ice going to the school’s outside toilets, caught cold in my wet dress and knickers & developed pneumonia. When fit again I went to Newnham Croft school. On my way to school, alone at five years old, I went down Park Street. In the cottages on the left lived my grandmother’s sister and in the first tall house with bow windows lived my ‘Auntie Bee’. [SCAN OF HER PIC OF BANDSTAND PERHAPS MALCOLM STREET PHOTO FROM NEWS FILES]

Val Haynes from Over also remembers Park Street. “I lived there from 1946 to 1949 in an old house which had three storeys. It was owned by Jesus College (where my dad worked) and was demolished to widen the top of the road, which was so narrow. Our house was next door to the clockmender. My sister and I had the top rooms as playrooms and used to pelt passers by with my dad's seed potatoes, until someone complained to our mum! It was directly opposite the ADC Theatre & we used to watch the actors and actresses coming and going – and there were one or two assaults on children by one or two actors. One old man was taking me to buy sweets from the corner sweet shop but my mum caught him. So although people say it was safer for children in those days parents still had to be vigilant. I was very sad when they demolished the houses to make way for the multi-storey car park.

Tony Haslop from Bar Hill was quickly on the telephone to say he recognised some of the faces in last week's mystery picture. He spotted Jim Laughton, Barry Hales and Derek Kilby and thought it might be connected with a building firm. But then Bernard Cornwell from Histon has come up with full details. It shows workmen at F.L. Unwin's Hazeldene Works, Station Road, Histon and was one of the works outings to London. They had a meal, made their own entertainment in the afternoon and went to a theatre show in the evening. Between 1950 and 1960 over a hundred men were employed at Hazeldene Works and on building sites in and around Cambridge. Bernard was one of them and can name all the men shown. Amongst the different trades were carpenters, joiners, wood machinists, bricklayers, painters, labourers and office staff. The firm also made agricultural implements such as hay sweeps, elevators, milking machines, corn conveyors and the weighing machines made of elm that weighed potatoes on the farm fields. A picture of the construction of some of the elevators appears in the book of Photographic Memories of Histon compiled by Eleanor Whitehead and Bernard has a slide showing a similar outing as well as some of their trade literature. [SCAN OF UNWINS HAZELDENE WORKS, HISTON]

Ralph Warboys from Oakington has responded to my request for information on windmills with a copy of his researches on the mills at Oakington and Westwick. There was a windmill in the parish in the 13th century and one ancient postmill burnt down in January 1863. Old postcards show a tower mill but the four sails had become dilapidated by the 1920s and an oil engine was used to drive the stones. To start the engine the cylinder had to be heated by two blowlamps; the engine would then be turned over by a man walking up the spokes of the flywheel, hastily jumping off when the engine turned. Because it stood at the end of the runway of the aerodrome it was decided the mill must be demolished. Its owner, Mr Papworth, made hasty efforts to get it working again, perhaps to increase the amount of compensation! Ralph was amongst the village schoolchildren who were shown over it in 1939, just before it was demolished with explosives. He was then asked by Mr Ernest Papworth to go to the mill and look for a brick with his name on it. Ernest said the mill was built by his father when he was a small boy and he had been strapped to the back of a builder and taken up the scaffolding to lay the last brick, which had his name on it. Sadly Ralph could not locate it amongst the big pile of rubble. [PERHAPS OAKINGTON PIC FROM NEWS FILE]

Beryl Ginn from Cambridge writes: "After reading the account (Memories August 28th) of how young Horse Chestnut trees along Victoria Avenue were dug up in 1894 and later replanted, I was reminded of the time when every other tree was removed, presumably to allow each one more space to grow. I believe this was carried out in the late 1940s? There are now twenty-four trees on the Midsummer Common side of the Avenue and twenty-two on the Jesus Lane side (if I have counted them correctly), although one or two are not the originals. My late mother told me that a hundred trees were planted, fifty on each side. Many of your older readers will remember the 'thinning out' of the trees but I would be interested to know the year it happened". Can you help? [SCAN OF VICTORIA AVE TREES]

Photographs of protest marches and banners have been appearing everywhere recently. But do you recall this mobile advertising hoarding photographed in St Andrew's Street, Cambridge in the 1960s. He is promoting the Castle Hill Driving School where expert tuition in dual-control cars cost 15/- (75p) an hour. [SCAN]

Memories 9th October 2002, by Mike Petty

Shirley Brown from Trumpington has solved one mystery, but discovered another.

In June 2000 Trumpington Local History Group published 'Twentieth Century Trumpington' which recalled a long running saga that first hit the headlines in 1973. The found a photograph showing Manor Farm House standing alone on the edge of a new development (Beverley Way). It was then the last obstacle to plans for a 67-bed motel to service The Green Man and The Red Lion. For the next two years a battle raged between developers and conservationists. Interested parties joined in on both sides and as the arguments continued the house deteriorated. Despite ongoing protests it was finally demolished. The timber frame was carefully taken apart and – it is said - reconstructed elsewhere.

Shirley's historians asked several people what they remembered about the fate of this house but no-one could recall much about it.

Then when the book was published they were told that the Manor Farm House had been red brick, whereas theirs was made of lath and plaster. Surely there could not have been two houses with the same name. Then in June this year Anthony Pemberton lent a set of photographs taken in 1921 at the unveiling of the war memorial. In the background stood both the contenders for the title of Manor Farm House. It proved the historians had got it wrong, Manor Farm House had been demolished earlier for Beverley Way. But could the older house have been the original farmhouse & the redbrick a replacement built later as a more fitting residence for the farmer. The History Group would love an explanation. [SCAN OF WAR MEMORIAL UNVEILING AND THE TWO 'MANOR FARM HOUSE' CONTENDERS]

Now the Trumpington History Group are compiling another book, and have another mystery.

In 1860 Francis Frith set up a photographic company in Reigate, Surrey & undertook the daunting task of photographing every city, town and village in the British Isles. He took with him his wife, two servants, four photographic assistants and a growing number of children - six of them eventually. The task was not one to be rushed for Frith saw himself as a chronicler of his time, an artist using the new medium of photography in the same way that other artists had used brushes and canvas. For the first few years he took all the pictures himself but later recruited a select group of artist-photographers to assist him. By the time of his death in 1898 some 40,000 views had been taken including a series of Cambridge scenes dated 1890, with views of Ely 1891, St Neots 1897 & Huntingdon 1898. When in 1900 the Post Office allowed postcards to be sent through the Royal Mail the increase was dramatic. A network of photographers were recruited and by 1914 there were 52,000 pictures in the company's files and numbers soared later.

When the Company closed in 1971 they left a legacy of thousands of pictures, many of which were acquired by the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library. And amongst them is one headed "The Dove Garden, Trumpington". It was taken about 40 years ago – almost yesterday. But Shirley's historians can't find anybody who remembers it. They are anxious not to repeat their experiences with the Manor House – and so have appealed to 'Memories' readers for assistance.

All facts, theories and surmises please to Shirley Brown, on 01223 841559. [SCAN OF DOVE GARDEN PHOTO]

But not even the photographers know where they are sometimes. The same photograph appears in two of the Francis Frith books of Photographic Memories. In the Cambridge volume it is captioned as 'Fen Ditton, the village 1914' whereas the Cambridgeshire book gives it as "Trumpington, the village 1914". But which one is it – or was it actually taken somewhere else? Your opinions please

There is now no doubt as to the mystery picture featured in Memories on September 25th. Letters have continued to pour in confirming it was an works outing of F.L.Unwin the Histon building, carpentry and joinery firm. John Rayment of Cottenham joined as an apprentice and served for 25 years until it was taken over by Ridgeons; Neville Smith from Swavesey took a bricklayers apprenticeship there at the same time. Mr R. Gawthrop saw himself on the picture, Mrs M. Brown from Earith tells me her husband was there too and Mrs H. Land from Histon can also identify several of the faces. Mr B. Hales from Willingham was the small lad in the front row while Michael Taylor of Cottenham points out that the coaches were from Harveys of Cottenham. Mr Harvey lived next door to the Cross Keys tavern on Cottenham green. He was also a haulage contractor and once owned a racehorse named 'Parker's Piece'. At that time the landlord of the Cross Keys, was Jim Lampard who had played in goal for Barnsley pre-war and trained some of the lads in the Cottenham village football team.

Given the amount of interest I reproduce another picture of an Unwins outing, this one supplied by Bernard Cornwell [SCAN OF OUTING]

Another picture of the start of an excursion – though one with less happy memories – has been sent in by Mr B.W. Gurner of Cambridge. It shows four members of the 250th Field Company, Royal Engineers, leaving Cambridge station in mid October 1939 en route for the Second World War. It shows Mr Gurner, Sapper Percy Taylor with the forage cap, Corporal Taylor, top right, and Sapper Ernie Baker. He writes: "On our scramble to reach Dunkirk in late May 1940, separated from five of my colleagues and being shelled in a small town, I was taken prisoner by a German infantry unit. It was the day before my 21st birthday! I spent the remainder of the war in prison camps in Upper Silesia and was released on May 8th 1945"
[SCAN OF SOLDIERS]

Mr G.D. Howard from Over found his attention caught by one of my 'Looking Back' snippets from 1952. It told the story of how two Meteor jet aircraft collided in mid-air above Over. One of the pilots landed near the church & the other near the Pike and Eel public house prompting the landlady to observe: "We often have pilots calling here – but not by parachute". He writes: "Our family remember it very well, as they collided over the top of our churchyard just as they were lowering my Grandfather's coffin into the grave, and one of the bearer party the graveside and called the emergency services"

Memories, 16th October 2002 by Mike Petty

Archaeology is always in the news these days, with numerous television programmes following the progress of various investigations and making celebrities of those who spend their time in trenches.

The Cambridge archaeological community has been saddened recently to learn of the death of one of its most prominent members, Joyce Pullinger, for several years Director of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society's Archaeological Research Group. She led a team of professional archaeologists and trained excavators. But they were supplemented by a handful of volunteers, including Odette Wylie, Mary Miller and Pat White, just ordinary housewives for the most part. The ladies formed a small group willing, at a 'phone call's notice to rush off to any site which needed 'rescuing'.

Pat White from Balsham recalls some of the discoveries she shared: “Joyce participated in the excavations at Arbury Camp and when I first joined her she was digging the important Roman site at Ridgeons Gardens at the top of Castle Street, opposite the Shire Hall.”

Joyce’s team discovered what they believed to be a Roman religious shrine. They found tiny slivers of human bone in what seemed to be burial shafts for children. Each child was lying on a rush blanket and every grave had a mature dog buried in the south corner. But more mystery was added by the presence of some 200 wine flagons and thousands of oyster shells, together with evidence of fire – leading to speculation that the shrine had burnt down and then the ancient Britons and Romans had held a party, leaving their rubbish behind them. But as Joyce said: “All we can do is show the evidence and then it is up to the experts to do the arguing amongst themselves”.

Then in 1977 came a dramatic discovery that sent the team out again: “At Dry Drayton we uncovered the skeleton of several victims of the hangman’s noose”. It began after a workman digging the Cambridge Northern Bypass discovered a Saxon glass beaker and took it home with him to Ipswich. When he took it to his local museum for identification the curators contacted Alison Taylor, the Cambridgeshire county archaeologist, and Joyce’s housewives were quickly on the scene. They soon unearthed some shallow graves. Alison knew that there had been a gallows on the site in medieval times – it was a prominent position on a crossroads and at a high point in the landscape. And the fact that the bodies were not given a Christian burial pointed to them having been executed for some ancient dastardly deed.

Pat continues: “We excavated a Roman kiln at Harston whilst huge earthmoving vehicles rolled to and fro beside us, in the wake of a new road, shaking the ground as we trowelled. Our group helped at a University dig at Wilbraham Common to discover a causeway camp and for a number of years excavated as much as we could of a Roman villa and farmstead at Teversham. Not to mention all the other times we rushed to keep an eye on various pipelines and proposed developments in the county. And during all this time Joyce patiently handed on her skills and knowledge to us.

“Alison Taylor has spoken of how, when she was appointed the first County Archaeologist, she came across the sight, at the bottom of an enormous hole, of three middle-aged housewives trowelling busily and carting bucketfuls of soil to a very large spoil heap. It was Joyce Pullinger and her volunteers. We learnt so much from her and will not forget her.”
[NEWS PIC NEG 17417722 - JOYCE PULLINGER (RIGHT) & ARCHAEOLOGISTS, 1977, PERHAPS OTHER PIX FROM FILES]

Now Alison Taylor edits the Proceedings of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society, the latest volume of which has just been delivered to members. It contains reports on another ‘shrine’ – this time at Pampisford & of more work on the Arbury Camp, expanding the knowledge gained by Joyce and her team. Other papers investigate the landscape of Litlington, the water-meadows at Balsham and detail some of the discoveries when constructing the new Processional Way at Ely Cathedral. But not all discoveries come out of a hole in the ground. Tucked away amongst the papers at the Scott Polar research Institute in Cambridge is a journal compiled by the wife of Arctic explorer Sir John Franklin. In it she chronicles some of her own expeditions – including a trip to Cambridge at the end of June 1811 when Trinity College undergraduates seemed all too happy to escort her around the sights. One area she would have got to know well is the Market, and the houses which in those days clustered around the east end of Great St Mary’s church and spread into the centre of what is now the Market Square. They were to perish after a great fire in 1849. One thing she would not have noticed however is the Bull Ring – a post to which the bull would have been chained to be baited – considered a reliable method of tendering the meat before slaughter. Now Peter Bryan and Nick Wise have examined ancient maps and records to establish just where this stood in medieval days, part of a major reconstruction of what the Market Place was like in the period before 1400. The Proceedings of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society for 2002 are available for £14.50 to non-members of the Society; members receive one free as part of their subscription. [LITLINGTON SCAN, SCAN OLD MARKET PIC 1801]

The Proceedings also, for the first time, incorporate “The Conduit”, a comprehensive programme of the lectures and activities of many of the Cambridgeshire local history societies. This has previously been produced in conjunction with Cambridgeshire County Council, but following a fiasco last year – when Conduit was published long after all the events had taken place – the Antiquarians have taken back responsibility. So if you’re interested in the Paranormal you should get out to Duxford History Group on 22nd October, if you’ve not heard Michael Bowyer on Cambridgeshire under attack 1940-45 then you attend the meeting of Cambridge Industrial Archaeologists at the Friends Meeting House, Jesus Lane on 9th December, whilst the notorious Cambridge Spinning House – the University’s private gaol will form the subject for Cambridgeshire Local History Society in January. The various groups welcome visitors who are assured of a warm welcome.

Wardy Hill is a small community in the fens between Sutton and Ely. It is famous for its whist drives, reported week by week in the columns of the News and attracting players from around the district. It also hosts a harvest supper in the small community hall that was once the village Methodist Chapel. On Saturday night diners were reminiscing about the old days, when a London man who used to have a house at Witcham Gravel would arrange for the Camberwell Band to pay a visit and play for dances. Those were the days when the road to Jerusalem was just a track and he was collected a man in a pony and trap. But last week the Jerusalem Road – the single-track that links Witcham and Coveney – was chock-a-block with traffic following an accident that had closed the main road. Never before had they seen so many vehicles – it was just as well that was a different day from the one that the sheep escaped and wandered through the hamlet. We tucked in to soup, salad, apple pie, cider and for the non-drinkers, orange squash – but do you remember the ‘Thirst Quenching Crown Mineral Waters and Fruit Squash’ manufactured by H. Simmonds and Co at the Crown Works in Ditton Walk, Cambridge. The firm also manufactured ‘Robot’ Bleach. They advertised in the programme of the Cambridge Trades Fair for 1950 which attracted over 76,000 visitors. Also advertising were Naylor’s Stores of Hills Road who sold paints, wallpapers and ironmongery, H.B. Holttum ‘the Light Tractor Specialist’ of Cherry Hinton Road and Fella Bros manufacturers of delicious ice cream in Mill Road. If any of these ring a bell, or you have snaps then please jot me a line. [SCAN OF SIMMONDS ADVERT, SCAN OF WARDY HILL 1930s]

Mrs P. Anderson from Cambridge has added her memories of the Christ’s Pieces bandstand; she tells me that in the 1930s local amateur dance groups and singers used to perform concerts there – she was one of them. She’s also sent a snippet from Saga Magazine in which Peter Hall recalls how he heard that war has been declared in 1939. “Neville Chamberlain broke the news on the radio as I shredded beans for my mother on the doorway of 121 Blinco Grove, Cambridge. Father was on relief Sunday duty at some country station, we weren’t sure where, so we wen to down to Cambridge station to ask, and they didn’t know either. Then he came home, as he came home every day throughout the war. Most families had hideous separations. We had none”

Mr K. Bright of Cambridge half-remembers the windmill on Milton Road; he recalls a five-bar gate and a long drive and believes the late Stanley Baker of University Arms Dance Band fame once lived there. Is there a picture, he wonders. I have one taken from Milton Road about 1908, but does anyone had a better view

Memories 23rd October 2002, by Mike Petty

A massive new 600-page history book has just been published, yet it covers only about 25 parishes in the eastern edge of Cambridgeshire – places like Soham, Fulbourn, Cherry Hinton, Wilbraham, Bottisham and the Newmarket suburbs.

But for many of these places this is the first detailed local history book that has ever been published. It has been compiled by a small team of historians from the Institute of Historical Research of the University of London – and how can London historians know about Cambridgeshire villages?

To research their history they have delved back into the ancient records stored in all the places such documents can be found. Depositories such as the Public Record Office, the British Library and Cambridge University Library have been carefully searched. They spent many hours at the Cambridge County Record Office at Shire Hall, umpteen more in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Lion Yard Library, and they went out into the countryside itself to meet local people.

Open the new book at any page and you will find about one quarter of it is not history at all – it is footnotes recording where they found the information. And many of those footnotes are to stories appearing in Cambridgeshire newspapers. Chris Jakes recalls how one of the researchers, Dr Peter Wright, would come in to the library and ask for the last 240 years of newspapers – just so he could track down a few dozen stories. It is a task that would daunt anybody. Indeed it would have been totally impossible, were it not for a team of volunteers who have undertaken a massive indexing project to record news for each village in old Cambridgeshire from 1770 to 1900, supplementing the library’s own newspaper cuttings files from the 1960s. Other enthusiasts have been undertaking other projects; the Family Historians have been copying out the crumbling inscriptions on gravestones and transcribing parish registers and census records. And numerous individuals have been beaver away on some aspect of local history, be it a place or a bus company, producing their own small publication and passing a copy to the Cambridgeshire Collection.

Because all this work has been undertaken far more history can be written, but for the same reason it takes much longer to compile. Even so it is almost inconceivable to think that a team of professional historians should have been working for decades to produce such a volume. No reason the Lord Lieutenant, the Chairman of this and that, and local people came together to celebrate its completion!

But they were celebrating more than one book; for this was the 10th and last volume for Cambridgeshire, part of a series that began before the second world war, well before the electronics and high-technology industries that are covered in the latest volume were even thought of!

So what does it have to say about your parish –

Ashley: most of the post-war prefabs in Silverley Way were pulled down in the later 1980s and replaced by sheltered housing for the elderly

Bottisham: much of the land had been abandoned by 1765 owing to defects in the drainage system

Burwell: in the 1890s most farmers were just surviving by drawing on their capital

Cherry Hinton: in 1927 Elijah Pamplin gave four acres to be maintained as a meadow for use as a recreation ground

Cheveley: had 59 houses in 1674, most lined the village street from the church to the park wall

Fen Ditton: a schoolmaster was licensed to teach grammar to boys in 1579

Fordham: amongst those disputing the lord's common rights c1250 were a smith, a carpenter, a weaver and a tanner

Fulbourn : traders in food were recorded from the late 14th century ... a Co-operative store opened by 1933

Isleham: a windmill, supposedly 300 years old, was damaged in 1850

Kirtling: in 2001 Upend had shrunken to barely twenty houses by demolition and the knocking together of pairs of cottages

Snailwell: in 1684 King Charles II's Lifeguard were billeted here

Swaffham Bulbeck: in 1926 a new minimally Gothic chapel, build of concrete blocks was opened in Commercial End

Teversham: Marshall's flying school trained 20,000 RAF pilots during the Second World War

Wicken: by 1873 the vicar held winter cottage lectures for the distant hamlet of Upware where a wooden mission hall was erected in 1883

Of the dozen or so other parishes covered Soham is the largest and has over 60 pages devoted to its settlement, communications, inns, economic, manorial and religious history. The story of its Grammar School, the great fire which swept Fountain Lane, the arrival of the Mormons – and their speedy departure, the establishment of its monastery by St Felix, its fields, fens and feasts are recorded.

But despite all the care taken by the professional historians it can never be a complete history. Somebody somewhere will stumble upon something else, perhaps a piece of pottery, perhaps a bundle of documents, perhaps just a forgotten booklet, and a new paragraph or a new footnote will need to be added to your community's story.

Many village histories are sold by the local newsagent or post office. They cost just a few pence. Not this one. The Victoria History of the County of Cambridge, volume 10 will set you back £90 if you wait for your Christmas book tokens. But there are savings to be made; buy before the end of December and the cost plummets to a mere £67.50. Or you can get it for only £35. For as a special offer the publishers will sell you the complete 10-volume set of the VCH for Cambridgeshire for £350, a bargain for those who have space on their bookshelves. The prospect of visiting every parish in the old county of Cambridgeshire & the Isle of Ely is both enticing and daunting. There are just so many of them. But one man who has done just that is Hugo Brown of Queen Adelaide, near Ely. He allowed himself just 15 minutes in each place, took out his camera, snapped and scarpered to the next.

The results of his epic journey can be seen on a new CD-Rom in the 'Cambridgeshire Explorer' series. But who will want to see photographs of Cambridgeshire villages taken this year. If it included old photographs – colour postcards from the early 1900s, or photographs from the 1920s that had not been published before, then that might be something else. So Hugo has added these too - about 1,000 of them. There is a minimum of five pictures, old and new, of every village – except one. Childerley. For Childerley is now a private estate and they would not allow him to take photographs. So Hugo has just a single picture – a Christmas card issued by the owners of the estate in 1901 that shows six different views.

Originally Childerley had two churches but both were destroyed and the village depopulated by Sir John Cutts about 500 years ago when he wanted to form a deer park. Later King Charles I was brought prisoner to Childerley Hall during the Civil War. These snippets come not from the VCH but from a Kelly's Directory of Cambridgeshire published in 1904. It goes on to list the boot and shoe makers, tailors, millers, brewers and horse dealers – not in Childerley for there were none, but for all the other parishes in the county at that time.

These Directories were issued between 1847 and 1937 and can still be found in antiquarian bookshops. They are arranged by village and list names of gentry and tradespeople. This is fine unless you are interested in tracking down a particular surname. Then it is an impossible page-by-page plod.

But not any longer. For Hugo has indexed every name appearing in the 1904 Kelly's Cambridgeshire Directory and included these on his CD-Rom as well. So you just look up a name, click on it and are transported to the relevant page of the directory. There is also an index by trade, so at the click of a mouse you can track down cabinet makers, hair dressers or motor car agents. And if you are not sure of your way around the county then there are maps to guide you, and if you do want to see what it looked like then, and now, there are more than 1,650 pictures.

It has been a massive undertaking, and like the VCH has been supported by the Cambridgeshire Collection. Being an interactive CD-Rom you have to read it on a computer, but there are links to other sources – including this column on the News' website. The Kelly's Directory of Cambridgeshire, 1904 CD-Rom costs £22 from The Cambridge Explorer, Ash House, Prickwillow Road, Queen Adelaide, Ely, CB7 4TZ

On Sunday over morning coffee I noticed a woodpecker working its way up an electricity pole. A few minutes later and the power went off. Like so many thousand other people that was the last we knew of electricity until Monday morning and we had to remember how to cope without it.

Most of us take it for granted that we can banish darkness at the flick of a switch but electricity is quite a modern innovation certainly as far as some of the country villages are concerned. It was in 1884 that Peterhouse in Cambridge became one of the first places in the country to introduce electric lighting when they installed their own generating plant. This fed light to bulbs which were equivalent to 10 watts - a little better than candle power - with each bulb costing the modern equivalent of over £30. The new technology s did not please the Cambridge laundry ladies who used to hang their washing on Coe Fen for smuts from the college generating plant got on to their nice clean sheets.

Then in 1891 a Cambridge firm, Baily Grundy and Barrett started the town's first public electricity supply from a dynamo in the basement of their shop in Gt St Mary's Passage. They covered only a small area around King's Parade and Peas Hill but in addition supplied and installed private generators including one at Milton Hall in 1898. As this business declined the company moved into wireless, the design of temperature control equipment for laboratories and other specialist apparatus. In the early days they had charged accumulators for the University labs & some people thought that this was how electricity would be spread to outlying areas with accumulators being delivered door to door along with the milk and paper. As darkness fell on Sunday we would have been pleased to have had one!

In 1892 a rival Cambridge Electric Supply Company was established. They chose a site in Thompson's Lane and put in large steam turbines that initially they ran only during the hours of darkness but in 1894 became continuous. The Company's business started to expand as more consumers adopted the electric light. Despite plans to expand into other sites the generating station with its smoky chimney continued to operate until the 1960s.

By then, of course, many changes had taken place. One was the establishment by act of parliament in 1925 of the Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire and Huntingdonshire Electricity Company who based their operations at St Neots near the main projected power house at Lt Barford. Initially they had to take electricity from companies based in London, Bedford and Cambridge with a fourth source, Peterborough, coming soon after and allowing the development of the northern area. For a start they supplied power to 13 towns and villages from Lt Paxton to Ely as well as to Sawston paper mills and Cambridge cement works. By 1929 they had put in 100 miles of overhead line and 45 miles of underground cable with plans for expansion - a line between Whittlesey & March, another from March to Ely with connections to Chatteris Ramsey & Littleport amongst others. Soon an additional 19 villages were connected and when the National Grid came into being the company became one of the first to take power from that source.

Consumers varied from big business to a small tradesman who had just three lights and declared that electricity was the best and cheapest form of lighting. There were various tariffs in 1929; you could pay 10d per unit for lighting but far better was an annual service rate - a fixed charge of £2.14.0 per year for a medium house and then just three farthings a unit. This made it economical to heat and cook as well; alternatively if you lived in a council house or had a rateable value of less than £1 (10/- in towns) you could pay £3 per year for which a you got 120 units free. On top of this there was a charge for meter rental of 2/6 per quarter.

Slowly electricity spread to other Cambridgeshire villages, as E.M. Barraud recalled in her book "Tail Corn" published in 1946 it was not without trepidation on the part of consumers: "Once again we have been told we shall have electricity in the village by the end of the year. The promise has by now become a hardy perennial but so far it has borne no flower. First it was the war, since then it has been labour or materials that nipped it in the bud, but the pylons are marching steadily towards us: if not this year, then next year, sometime. There are times when I would give anything for electricity. Clean safe lighting at the turn of a switch with no danger of a flare up and smoked glass and sooted mantle and a major operation to put things to rights again. A cleaner effortlessly sucking up the dirt and dust from the floor, from my books. A fire for half an hour, and no grate to clean up afterwards, on chilly spring or autumn mornings and evenings. Radio without the menace of an exhausted accumulator just when the one programme of the week is due, a gramophone with no handle to turn. No one in their right mind could fail to appreciate all these things, to say nothing of being rid once and for all of the infinite permeability of paraffin where food is concerned. And yet it will not be all gain when the lamps and stoves are put up on the top shelf and then relegated to the tool shed. I shall miss the not unpleasant faint aroma of burning paraffin wafted through the place while the early morning tea kettle boils, and the soft glow of an oil lamp adds warmth as well as light to the scene".

On Sunday night many of us would have been delighted to have such luxuries.

After the war electricity was nationalised though there were still private enterprises. One of these were the Bullingham Brothers of Prickwillow who in 1953 generated and distributed electricity for themselves and their neighbours - and lit the village streets. When Mr Bullingham had had his tea he switched the generator on, when he went to bed he turned it off again; this was a bit awkward for consumers if he wanted an early night - but usually operated 4-11 pm in winter.

As we made our way on Sunday night for a hot meal we saw that up near the windmill lights blazed from a house which, like Mr Bullingham had its own generator – as does the village pub, our destination. But they did not need it, for the bottom half of the village had proper electricity, the church was floodlit as ever.

Perhaps our village neighbours with their lights, televisions and kettles envied us our candles, our battery radio and heating water in a saucepan on the coal fire. It took us back to the good old days. But I was mightily relieved to wake to find the electricity engineers had wrought their magic and brought us back into the 21st century again.

Lynda Robinson has e-mailed from Whittlesey having finally caught up with a Memories article from 22nd May. She writes:

“I can't tell you how thrilled I was to be given this cutting yesterday (albeit rather belatedly!). You can imagine how thrilled I was when my mother gave me your page with THE picture on it yesterday, particularly as I was on my way to the County girls reunion at the time, so the whole day was spent reminiscing.

“I left Milton Road School 50 years ago and have often talked about this event especially recently. I think I am on the photo, sitting behind Barrie Coombes, next to the girl covering her face. The May Queen was Anne Rowlands, and although the faces are not familiar the names certainly are. Michael Rumbelow, Roger(?) Blows and Peter Fluck, who I often wondered whether he is the same Peter Fluck who has been on TV. He was tall, thin and quite a character. Other names I remember from our year are Suzanne Rose, Margaret Summers, Peter Cook, Roberta Maskell, Sandra Swain and a boy called Richard Dilks who used to throw my satchel into a tree on the way home and whom I would dearly love to meet again as I am probably as big as him now!! We were all in Mr Leach's class and left at the end of the summer term to go to our various secondary schools. If any of these recognise my name then (Lynda O Fuller) I would love to hear what became of them. Particularly Roberta Maskell and Margaret Summers, whose names cropped up yesterday at the County Girls Old Girls Association Annual buffet lunch at Long Road. It is now 50 years since we entered the County and had hoped that more of our year would have been there to celebrate. In the end there were six of us. Where are the other 80-odd from our year?

“Back to May Queens. I am currently involved with our local primary school (Coates, near Whittlesey) and amongst other things they are maintaining the May-Day tradition of crowning a May Queen. I have often mentioned how beautifully it was done at Milton Road School, with the crown made of fresh spring flowers and the wonderful processional music, but I had no picture of it - until yesterday. I have also been making all sorts of enquiries lately to find out what the processional music actually was, because I can remember it was the first classical music to really impress me. Is there anybody who can enlighten me please?”

Mrs Laura Simmons of Cambridge was walking in Sussex Street, Cambridge the other week when she spotted a bit of Cambridge history. Julia Heffer's jewellery shop was being completely refitted, including the entrance and on the floor in mosaic she saw the legend "Greenlees and Sons. Easiephit Footwear Ltd". Then on the end wall of the former almshouses in King Street at Pike's Walk there is an advertisement in fading paint for Centaur Cycles. Do either of these ring a bell with anybody? Mr T. Gooding from Godmanchester has written to add further details to my story of two Meteor jets colliding above Over church in 1952 (Memories 9th October). He tells me that both aircraft were F4 variants operated by 206 Advanced Flying School, and he even knows the serial numbers. That same day in other parts of the country three more Meteors crashed with two fatal results. The loss of five planes and two pilots must have been one of the worst peace-time days for the Royal Air Force, he adds.

Memories 6th November 2002, by Mike Petty

Last Saturday a number of rowers on the Great Ouse between Ely and Littleport found their passage obstructed by a riverboat containing councillors and assorted, mainly elderly, residents

Many of them were making the voyage for the first time but soon the exciting part of the voyage had passed. The magnificent vista of the cathedral from the river had been supplanted by a glimpse of Roswell Pits & a close-up of the old Sugar Beet Factory wall where once dozens of barges had moored with their cargo of beet. But ahead lay the bridge at Queen Adelaide thronged with about a dozen spectators who had gathered to witness the occasion. Then it was just water and river banks as the sun went in, the skies became cloudier and it started to rain.

Inside the boat soup and coffee were served and as the voyage progressed people started chatting to each other.

But this was no council junket. For amongst the passengers were a small group of even-older folk who had made the passage before, though in less comfortable circumstances. They were members of the Oxford and Cambridge University Boat Race crews who had competed along the stretch of river from the junction of the Rivers Ouse and Lark to Adelaide Bridge back in the wartime days of 1944, when the usual contest on the Thames had been cancelled.

Most of the Cambridge crew members had not met one another since their Varsity days and recalled how they had led for much of the race, only to be overhauled at the end as they neared Ely. The one representative of the winning, Oxford, crew thought that they had raced the other way – but then it was a very long time ago and this stretch of river lacks the landmarks of the normal Putney to Mortlake route.

Newly-discovered film footage of the original race shows that crowds lined the river banks, with some on horseback galloping to keep up with the rowers. And amongst scores of people who had come to relive the occasion on Saturday there were numbers of local folk who as boys and girls had journeyed from Littleport or Prickwillow to witness a once-in-a-lifetime occasion. Some also recalled other unusual river sights of those days, such as military vehicles being ferried across the River Lark on canvass-boat-bridges in preparation for other river crossings when the onlookers would be less friendly, speaking German, and trying to prevent them.

Many of the councillors disembarked halfway through the voyage, to be whisked back to Ely Cathedral for a special service before turning out again for the bonfire night celebrations. The rest of us returned at more sedate pace, being overtaken time and again by rowers who probably did not know that some at least of those on board could give them a run for their money – or at least could have done 58 years earlier!

The 1944 Oxford and Cambridge boat race was never formally recognised in the annals of University rowing but the sport's historian made the journey to Ely to celebrate the get-together. In two years time he hopes to return, together with more of the Varsity rowers, more of the spectators and more of the world's media.

For in Ely a voluntary community group calling itself Diamond44 has been set up who want to contact anybody and everybody who was there and ensure that the full story is recorded for posterity. They also hope in two years time to bring together the Varsity rowers of 1944 with their modern equivalents & organise a re-enactment of the race. Who knows, they may even get the Oxford and Cambridge crews together just a few weeks before they meet on the Thames on 24th March 2004 for the 150th official University Boat Race.

If you can help add to the celebration, or have any memories then contact Jack Waterfall - Hon. Secretary, Diamond44 - at 1 Castelhythe, Ely, CB7 4BU or log onto their new website at www.diamond44.com. Another group are being commemorated in an exhibition at the Emmanuel United Reformed Church in Trumpington Street, Cambridge for the rest of this week.

They are some of the remarkable Cambridge ladies whose achievements are often overlooked. They range from Lady Margaret Beaufort, foundress of Christs' and St John's College – whose name is further commemorated by a boat club – to Daisy Hopkins who was propelled to prominence when she was arrested by the University as a suspected prostitute and won a case for wrongful imprisonment.

In the 1860s any woman could be accused of prostitution. If the woman accused had never been married she would be given a virginity test, and would be issued with a certificate to say she was disease free and could therefore become a prostitute. As a result of her new reputation, all honourable forms of employment would become unavailable to her, therefore leaving her no other choice if she were to survive. Josephine Butler was one woman who took the leader in the campaign against the state regulation of prostitution. Then in 1867, she was introduced to Anne Jemima Clough & became involved in the campaign to persuade Cambridge University to provide more facilities for female students. This resulted in the provision of lecturers for women and later the establishment of Newnham College, Cambridge.

Another important social reformer featured in the displays in the church is Eglantyne Jebb, founder of the "Save the Children" campaign. In 1895 attended Lady Margaret Hall, at Oxford University to study history, but was not awarded a degree because she was a woman. She came to live with her mother in Cambridge and involved herself in the work of the Charity Organisation Society. In 1906 she published a report called 'Cambridge- a study in social questions' which investigated the lives of working people in Cambridge during the Edwardian era.

Work in those days was, she found, “of a severe and monotonous character” and youngsters often “frittered away their leisure hours in amusements which fail to afford any real rest or recreation. The girls who can find no better happiness than that of parading the streets in their best clothes grow up into the women who spend the day gossiping on their doorsteps or in reading penny novelettes. The boys who loaf at the street corners grow up into the men who spend their evenings in the public-houses. Thus we manufacture not simply loafers, slatterns, and drunkards, but hooligans and criminals”.

But there was an answer – to channel the youngsters’ energies into social clubs and organisations such as the Albert Institute. Many of their members earned their livelihood by indoor and sedentary occupations but their Athletic Clubs did remarkably well. The Harriers succeeded in winning the Cross County and Three Miles Road Championships, their gymnasts were giving excellent displays and on the river their first boat went up three places and the second one. Such activities, Eglantyne concluded, might question whether physical deterioration was, after all, the inevitable accompaniment of town life.

Steve Foreman of Girton has lent me a photograph of one such sports club; the Newnham Croft Institute football team of 1920. His grandfather, Steve Johnson, is amongst the players, but who were the others. And do you recall the Institute, at the junction of Hardwick Street and Merton Street in Newnham? [SCAN OF FOOTBALL TEAM]

Mrs M. Brookes from Cherry Hinton has sent me a cutting discovered amongst her late mother’s papers. It comes from the Cambridge Chronicle of 21st October 1925, but I wonder what it was that had caught her eye all those years ago. The stories include an account of a fire at G.P. Hawking’s bread depot next to the Dorothy Café in Sidney Street, Cambridge. The report reads: “There was a fierce blaze and at one time the flames reached half-way across Sidney Street. The flames spread with great rapidity and the shop was all ablaze when the firemen arrived. Ten minutes however was sufficient for the brigade to get the fire well in hand but even then the basement and shop were practically burnt out. The rooms above the shop, those occupied by H.H. Maharaja Jam Sahab of Newanagar (Ranji Singhi) when he was an undergraduate at Cambridge were not damaged”. [SCAN OF CUTTING]

Terry Waters has e-mailed: “I recently found a piece of pottery on the bed of the River Ribble at Clitheroe which has “Colin Lunn & Son, Cigar Importers, 3 Bridge Street, Cambridge” inscribed on it. I have established that he was a cigar importer and cigarette manufacturer around the turn of the century and he had premises in Oxford for a period of time but that’s about it. I would be grateful if you could supply any further information about him.”

I believe the firm opened in 1899 and was still going in 1984. At various times they had shops in King’s Parade, Bridge Street and Trinity Street – but can anybody assist further.

Memories 13th November 2002, by Mike Petty

This year Armistice Sunday in our village of Stretham was even more sombre than usual. This year there was no parade of veterans marching with their banners behind the band. For there was no band and there are now very few veterans left to march.

As in so many communities most of the old soldiers have faded away and now, fortunately, there are fewer of us with personal experience of war. But there are more of us who remember when our parents did march with the Royal British Legion behind the band and that adds to the poignancy of the day. We scan old photographs of previous parades for faces of people whose names are now fading from our memory, unlike those whose names are carved in stone on memorials and recited each Armistice Sunday. [PICS FROM NEWS FILES OF OTHER PARADES]

The names of the dead from the Great War are also commemorated on two framed lists dating which are proudly displayed in Stretham Royal British Legion Hall. But the Legion are now surrendering that hall and seeking another meeting place. Previously their base had been an old first war army hut, which itself fell victim to old age and was pulled down by its members, many of whom are now commemorated on their own gravestones. [DEMOLITION OF STRETHAM OLD BRITISH LEGION HALL]

Another reason that this year there was no band is the problem of ensuring that those marching are safe from modern speeding vehicles. Yet ironically this year the village was unnaturally quiet for the road is closed whilst traffic calming measures are put in place. To older villagers this road to Wicken is the Military Road, itself a product of conflict.

For during the First World War there was a danger of invasion with enemy troops landing on the East Coast. But there were few roads linking the Midlands to the coast, making rapid movement of men and equipment difficult. So in the early months of the conflict army engineers arrived to construct a new hard road toward Wicken where it would link with the existing road to Soham and the world.

Wicken folk looked forward to the new opportunities it would bring their community. For Wicken had extensive areas of grassland and the military horses – for this would surely be a war fought on horseback – would be sure to pause for their night in their village, bringing trade to the pubs and shops. But in this they were disappointed.

For although the army built their Military Road, nobody could decide who should pay for the construction of the Military Bridges over the Rivers Cam and Old West. So they were not built. For a while pontoons spanned the rivers, allowing some traffic to pass, but then they were taken away and grass began to grow through the new highway. [FAIR ON WICKEN GREEN, 1960s]

Not until the Great War had been won did the bridges arrive on the Wicken Road. But by then increasing traffic demanded better bridges elsewhere and the old Stretham Ferry Bridge on the main road from Ely to Cambridge was replaced with one more suited to modern needs, as were the old wooden bridges over the New Bedford River at Mepal and Sutton Gault. [TESTING THE STRETHAM FERRY BRIDGE 1925, THE NEW BRIDGE AT MEPAL UNDER CONSTRUCTION 1930]

There was also a demand for new roads – leading to the construction of the Twentypence Road from Wilburton to Cottenham. And the old roads needed to be improved, so the wall of our churchyard was set back, nearer the war memorial. On Armistice Sundays crowds overflowed into the road to watch the laying of wreaths, the playing of the Last Post and the recital of the names that we remember, even if we never actually knew them.

But for some the names are those of fathers or brothers and for them the Remembrance continues, not one day a year, but every day, band or no band. And, hopefully, thanks to their sacrifice, we may never see again the mass parade such as that of May 1965 when over 7,000 old soldiers assembled at Ely Cathedral for the dedication of a new Legion Standard – a mass of faces, still remembered by their families.

Ted Austin from Over has responded to my recent for memories of electricity – but his memories go back further than most – to the 1920s. “My best pal at the Perse School – sadly no longer with us – was Emmerson (Mo) Gardener who lived in Thompson’s Lane. His father was manager of the Cambridge Electric Supply Company whose generating plant was opposite his house. I therefore had many opportunities to visit the works. I well remember the high-pitched hum of the dynamos and how the whole place was spotlessly clean & the dynamos all polished up. I believe however that their system worked on 200 volts, not 230 as was generated elsewhere. The steam turbines were cooled by water drawn directly from the river at Quayside and discharged back again when hot. This stretch of river was always a few degrees warmer and attractive to fish. Jesus Green open air swimming pool in those days also drew water from the river and was reported to be warmer too – though personally I doubt that”.

Ted continues: “My friend Roy Burgess of Cottenham went as an apprentice to the Cambs and Hunts Electricity Company when he left the Perse School and worked for them for some years. Mostly he was engaged in installing electricity in homes as the supply arrived. They had plenty of work since the company would install three lights and a five-amp plug free of charge & were expected to complete one home a day.”

Stella Cornell of Bottisham remembers the day electricity arrived in her village: “I married in 1950 and moved from Swaffham Bulbeck to Lode, later living in a tiny cottage with only a black cooking range upon which we heated kettles of water. My baby’s napkin and bibs were boiled in a galvanised pail on the range. My mother washed my bed linen and towels as she had a brick copper and mangle, small items were dried and aired on a large fireguard surrounding the range. All cooking was done on the range, a Primus stove was a luxury. There were no baths, just a wash down in front of the cooking range.

“Oil lamps needed filling before dusk, a task performed on the back door step, and the glass globes had to be carefully washed and polished, the wicks kept trimmed. We used a bicycle lamp as a torch indoors & you needed a torch to walk about the village, as it was pitch dark, no street lights then.

“Everyone was on a waiting list to be switched on to electricity; eventually I appealed to our doctor, Dr Elliott of Burwell to help. His response was to write to the appropriate quarters requesting we be switched on as I had a very young baby. Miraculously the doctor’s letter did the trick and we were enjoying the luxury of electricity at last. The old flat irons which required heating on the range were promptly replaced with an electric iron that plugged into the light socket in the ceiling. We purchased a brown enamel electric kettle and a small Jackson Giant cooker sporting one hot plate and a small oven. We then bought a Creda electric wash boiler which also provided hot water which we ran from a tap into a galvanised bath which we hauled in from the shed each Friday. Bath over we carried it out together using the two handles to empty on to the garden. It was then returned to its nail in the shed. Although there was no heat, except from the range, we were in luxury land – and no power cuts”. And, Stella adds, few people had television in those days, but what they did have was a wireless &, though this needed a large accumulator battery requiring a regular recharge at 6d a time, it kept them in touch with the world.

Dennis Hall has written from Chatteris following my article on the late Maurice Kidd. “I was head of the King Edward Junior School, Chatteris, from 1948 to 1978 and got to know Maurice and his parents very well. On 18th October this year the King Edward Centre Building celebrated its centenary and Maurice was looking forward to the event so much. All the children from the present King Edward Junior School in Burnsfield Street came in their year groups and were ‘taught’ after the fashion of 1902. They were also dressed for the part and will long remember the ‘1902 classes’.”

Memories 20th November 2002, by Mike Petty

Paul Melton and Lorna Delanoy set out some 25 years ago to record the memories of some of Cambridgeshire's elderly folk. They built up a remarkable series of tape recordings and received a grant from the Queen's Silver Jubilee Trust so that the tapes could be heard at 'listening posts' by people visiting the Farmland Museum, then at Haddenham but now relocated to Denny Abbey. They also allowed the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library, Cambridge to have copies as part of their large collection of sound recordings, where they are available to readers.

Tape recordings are excellent ways of sharing memories of the past, but there is one big snag. Until you listen you have no real idea what they have to tell you. And an hour's recording takes an hour to hear. Now Lorna has organised a team of helpers to transcribe some of the words for a little booklet being sold in aid of the Farmland Museum, capturing both the tales and something of the way they were told.

It includes the memories of the late Con Cameron of Chatteris, probably the first lady taxi driver in the area, back in the 1920s. Con recalled some of the problems of early motoring: "We used to have to put side curtains up, well, it was ever so draughty. I used to be out all hours of the night. You had to have a rug round your knees cos it was so cold! No heating. And you used to have to let the water out at night if it was freezing because they used to get froze. There was no such thing as anti-freeze in those days. And jack it up to start it in the mornin'. And then as soon as you get the jack up you could start it up and crank it up to try and get it to start! You'd jack it up then it'd fall off the jack!

"My father would not buy any new tyres or tubes. And do you know, soon as there was a hot day all the patches used to lift off these blessed tubes. I remember going to Cambridge once, we were going to the Botanic Gardens, and I took a crowd there, in our open Ford it was, and someone walked by and, some man it was, said, "Look at your tyre!" I looked at the tyre and there's a great big bulge. We hadn't been going long through Cambridge and it went off bang! So I had to go to a garage at Downing Street and they come and towed me in. And I said, "What am I gonna do?" And he says, "You're gonna have to have a new tyre." I says, "Well, I haven't got any money to get a new tyre I got a young baby with its mother and about four kids," and they went in the Round Church in Cambridge, fed this baby, get out the heat because it was a hot day. And I was in this Downing Street pub and a young fella came up and said, "What's the trouble?" and I said, "I've got to get a new tyre and they don't seem to trust me", and I told him who I was and where I come from. I said I got to be back by 6 o'clock I got to meet the 6 o'clock train. He said, "Look", he said to the man, "I'll pay for that tyre", He was an Air Force fella from Duxford."

Nowadays there is a modern straw-burning power plant at Sutton – but this is nothing new, as Ewart Drake recalled:

"My grandfather built two factories at Sutton, one in the Brook and the other adjacent to the railway line at the station. This was the chaff factory. It started with threshing for farmers and often the farmers did not want the straw and farmers did not want to pay to have the threshing done, so my grandfather would take the straw. It was a great big place and they had conveyors and elevators there to take the chaff (chopped up straw) up to the top where it was mixed with hay and then steam was forced through the mixture to cook it. It used to have a special smell about it and was called 'nosey'. People could smell this ever so far off and could predict the weather by it. This would then be put into bags weighing about forty pounds each which were loaded onto the trucks in the railway siding and taken to London for feeding the horses in the pre-car days."

Esther Howe from Prickwillow recalled her daily chores: "I used to get up about half past six. My husband would get up just a bit before cos I used to like my cup of tea in bed, you see. But soon as I had that I had to get moving. So I used to get up at half past six. My husband and the milkman used to go out and milk and I'd be ready to separate (take cream off by passing milk through hand operated machine) at ten minutes to seven when they came in with the milk. We used to take the cream off. People used to come years ago and fetch a ha'peth of milk. A ha'peth of skimmed milk. Quite a can full cos you wouldn't do anything cept give it to the pigs. Whatever container they brought, you just filled. I had all the housework to do and course there was butter to make once a week. And chickens, I had about 400 chickens. They were free range. Every afternoon, wet or fine, eggs were collected and the egg man used to come round and collect them in a big lorry - a huge container lorry. The boxes they used to bring would hold thirty-six dozen. I'll tell you an ordinary day's work. We had what we called dockey at quarter past ten. And then the men stopped for oneses just for a cup of tea and a bite of cake or something. And then come in at four o'clock for a cooked meal. That was in an ordinary day's work when it wasn't harvest. But harvest there were these four meals to get. We went to bed earlier than what we do now. Yes, half past nine. If we thought it was ten o'clock, my dear, we was late!

Steve Foreman's picture of the Newnham Croft Institute football team has jogged memories for Mrs Lily Stollery of Elsworth who recognises her dad, Bert Gray - who also played in goal for the College Servants. Ronald Barnes from Cambridge, spotted his grandfather, the late William Barnes. He is on the left of the players, wearing a suit complete with watch chain. He held several offices in both the Institute and the Cambridge Bowls Association until his death in 1939. Previously he had been chief compositor at the Cambridge Daily News for nearly forty years

Eric Ives has written from Taunton in Somerset with a picture taken by the News back in 1932-33 showing a gaggle of children with a Guy outside number 39 Cam Road, Cambridge - now Elizabeth Way. He writes: "The little lane circled the Willows which has since been drained and is now a housing estate. Behind us is the bungalow, in those days the home of the Banham family who owned the boatbuilding company on the Cam. One of the lads is almost certainly a Barker whose family ran the Fleur de Lis pub just up the road, and another is Paddy Bull who died tragically young and lived next door to Mrs Nunns sweetshop. Another of our contemporaries was Ken Thorn who went on to some repute in the music industry, first with the Vic Lewis orchestra and later as a composer for the 'Superman' films". Eric himself is second from the left and would be delighted to hear from any of the lads shown - ring him on 01823 335917 [SCAN]

Mrs Marian Brown from Cherry Hinton has also been sorting through ancient papers to come across a cutting relating to a gas explosion at number 29 Parkside, Cambridge in July 1933. "The force of the explosion was terrific, as in addition to the damage to the house, fragments of furniture were found in Parker's Piece", the paper reported. The whole of the front of the house was badly damaged and the occupant, an elderly lady, severely injured. She had been seen moving about the house with a lighted candle just before the explosion. Marian - then Summerlin - lived next door with her mother and father and remembers that the two houses were then made into one, a six-set lodging house. She writes: "The property was owned by Peterhouse so they took their undergraduate students. We had about 22 rooms. The students had a bedroom and sitting room each, because in those days students were mostly money people. My father was a College Servant at Peterhouse from when he was 12 years old until he was over 70. I'm sure many of the college staff remember William, my father but I wonder if many people remember how hard the college landladies worked many years ago and their dinners and parties they had in their rooms.” If this rings a bell with you please let me know.

And can anybody help Ruth Woodhouse from Old Harlow, Essex, who is also delving back into the old days. There is no point asking if anybody recognises her great-grandfather, David Daniel Parr, because the old picture she has shows a staff outing to Clayhithe in 1882! But can you help with information about the firm, named as R.F. Leach of City Road, Cambridge. The directories describe the firm as “art workmen in stained glasss, painters, writers, gilders, decorators and cabinet makers” him as a painter and decorator with a shop in St Mary’s Passage. Don Unwin from Cambridge has just caught up with a pile of Cambridge Evening News passed on by his brother-in-law – only this time they’re relatively recent issues. Amongst them he spotted a picture of F.L. Unwin’s Joinery Works at Histon, and on it was his cousin, Frank Unwin the boss. Don writes: “When I got married in 1947 my Dad took me to see if he could help with finding a place to live. He had a building plot in Histon and in 1950 we were able to move in too a newly built house. After I had got my workshops fitted up I used to go and help him with engineering jobs, including jigs for the elevators. Frank was an ingenious man, working out special machines or gadgets to speed up or ease production. At one time he was worried by the new mass production joiners who could make thousands of doors or windows far more quickly than he was able to do. However it turned out well for him as in an order for the joinery for a large housing project the architect would include some components of a special type or size which were nothing but a nuisance to the mass producer. They subcontracted these to Frank who set about devising machines to produce these quickly and at the right price. The numbers were small for mass production but large enough to be worth while for Frank. One particular machine I remember was that for making staircases of any angle, length and tread size”

Two of Cambridge’s main bridges are being repainted at present, both of which have seen major reconstruction work within the last few years.

Magdalene Bridge – the Great Bridge – has been a cause of controversy for hundreds of years, ever since the river was first bridged, probably by the Danes. Whatever the bridge looked like then it was in such disrepair in 1276 as to be impassable. In those days it was the duty of the Sheriff to keep it in good condition, but he preferred to keep the money and establish a ferry instead – from which he took more income. And just to be sure the ferry kept in business he ordered his prison keeper to remove any planks from the bridge by night. When the news of his activities got out there was a considerable hue and cry and Commissioners were appointed to keep the bridge in a good state of repair. But from time to time the crossing was interrupted; in 1594 great floods swept the bridge away, in 1608 it was “much decayed and perilous to all passengers” and in 1754 needed rebuilding.

At that time a young architect was making his reputation. James Essex is well-known in Cambridge for his college buildings but is probably most famous for the wooden ‘mathematical bridge’ at Queens’ built between 1749 and 1750. So it was Essex who in 1754 was commissioned to build the new Magdalene Bridge at a cost of over £2,300. This enormous sum saw the removal of the previous old wooden structure and the construction of a new stone bridge. But although the wooden bridge at Queens is a triumph, his Magdalene

Bridge was a disaster. It was criticised for being too narrow and by 1798 was ‘in decay and ruinous’. In 1813 it was closed whilst repairs were undertaken, but it was all no use and in 1822 the decision was taken to pull it down and erect a new bridge, this time of iron. In June 1823 Essex’s grand stone bridge was closed to traffic for the last time – carts would have to use Silver Street instead; people moaned about the inconvenience, demanded a temporary bridge & then complained that it was taking far longer than planned to pull down the stone bridge. But the new bridge was opened on time, and on budget. [PLEASE FIND PIC OF QUEENS BRIDGE FROM LIBRARY; SCAN OF STONE BRIDGE]

The cast-iron bridge was of an extremely revolutionary design for its time and included ornamental railings cast by the Finch foundry in Cambridge. Their strength was tested in 1929 when a motor car crashed through them and hung over the river. By then the whole bridge was carrying far more traffic than ever intended and soon planners were talking about widening the road on either side to make a new thoroughfare straight into the heart of the town. In 1953 Magdalene Bridge was restricted to 12 tons but by 1967 there was a two-inch dip in the centre and buses & lorries were banned and the Government announced plans to replace it by 1971. [SCAN OF IRON BRIDGE BEFORE REPAIR, SCAN OF TRAFFIC 1960S]

But at a public inquiry into the scheme supporters of the old bridge forced a rethink. In 1972 came news that the bridge was to be preserved and strengthened. Once more it was closed to traffic, once more there were calls for a temporary bridge – and this time it came, with a Bailey bridge erected alongside. When it reopened in 1982 the costs had risen from an original estimate of £50,000 to some £545,000. But for that Cambridge kept one of its architectural treasures. [SCAN OF BAILEY BRIDGE 1981 – NB ORIGINAL PIC IN NEWS LIBRARY]

Four years later in 1986 another of the city’s great iron bridges was found to be rusting away. It had been in September 1889 that operations began to build Victoria Bridge. The Engineers appointed were Messrs Webster of Liverpool and Waters of Cambridge, the contractor John Mackay of Hereford. The superstructure was to be of iron and steel, its main ribs wrought iron plate capable easily of taking the weight of two traction engines with a roadway of 26 feet - ample room for the two widest vehicles to pass with ease. It was to use local materials where possible, to employ a number of local men, be completed within 10 months and the cost, including the road across the common would be £10,000.

But the planned 10-month construction period became extended to 15 and it was 11th December 1890 before the great opening ceremony could be performed. The proceedings were scheduled to start at noon but council business delayed the departure of the official procession of 13 carriages from the Guildhall by half an hour. They proceeded to the start of the new road where a silk cord blocked their route. The Mayor and the Chairman of the Chesterton Urban District Council formally untied the bow, named ‘The Victoria Avenue’ and, to only feeble cheers from a few spectators, proceeded slowly towards the bridge.

Here they found hundreds of onlookers chilled by the weather and impatient at the delay, and another silken cord. The Chairman declared the bridge open, the Mayor named it and together they pulled at the rope from which dangled a bottle of champagne, intended to smash against the parapet in the traditional way. Sadly it was not to be - the bottle merely swung tamely and eventually had to be hurled by hand. The cheers that rang out were feeble in the extreme, the contingent of police had no disorder to contain except for a restive horse who contrived to break the shaft of his carriage. The official party walked across, then rode across and returned to the Guildhall, having duly declared the Victoria Bridge well and truly open. [SCAN OF OPENING VICTORIA BRIDGE]

They left behind a remarkable monument to forward thinking - a bridge designed before the age of the motor car that was to carry the weight of heavy lorries. By 1986 it was found to be rusting away and in need of urgent repairs which took as long to complete as the Victorians took to build it. [SCAN OF VICTORIA BRIDGE REPAIRS]

Lynda Robinson has written from Coates, near Whittlesey about the Milton Road School May Queen ceremonies in the 1950s. She knows about what went on, because she was there and took part, and now she is continuing the ceremony at her village primary school. But there's one thing she can't quite recall – what was the title of the music that was played when the Queen and her courtiers made their procession. Lynda says it was the first classical music to really impress her. If you can remember it please let me know.

I have now learned more details about Colin Lunn, the tobacconist, in response to the enquiry from Terry Waters who found a piece of pottery on the bed of the river Ribble at Clitheroe marked "Colin Lunn & Son, Cigar Importers, 3 Bridge Street Cambridge". It seems there were shops in Oxford and Cambridge, the former business being owned by a brother and all the Lunn males had the middle name of Colin. The firm was established some time before 1899 as an old tobacco advertisement quotes the Caledonian Mixture as being "first produced in 1870". In the 1930s their Bridge Street shop near the corner of Jesus Lane was lost to the developers, another in Trinity Street was closed during the war due to limited supplies. The King's Parade branch was opened in 1899 by A.J. Littlechild, then aged 19, who, apart from war service, ran it until his death in 1949. In the 1950s the branch moved from number 15 to 20, finally closing in 1990, the last of the real University tobacconists [SCAN OF KINGS PARADE 1930S]

Ray Jude from Saffron Walden wonders whether anybody remembers the old Youth Hostel Association building at Witchford, they were old Nissen huts with a connecting corridor about a quarter of a mile long – the warden rode a motorcycle in it. David Meacock has contacted me to ask if anybody can confirm a visit to Cambridge by the American humorous writer, Mark Twain. David was reading W.H Barrett's "Tales from the Fens" and noticed Enid Porter's introduction in which she writes: "Mark Twain, a prince of story-tellers was staying in Cambridge after a nervous breakdown, & advised by friends to visit the Fens to complete his recuperation. He stayed at the Ship Inn at Brandon Creek where Mr Barrett, with other boys, was a recipient of the sweets which the generous stranger, in his ten-gallon hat, handed out to the local children who followed him everywhere he went. Many a Fen tale Mark Twain heard and relished during his stay. On one night he was entertained to supper at the inn followed by a long session of story-telling by a group of Fenmen specially chosen for their excellence in the art. At the conclusion of the festivities Twain showed his appreciation by giving his hosts a story of his own, a very 'tall' one, designed to cap all those he had heard that evening". David has contacted the Mark Twain Project at Berkeley and they "can neither confirm nor deny this story" although they certainly have their doubts about the "ten-gallon hat" that Twain reportedly wore. Cameron Hawke-Smith, at the Cambridge Folk Museum, has sent him the text of the story that Twain was supposed to have told but is rather dubious as to its authenticity. So can anybody shed extra light. If so let me know [SCAN OF SHIP INN, BRANDON CREEK, c1890]

Charles Marr from Barrington has been reminiscing about a period of tremendous change down on the farm. But he has not been delving back into the 1800s but just the last few decades. His grandfather came down to Malton, Cambridgeshire from Yorkshire in 1900 and the family have now farmed the area for four generations. In 1963 Charles' father bought Trinity Farm at Barrington and by 1978 they had about 300 acres of land, which was then a medium-sized holding, now they farm 430 acres and that counts as small. Until the 1970s they kept cattle and pigs as well as growing a range of crops – “many was the time that along with my father and brother we mucked out the cattle and pigs over Christmas”, he recalls. But then they decided to concentrate on the arable side, including oilseed rape to replace sugar beet on heavy land.

Yields improved due to better varieties, better control of grass weeds and the use of fungicides to combat disease. Fertiliser started to be delivered on pallets, instead of bags – “it was strange how everybody on the farm disappeared when a couple of 20 tonne lorries of fertiliser turned up!” But then carrying bags of corn had always been a problem, Charles recalls: “I’m not sure which was worst about the bags – the weight, or putting your hands up behind you to pull a bag onto your shoulders and finding that a cat had done a whoopsy on top and it had just gone down your collar”

Mechanisation was slowing increasing in importance: “Many a time I’ve seen crawlers used to tow tractors and trailers across rutted headland. We often used to start work in the middle of the night on frosty nights to be able to travel across the land – and as a consequence of the damage done to the fields in wet times I’ve also seen two crawlers connected by a chain needed to plough across a field looking like a battlefield”. As mechanisation improved so tractors gained cabs – though in the early days they weren’t sealed and so were noisy and hot. They also increased in size; when Charles came home from college in 1978 the largest tractor they had was 90 horse power, by the end of the 90’s it had nearly doubled to 170 hp.

But as mechanisation has increased so manpower has fallen. In the 1960s they employed about 10-12 men on 700 acres, by the end of the 1970s they had five men on 1,000 acres. In 1978 Charles left the land at Malton and was farming Trinity Farm – 330 acres with the help of one man, then shortly afterwards he was on his own. He estimates that by April 2000 there were only some seven people employed in agriculture in Barrington, with significant chunks of land within the parish that are farmed from away. This is a trend that he thinks will continue – “I already know several villages where very little of the land is farmed from within the village – large company farms with maybe one man per 1000 acres or more who come rushing in with large machines and rush out again a few days later.

“Maybe Barrington is not so far away from that scenario and who will take a tractor down to pull cars out of ditches on the green then, or run a snow plough over Haslingfield Hill and clear other roads out of the village when the council think that there is not enough snowfall to be worth coming out for, but the drifts are over a foot deep?”, he asks, adding: There are more people employed in computers in Barrington now than in farming. But Barrington’s sole farmer produces enough wheat to feed about 3,643 people a year. According to his calculations it cost somewhere between £70 - £85 to produce a tonne of wheat in 2000, and he was getting £60 a tonne for it. But that was in the good old days – prices have dropped a lot since then!

Charles Marr publishes a regular farming diary in Barrington parish newsletter and is happy to talk to groups; he can be contacted at Brock House, 19 Orwell Road, Barrington, phone Cambridge 870385. Mrs Joy Reid from Godmanchester was looking at a picture she bought from Willingham sales some years ago and realised she had got even more of a bargain that she appreciated. Mrs S. Cann from Cambridge has also come across a mystery photograph. It shows William Woolston, the father of Stanley Woolston the antique dealer, who came to Cambridge in the early 1880s. He was manager of the Singer Sewing Machine branch and had a shop in Sussex Street for a short while selling second-hand cycles and sewing machines. About 1907 he had a shop at number 14 Lensfield Road when he was selling antiques; his son took over about 1912, though William returned to work whilst Stanley was away in the war. But her problem is that she does not know where this particular snap was taken. It's very faded but it certainly seems to show knick-knacks in the window. I suspect it is Sussex Street since the steps and the bars on the basement windows look very much like those in this photograph of the street before redevelopment in the 1920s. But can anybody help? [SCANS ATTACHED]

Michael Knights from Cambridge has been able to solve a mystery that has been puzzling Lynda Robinson since her childhood – what was the music played at the Milton Road School May Queen ceremony during the 1950s. He remembers the processional music being Handel's "Berenice", but then adds: "I can remember Jack Frost being banished, then would enter a girl who would usually be a fourth-year, as the 'Spirit of May' who, along with chosen girls as flower fairies, would dance to Elgar's 'Chanson du matin'. We would take flowers on the morning for the school hall to be decorated in time for the afternoon May Festival. Each class in the Junior School would either do a short play or sing a song or dance. I can recall a Maypole rigged up in the hall for the class to dance round. Although it was nearly 50 years ago, when I hear those pieces of music I still think 'Milton Road May Day'!"

As the firemen call off their planned strike it is worth remembering that various villages once had their own fire pumps back. One such was Hinxton where Sarah Stutter, tenant of the Manor Farm, left £100 to the parish in 1830 to buy a fire engine, which was used at a fire in 1882. In October 1921 a disastrous fire involving the whole of the summer's harvest broke out on the farm of Mr J. Coxall. It was supposed that a spark from a thrashing engine set fire to a stack. As the nearest water was about a quarter of a mile away the would-be-helpers were much handicapped. Fire Brigades from Duxford Aerodrome and Saffron Walden were called upon. These with the local firemen did their best but without avail, as the fire had such a strong hold. In addition to the many stacks, the drum, chaff cutter, straw pitcher etc were all demolished, as was also a tractor and straw stack in the neighbouring barn. Villagers remember that the Hinxton fire pump was operated by two men on either side and when it was needed John Page rushed to Hinxton Hall to get Mr Robinson's horse to pull the appliance to the scene. The pump was shared with Ickleton and was eventually sold off, though the engine house still stands near the church & is now used as a garage. Tony Botchie has sent me the technical specification for the 'Green Goddess' fire engine from a Home Office book of 1956. Did you drive them when they were the latest technology – drop me a line

As Christmas approaches we are being exhorted to purchase this or that video to keep ourselves and our children amused during the long Festive afternoons when there is nothing on the television except an old James Bond movie or the latest compilation of musical hits.

But what about a video devoted to Road Safety?

In 1947 the Cambridge Accident Prevention Council produced a film pointing out the potential for accidents within the home and stressing the rights and wrongs of road usage. Not something to hold the attention one might think – but in fact it is gripping.

The film was scripted by Cambridge Chief Constable B.N. Bebbington and photographed by Mr W. King. It starred Nelson Litchfield, May Wells, Ruth Quick, Richard Wells and Bruce Bebbington as the Wright family. They live in a nice, detached house, in the Gilbert Road area of Cambridge. Each morning they rise in good time, father shaves, mother cooks the breakfast which they enjoy as a family, before they set off for their day. Son heads off in his Perse School uniform, father drives off in his little car and daughter waits on her bicycle for her friend from the nearby house.

By contrast to the Wrights, the Rongs are in a muddle; the milk-boy catches mother in her dressing gown, fag in mouth. The youngest daughter dashes round, bumping down stairs, disturbing her sister who is day-dreaming about her piano lesson as she makes her way to school in Parkside, arriving late to the annoyance of the other girls. Father leaves the washbasin in a filthy state – and a razor blade in the soap. Mother burns the bangers – and Ralph Brown, Gwen Pauley, Jean Rolfe, June Pettit and Peter Power obviously enjoyed their performances. But the actors are not the stars and nor are the details of home life at that time, the furniture, the cookers, the food on the table – things that just never usually get shown.

The stars are the ordinary people of Cambridge; for as the action unfolds and the camera follows the youngsters on their bicycles around Mitcham's Corner, Victoria Road and East Road there are numerous glimpses of everyday life, of milk floats and shop fronts. Mr Rong revs up his car in the garage, causing clouds of exhaust fumes, before backing across the road and tearing off to work at Shire Hall. Nor is his navigation much use for he seems to go along most of the central streets, past the policeman on point duty in Sidney Street, down Petty Cury and Trinity Street – two way traffic in those days. It all gives good practice with the video freeze-frame as you stop the tape and try to work out just where he is now!

Mrs Rong goes shopping for hats but is it in Eaden Lilley or Joshua Taylor, and surely it's Sainsbury's old shop that tempts Mrs Wright. Then when things go wrong – as inevitably they do – the action switches to Addenbrooke's Hospital – and did nurses really wear such elaborate caps?

The dialogue and musical score will not win any Oscars, but 'Wise and Otherwise' is a tremendous evocation of a Cambridge and a way of life that so many people will remember. And then it gets better, for a second feature, 'Horse Sense' does it all again, only this time in colour, with even more faces to spot as we search for an elusive horse that has wandered off from his Barton Road stables. There is a particularly interesting sequence of children attending a film at the Tivoli in Chesterton Road which gives ample scope for recognising faces. And of course there is the underlying message about road safety which was the reason for the films in the first place. "Wise and Otherwise" has been copied on to video by the East Anglian Film Archive, University of East Anglia, Norwich NR4 7TJ and sells for £10, plus £1 postage. It will keep gran, and auntie and the kids quiet for an hour at least and help the Archive fund its continuing work of preserving old films.

Erica Dimock captured something of the character of the area in 1963 when she ventured along Milton Road for one of her 'Down Your Street' articles. In the years immediately around the Second World War the road had been engulfed by new estates but people could remember when the houses stopped about half way along the road and you were then surrounded by open fields. They painted a picture of cornfields and allotments at the school corner, with a dusty track leading through them to a farmhouse in Gilbert Road. But by 1963 modern pavements had replaced rough country paths, buses, cars and lorries succeeded horses and traps.

On football days Milton Road and all roads off were lined with cars and in the summer months traffic making for Hunstanton streamed along it. There had been plans for a bridge over the railway track to prevent traffic from piling up when trains were due. This had never materialised but there was the subway which eased congestion, at least when it was not flooded after heavy rain.

In 1963 Mr S. Stokes was the crossing keeper; he described the track as fairly busy – it was after all the main Cambridge-Peterborough line. Over his 15 years of service he had seen the army camp just beyond the railway line disperse & watched an electric blanket factory go up and expand.

Amongst the firms in the area was Camlab Glass, laboratory furnishers and scientific glass blowers who had recently moved from Burleigh Street. Hammer Tyres stocked all makes and had contracts with haulage firms, whilst Stokes of Cambridge employed over 100 people maintaining army camps and airfields as well as supplying giant tractors to help farmers with heavy work such as draining and heavy cultivation.

Erica surveyed the pubs, the Golden Hind, built in 1937, its architecture modelled on outline of part of the Tollemache family seat at Hemlingham, the Milton Arms with its own chickens and vegetable garden and the Portland Arms alongside King and Harper's petrol station near the Cambridge City Football ground

She also turned her attention to the shops, many converted from old cottages, although one of the first, that of A.A. Francis had been replaced by a modern grocery and provision store of J. Farrow. Mr R.S. Vincent who ran a fruit, vegetable and grocery store, had gone to a private school for boys and girls run by Miss Lucas at no.42 Milton Road, whilst no.37 had once housed a maternity home. Milton Road School with its junior and infants departments then under the respective headships of Miss B.H. Pratt and Miss E. Attwood, welcomed a lot of children from overseas who went there whilst their parents were working at the University. Many of the children flocked to Cherry's sweet shop at the corner of Arbury Road where Miss Lucy Farren had served generations of kiddies. On and on Erica went mentioning shop after shop – Newell's, Rolfe the chemist, Newbon's dress shop, Smith's shoe repair shop, even a Co-operative Society supermarket. There was the Milton Road branch library and one of the latest additions to the streetscape, St Laurence's Roman Catholic Church.

All in all Milton Road residents had little to grumble about. It was an interesting road with wide pavements, two very convenient sets of shops, and an adequate bus service either into the city centre or for a trip to the countryside which was still quite close, despite all the building of the previous 20 years.

If the East Anglian Film Archive video doesn't keep you glued to your seats then a book by Lionel Webb just might – especially if you ever worked for Ciba-Geigy at Duxford. He has just produced a history covering the first 70 years of the firm that began as Aero Research and is now Vantico. It's a book about products and projects, such as work with Donald Campbell and his 'Bluebird' team in 1960 or that advertisement in 1982 when they stuck a Cortina to a billboard. There are pictures of celebrities and of the families of the workforce – perhaps you spot yourself amongst this photograph of energetic girls in the firm's sports day in early 1960s. The book is being launched at a 'Pensioners Evening' at Duxford tonight, and if you'd like a copy then contact Lionel Webb on Cambridge 843964. [SCAN OF GIRLS RACE EARLY 1960S]

Memories 1st January 2003, by Mike Petty

Its just 25 years ago next Saturday that Newmarket was devastated; more than 100 homes were damaged, cars were overturned and the station signal box wrecked, when a tornado with winds equal to a hurricane force 10 cut a two-mile swathe through the town. Firemen, then in the middle of a strike, turned out to deal with the emergency, police reinforcements were drafted in from Bury St Edmunds, and the News sent a team of reporters to the disaster zone.

They came back with eyewitness accounts from the Crockford Park Estate with its smashed windows, flattened fences and slate-less roofs. At No.12 St John's Avenue 14-year-old Gary Blinston was indoors with his younger brother and sister: "My little brother said, 'The caravan is going over'. I looked out of the window and saw a tree blown into the air. My little sister locked the door and took cover", he recalled. Nearby Stewart Grainger, aged 15, was in bed when the window blew in; his bed cover was cut by glass but he escaped unhurt; he had a second lucky escape when he went into his parents' bedroom and was narrowly missed by the attic trapdoor which had blown in.

The Newmarket Bloodstock Agency was severely damaged, a 10 ft flint wall was destroyed and large plate-glass windows damaged. An executive meeting was in progress when, as Roger Booth recalled: "It got very dark. There was a funny noise and then the windows blew in. There was glass and bricks and plaster everywhere. We just dived for the floor and tried to cover our heads. It was like a bomb going off". A string of racehorses was just arriving when the storm struck; trainer Ronald Sheather was leading the first of the six animals: "I thought it was a bomb exploding in the station yard. There was a cloud of dust, bricks and bits of wood thrown around. But the horses were very good and we had no difficulty getting them into their stables". His wife and son were upstairs in their home at Paddock Drive when the storm hit: "There was thunder and lightning and the windows shook, then I saw the summer house which had been in the garden float past the window", Audrey Sheather said.

One end of a house in St John's Avenue was damaged to such an extent that the occupants were advised to move out – the roof was lifted off and then came back down again, with tiles falling through the ceiling and windows blown out by the wind. Ron Ranner from Clare Place said: "Fences were flying through the air and tiles were piling up outside. It was a most frightening experience and was really five minutes of sheer hell". Nearby Arthur Smith, a market trader, had a narrow escape when a pane of glass landed on top of the eiderdown just moments after he had got out of bed.

In Duchess Drive ten houses were badly damaged when the hurricane toppled trees lining the road, crushing a car parked in the driveway of no.69.

The centre of nearby Ashley also found itself in the tornado's track; Colin Smith who ran the general stores had his own home damaged and a tree crashed down on two of his vans, but, with his brother, he dashed around the village to see if he could help others. He found garden walls and chimneystacks wrecked, trees blown over and roofs virtually stripped. Electric cables were brought down and there were sparks everywhere. Engineers were drafted in to restore supplies, but sixty people were without power for up to eight hours.

But it was Newmarket station area that suffered most. The Coronation Hotel, which was just preparing to reopen after the Christmas break, was badly damaged and promptly closed again. The licensee, Mr Vin Waterfall said: "The back door blew open and I tried to pull it shut but the wind was too strong and all the windows blew out". At the Carrington coal depot two men tried to take shelter in a wooden hut; depot manager Basil Moss was talking on the phone when the wind started: "It was like a black wall. Bricks and tiles started flying past". Part of the hut collapsed, a window came in, cutting the face of Ronald Goldsmith, and heavy equipment in the yard was blown about. Mr Moss's car was turned around by the wind and all its windows broken.

Peter Greco was on duty at the signal box when the tornado struck. Virtually every pane of glass in the box was smashed as the wooden building was moved 18 inches on its base, and the clock stopped at 9.23 am. He was sent home suffering from shock – but not in his own car - his three-wheeler vehicle had been overturned and smashed against the wall of the signal box by the wind

Geoffrey Spencer, who now lives in Littleport, was the area inspector for British Railways at the time, and quickly put in arrangements to allow the trains to be kept running, with the points being worked manually. Next day a mechanical digger was brought in to reduce the rest of the wooden signal box to a heap of torn timber. Mr Spencer has kept a file of newspaper cuttings, one of which shows him outside the wrecked signal box with local MPs Francis Pym and Eldon Griffiths turned out to make their own assessment of the damage on a day that many in Newmarket will never forget.

If you remember it, please let me know.

Mrs Margaret Mason of Cambridge has kindly sent me a fascinating mixture of items she has treasured for a number of years, including a photograph of the St Giles' cricket team taken on 28th August 1948 at the Trinity Hall ground. Most are named on the back of the photograph, apart from the player on the left of the back row, but the remainder are Peter Mason, Owen Hitchens, Fred Patman & Michael Rutman. The centre row comprises Cyril Hitchens, C.H.A. Edwards (captain), Gordon Lawrie and a gentleman whose surname I cannot make out Sydney D---. The front duo were Fred Buck and Jim Woolston. Can you fill the gaps. The items came in a paper back from Thrussell and Son, footwear specialists of Sidney Street, Cambridge – does this ring a bell. [SCAN OF CRICKETERS AND PAPER BAG]

The Addenbrooke's Hospital League of Nurses produce a quarterly magazine packed with news, views and reminiscences about hospitals, nurses and related items. The latest issue includes a snippet from Eva Kite (nee Noakes) remembering instructions from Sister Bowyer in the 1950's: "See to the flowers and the visitors and throw out the dead ones". Margaret Davies (Grey) recalls a night report on the Bowtell Ward: "One male patient with a skin condition and rather confused wandered into a lady's room in the night. He was much better this morning". Pat Fromans (Fox) remembers: "Being served 'dinner' - stew, veg & potatoes in the morning after night duty. Ugh! We were supposed to be in by 10 pm, but where there's a will ... there was a way to climb in."

More substantial memories of work on the casualty ward in 1953 come from Christine McNamara (nee Douce) "The outside world rushes at you often in a way never experienced on a ward. Mostly, however, it was 'Town and Gown' coming in with fairly routine problems. At that time there were still American servicemen at bases around the area. They preferred to handle their own social and medical matters, but inevitably, there were circumstances when the proximity of our casualty facilities might offer the only chance of saving a life. Particularly unpleasant were the brutal knife attacks, not all racially motivated. I had already come cross some of the, to me, strange ways and notions of the more remote fenland folk on the wards, but more surprises were in store for me as I tended a badly burned young man one night. I learned later that it was customary for some to wrap up for the winter in larded brown paper or newsprint under combinations.

"At 5.00 am on January 31st 1953, I answered the telephone to be told by the Ambulance Service that the hospital was to stand by as a National State of Emergency had been declared, the sea had demolished defences all along the east coast and flooding was widespread. Three hundred square miles were flooded, over 300 lives were lost here and 1,700 in Holland in that North Sea storm surge. I was just twenty-one years old, alone a lot of the time, one never knew what might come in, but the ambulance men and police were marvellously supportive and you simply swung into action. Come the morning and report time, Sister Casualty had to be briefed and all had to be ship shape, including the huge brass knob on the outside of the entrance door. I had the feeling that, provided I cleaned that and buffed it up, anything else could hang!"

Memories 8th January 2003, by Mike Petty

Newmarket Road is not one of the most attractive areas of Cambridge – but without Newmarket Road Cambridge would have had no gas, no fire service, and no local newspaper – or at least so it was claimed back in 1963. But since then the gasworks have become a supermarket, the fire brigade has moved to Parkside, and the News has moved to Milton.

Forty years ago it was an area about to be transformed by wider roads, and there was talk about a new bridge across the river – the present Elizabeth Way. So the News sent its reporter, Erica Dimock to discover what was out there.

"Considered some years ago to accommodate some of the most squalid and unsightly houses in Cambridge, various efforts have been made to clear the local slums", she reported. "In other ways too Newmarket Road has been cleaned up. It is not so very long since patrolling policemen preferred to go in twos and threes, nor since local women were afraid to step outside their doorsteps after dark". Much of the trouble could be attributed to the excessive number of public houses, but many of them had been pulled down. It had several terraces of 19th-century cottages and a lot of small shops of considerable antiquity. The people living in the houses or running the shops were frequently members of families which had been on Newmarket Road for as long as they could remember and who never wanted to live elsewhere.

It was an area rich in history, with a Theatre – formerly the Barnwell Theatre Royal, then the Festival and by 1963 a scenery store. There was the Abbey Church, no longer in use, and the Abbey House – once thought to be one of the most haunted in the country, and the Abbey Stadium – all reminders of the great Barnwell Priory which had occupied the land right up to the Leper Chapel. The Hebron Pentecostal Church still held services throughout the week, but the old Methodist Chapel on the corner of Nelson Street had become Finbow's furniture removal firm, which had been established in Hooper Street 57 years earlier.

On the other side of Wellington Street John Brignell, the builders, had their Shakespeare Works – the name itself a reminder of the former Shakespeare Brewery, one of several of which The Star was the only one still working. In the early 1900s there had been 40 pubs on Newmarket Road; many had since closed, but the Burleigh Arms, Bird in the Hand, Corner House, Seven Stars, Dog and Pheasant and King George IV were amongst those still trading. A new one, The Racehorse, had opened in 1961 with a music group, the Jag Trio, attracting customers at the weekend. Trade was generally good anyway and there was a large pool of potential customers. Not far away was the Corona Works where some 60 men and women manufactured fizzy drinks whilst the great Pye Telecommunications works employed about 1,000 people and was the largest manufacturer of mobile radio-telephones in Europe. For those wishing to head off to foreign destinations, Derby Airways offered flights to the Channel Islands and Ostend from Marshall's Airport.

Two older properties attracted Erica's attention; one was the tollhouse, a rectangular building erected in 1828 to replace a much older structure, and itself extended. The other was the Papermills, an early 18th-century building with a mill attached which was once used to make paper. But Coldham's Brook, which provided the power for the mill, had been affected when the waterworks company extended their operations at Cherry Hinton, and the mill ceased.

Another industry was also then just a memory. Writing in 1977 Hilda Swann recalled the brickyards that had stretched along the road: "The sizeable lake along the edge of Coldham's Common, near Barnwell Bridge, was once a clay pit. Until about 1916 huts connected with the works were still visible at the bottom, sticking out of the water. There were four brickyards making hand-made bricks up to the 1930s. Watts and Co stood opposite Stanley Road & the Cambridge Brick Company was on the same side of the road. During the Second World War the pit was filled up by Mr Duce with old cars and the Coral Trading Estate stands on some of the site. The Stourbridge Brick Company was approached from Cheddar's Lane, on the opposite site of Newmarket Road. This brickyard faded out rather earlier than the other three. Near Barnwell Bridge stood Swann's Brickyard. The land extended to Garlic Row in one direction, Stourbridge Common formed another boundary and, years later, the pit was getting very close to the edge in one part. The other boundary was formed by the railway. All this land was bought by Cambridge Corporation, the pit was filled in with household rubbish and the buildings and house where we lived was bull-dozed down"

But the Gas Works were still there, down near the river so coal could be brought in by boat. In 1963 it was the largest contributor to the gas grid and covered an area of over 2,000 square miles. A new gas making plant which produced town gas from light petroleum distillate enriched with propane/butane and could also be used for the treatment of natural gas had been opened by the Mayor in 1961. With laboratories, garages, workshops and offices, there were about 340 employees who had their own bowling green and tennis court on the site.

Newmarket Road was also home to a Fire Station, on the corner of Coldham's Lane. It had been built in about 1943 to replace an earlier one in Gwydir Street and, together with the main fire station in St Andrew's Street, was shortly to move to Parkside. It had also housed an ambulance service, until they had moved to Ditton Walk in the 1950s.

Erica's survey goes on and on – Coopers who had built up their furniture business for three generations, having started with a horse and cart which toured villages loaded high with all sorts of odds and ends. Reynolds the Rock King had opened about 1882 and were still making their sweet and rock behind their shop, Watts and Sons timber importers and builders merchants and the Shipowners Refrigerated Cargo Research Association which did what its name suggests.

Now Caroline Biggs is busy collecting memories of the Abbey and East Barnwell area; for the last 18 months she has been interviewing local people and trawling through the old files of the News in an attempt to bring back the sense of community the area has lost. "It's fragmented by a major road, and people tend to be territorial about where they live. They do have a shared past and many of them aren't aware of this", she says. The results of her research, due out later this month, will hopefully encourage others to record their personal memories to share with future generations. As a spin-off to the project pupils at the newly-opened Abbey Meadows Primary School have been contributing to a booklet called 'Let Me Tell You About Where I Live', to be published by the school. [PICTURES FROM NEWS FILES; SCANS OF ADVERTS ETC.]

There is an Abbey Action newsletter which is packed with news and views about the area. For a copy, or to order 'Memories of Abbey', which should be out later this month, write to Abbey Action at the East Barnwell Community Centre, Newmarket Road, Cambridge CB5 8RS or ring Keith on Cambridge 517259

Michael Knights from Cambridge has responded to my request for memories of the Boys' Brigade; he writes: "I was a founder-member of the 3rd Cambridge Boys' Brigade, part of Arbury Road Baptist Church, when it started up in 1965 under the Captaincy of Mr Reg Gowman. The Girls' Brigade was established at the same time, so it was exciting days for the church. While all this was happening the existing church in Arbury Road was being added to by a beautiful new building to replace the original smaller church built in 1930, and the new church was opened in 1966.

"Both Boys and Girls brigades formally enrolled on Sunday, November 14th and marched to our enrolment at the Manor School, led by the 1st Melbourn Girls' Brigade Band. I served from 1965 to 1986 and fondly remember camps, displays, church parades and lots of friendship and fun by belonging to such a super organisation. In 1971 I completed Basic Training to become a Lieutenant and served 15 years as an officer, seeing many lads pass through the Company. I am still in the church, but 1997 saw the Boys' Brigade close. I was a guest at the last evening as I was at the first meeting in September 1965." [PICTURE FROM NEWS FILES]

Memories 15th January 2003, by Mike Petty

In January 1978 hundreds of bargain-hunters descended on Laurie and McConnal's store in Fitzroy Street for a once-in-a-lifetime sale. The shop had always provided bargains at that time of the year:

in 1950 it was coloured cotton sheets reduced from £2.18s.5d (£2.90) a pair down to just £2 that attracted customers, and as it was the first time shoppers could get sale bargains without having to exchange coupons they did great business. But Lauries was sure of a good trade over Christmas: "Parents who take their children to Laurie and McConnal will experience considerable difficulty in getting them out again. There are toys large and small, cheap and expensive, the sort of toys to keep, and the sort to give to the destructive child. They are also making a special feature of wireless sets this year, and have a large variety on show” said the News at Christmas 1923.

Back in December 1902 the paper had reported: “At the spacious premises of Laurie and McConnal, Fitzroy Street, readers can secure anything they require for a seasonable gift. A special showroom is set apart for the display of cards, pictures, books, toys, games etc and they have a choice selection of mechanical toys which are quite a novelty in themselves. There is also a variety of artificial grasses and plants which it would be difficulty to tell from real; these would make very pretty decorations”

Laurie and McConnal had opened in 1883, quite near another enterprise which, like them, was to dominate the area for a century. For one of the other shops in Fitzroy Street was the Co-operative, formed by a committee which had included three shoemakers, a carpenter, odd-job man and some mechanics. They had set up there in 1871 after two years in City Road, taking care to watch every penny – even chopping up the packing cases in which goods were received and selling them as firewood. By hard work they prospered and opened branches in Mill Road and Victoria Road, a bakery in James Street and in 1900 moved to a new store in Burleigh Street.

It was that year that Laurie and McConnal had almost faced extinction when fire broke out at the rear of their premises. An employee noticed smoke coming from stacks of brooms, a bag of feathers, a stock of confetti and other material in the cellar, probably caused by a match dropped by a passer-by. Their staff set to work to extinguish the blaze and by dint of the application of water from a line of buckets and from a hose attached to the water tap, the fire was practically extinguished before the arrival of the fire brigade.

But three years later they were not so lucky; on Friday 13th February 1903 fire ripped through the store. Once more the fire fighters rushed to the scene but in those days they had no fire engine they could bring – just six hose reel carts stationed at various parts of the town. With no pumping equipment they relied entirely on the poor mains water pressure and quite expected the whole of Fitzroy Street to be devastated. They considered wiring to London for an engine to be sent up by special train, but this would have taken too long. In the event the street was saved, though the shop was just a mass of blackened ruins.

But Mr McConnal was not one to accept defeat. He moved some of the salvaged stock to the garden of the house in which he was lodging, opened a temporary shop in Fair Street, accepted an insurance settlement of £22,650 and set to work constructing a magnificent new building. As trade increased throughout the 1920s and 1930s the store gradually expanded further along the street, adding to the range of merchandise sold.

When a new bus station opened just across Christ’s Pieces, in Drummer Street, more and more buses brought more and more shoppers into Cambridge. In the town centre there were major new shops in Sidney Street – Marks and Spencer and Woolworth and a greatly-expanded Boots.

But those who preferred the less frenetic atmosphere of Fitzroy Street could relax as they shopped. For Lauries had a roof garden specialising in sixpenny ham teas and even a bandstand from which the Cambridge Town Band would play for the entertainment of Saturday shoppers. For a while the Police Band was engaged but their woodwind instruments could not be heard in the street below. It was an idea reprised in June 1975 when the Kite Community Action Group arranged for eight members of a local jazz group to revive the tradition, but by then there was precious little to sing about.

In 1950 a town planning report had recognised the need for more shopping provision, but left open the question as to whether the new shops should come in the Petty Cury area or in Fitzroy Street. The City Council preferred the central site for shopping but the University favoured a regional shopping development alongside Lauries. Plan followed plan and as the arguments rumbled on so the Fitzroy-Burleigh area deteriorated. A survey in 1952 showed that 91% of the properties in the East Road area were worn out – they were over 100 years old and poorly constructed. As the slum houses were cleared the resident population who had originally supported the small-scale shops in the Fitzroy Street area was drifting away. Shopkeepers could not afford to modernise their premises, especially when they might soon be demolished if the long-talked-off redevelopment ever came to fruition, and the run-down shops attracted less customers. Then parking restrictions were introduced, adding pressure on the carpark at the back of Lauries, which never seemed big enough.

But Laurie and McConnal continued to emphasise their faith in the area by modernising their extensive frontage in 1965 and the Co-op increased its Burleigh Street floor area by 50%. But still the debate rumbled on. By 1970 a decision on the future of the Fitzroy-Burleigh area was no nearer than it had been in 1952. Even after the Lion Yard shopping centre had been built there was still talk of a second development in the 'Kite' area, which some supported and many opposed. Proposals and counter-proposals occupied hour after hour, month after month of debate until in October 1977 a solution seemed near.

But Laurie and McConnal could not wait and announced that they would close that December. The news shocked the city: "Filibustering in the council chamber has resulted in the loss of jobs for many people and the loss of a splendid business, Laurie & McConnal" claimed Coun Gough Goodman. Others saw things differently: "The news that Laurie and McConnal's department store is closing will have come as a surprise to most people", wrote the News' business correspondent, Nauntun Pugh. "But to anyone who regularly used the store it was only a question of time before they succumbed to the inevitable. Even at the height of the shopping day you could be the only potential customer in any one department. It had 50,000 square feet of selling space, spread over five floors to service, heat, decorate and keep full of merchandise and the passing trade had dropped off dramatically as so many houses have been knocked down and food shops have disappeared from the Kite area"

Whatever the reason the news of the closure devastated the staff throughout the store: "I think everyone is heartbroken", said Yvonne Cuff in charge of the fashion department, "It is a very sad thing for Cambridge"

Then in January 1978 the store reopened for the last time as the auctioneers moved in to sell off the fixtures and fittings. An oak-faced display stand sold for 50p, two mops and buckets raised £1.40, there were boxes of light bulbs and even a tin of toilet soap to be disposed of. Between 200-300 people came for one last look, most of them strangers, but a few of the old employees called in to pay their last respects as a giant of the Cambridge shopping scene passed into history.

Roydon Shelley from Bar Hill phoned me with his memories of the tornado that devastated Newmarket in January 1978. He was an engine driver on a diesel multiple unit two-carriage train travelling from Ipswich to Cambridge when he passed through the storm, The noise was tremendous and the wind so strong that it reduced the speed of the train by 20 mph.

Dr A. Juul from Copenhagen has also been in touch with an item of ancient railway interest which he discovered whilst reading the Memorials of the life of George Elwes Corrie, Master of Jesus College. The University had been worried by the arrival of the railway in Cambridge in 1845 and so the station had to be built far out in the surrounding fields. But six years later came a suggestion from the Great Eastern Railway Company that railway excursion trains should actually be allowed to stop at the station on a Sunday. This prompted Corrie, then Vice-Chancellor of the University to write: "Sir, I am very sorry to find that the Directors of the Eastern Counties Railway have made arrangements for conveying foreigners and others to Cambridge on Sundays, at such fares as may be likely to tempt persons who, having no regard for Sunday themselves, would inflict their presence on this University on that day of rest. I should be obliged therefore, by your making it known to the Directors that such arrangements as those contemplated by them are as distasteful to the authorities of the University, as they must be offensive to Almighty God and to all right-minded Christians”.

Memories 23rd January 2003, by Mike Petty

My reprise of Erica Dimock’s article on Newmarket Road (Memories 8th January) has stimulated memories for several readers

Mrs Pauline Anderson from Cherry Hinton Road writes: “I read you article with interest as I lived there between 1926 and 1947 and know it well. I went to school at the old Brunswick School which was then in Auckland Road and moved up to the new school in about 1927/8. No school dinners then, so we had to go home, which was Garlic Row”.

The Brunswick School in Walnut Tree Avenue was the first Council School when it opened in 1905. But by 1922 the building was found to be subsiding and had to be pulled down. The girls were relocated to temporary premises at Paradise Street School and the boys to Fitzroy Street until the new buildings which Mrs Anderson remembers were opened. [SCAN OF CORNER OF WALNUT TREE AVENUE, 1929]

She continues: “The Leper Chapel used to be used as a Sunday School by the students of Westcott House and I remember a young lad being christened there by the Bishop of Ely. There was no font so they used a bowl of water instead. The Church of St Andrew the Less, (the Abbey church) was used regularly for services and I was in the choir, it is one of the few churches where the organ has to be ‘pumped’. It was registered for weddings again in November 1947, and I know that is right because I was married there and was the first on the register”.

Charles Hall, one of the churchwardens has written to say that the term ‘Abbey’ is wrong; it was not an Abbey or even a Priory church but was built by the Barnwell priory for the good people of the hamlet of Barnwell for their own services in the 12th century. It might stand on the site of a small wooden chapel built by a pious Saxon called Godesdone and dedicated to St Andrew the Apostle and the correct title is ‘the Church of St Andrew Barnwell, commonly known as the Abbey Church’. It is still in use, with a candle-lit carol service just before Christmas. [CHURCH PICTURE FROM NEWS FILES]

Back to Pauline Anderson: “Where Wellington Street is the buildings stand back off the road as far as East Road and that piece was known as Sun Street. There were always a lot of disabled men waiting to go into the gas works in the 1920s/30s. Apparently there were wounded in the 1914-18 war and the Gas Works employed them. As well as the brickworks, drinks and woodworks two other places come to mind – the Brush Factory near Coldham’s Lane and the Slaughterhouse near Cheddar’s Lane”. [SCAN OF GAS WORKS LORRIES]

Mr R.J. Course from Meldreth was particularly interested in the picture of Papermills House; he writes: “My great grandfather and his family were the last to run papermills as a going concern. They were obliged to give up as the water supply gave up. Prior to that they ran the mill at Great Wilbraham, but were forced to leave there for the same reason. On leaving Papermills they bought a farm and built a house at Meldreth. There was an Auxiliary Fire Service fire station in Newmarket Road during the war, and another one in the old Corporation Storeyard in Mill Road”

Betty Clarke from Haddenham knows the area well; she lived at 151 East Road until 1958, one of a line of terraced houses near the corner of Nelson Street. A couple of doors away was a Hot Pea Shop and beside that the entrance to a Slaughter House which ran along the back of their garden and had another entrance in Nelson Street. Betty has a snap of Nelson Street showing the Slaughter House on the right and the Baptist Mission on the left. Shortly afterwards her family moved out & the drunks got in and set them on fire. Betty has lent me a snap of the row of houses in their damaged state, the 'x' marks her old home. She moved to North Arbury but came back to Staffordshire Gardens, across the other side of East Road in late 1961. [SCAN OF NELSON STREET – WOMAN AND CHILD – AND EAST ROAD HOUSES AFTER THE FIRE]

This area of Cambridge is not one to attract the attention of University academics, but in 1911 Canon H.P. Stokes decided to investigate the old parish workhouses of Cambridge, where the aged poor had been accommodated before the building of the new Mill Road Workhouse in the 1830s. He discovered that the workhouse for the parish of St Andrew the Less was still standing, with curious figures and gargoyles on the outside walls and large rooms inside.

After Mill Road workhouse had been built it had been altered and used for the reception of about 46 girls and boys but then in October 1838 it had been offered for sale, together with an adjacent piece of ground formerly used as the parish gravel pit with a frontage towards Norfolk Street. It stood in what had been known as Workhouse Lane but in his day was 8 & 9 Staffordshire Gardens. Even more exciting for him was that the person who lived there actually remembered it as a workhouse: The interesting house is now inhabited by a venerable and intelligent old lady, who carries her 94 years with much vivacity. She knew the place well in her childhood, and she laughingly remarks that she has come to die in 'the Workhouse'. She remembers Mr and Mrs Arnold, the former master and mistress of the institution, who used to allow her and a few children living in Covent Garden to play with the pauper boys and girls after they had finished 'their work'. She asserts that the building was erected 'for the purpose', and that it was larger than other workhouses (some of which were only altered cottages). She thinks that it was used 'for several parishes'. An old inmate of the Albert Almshouses remembers that services were at one time held in this Workhouse by various clergy; he himself often attended these gatherings.

Dr Stokes took a photograph of the property, with his elderly informant at the gate; he does not name her but in 1904 the property was home to William Diaper, a labourer. [SCAN OF STAFFORDSHIRE GARDENS WORKHOUSE EXTERIOR]

One of the other workhouses surveyed by Stokes was that of St Clement's Parish which stood on Castle Street, backing on St Peter's Street. Somehow he managed to gain entrance and took a photograph of the interior of the building, showing a lady reading her newspaper beside the stove, a candle on the table behind her. It is a picture probably never published before. [SCAN OF WORKHOUSE INTERIOR]

The new video of the Cambridge Accident Prevention Council's films 'Wise and Otherwise' and 'Horse Sense' (Memories 18th December) has brought this letter from Mrs Joan Barron of Cambridge: "I was amazed to read your article – I knew all the people who took part in it. They all belonged to the Rodney Dramatic Club. My father Jack Baker used to take me down to the rehearsals at the newly-reopened 'Little Theatre' in 1946 after the army had left it. It was situated behind the New Spring pub on Chesterton Road, next to the Tivoli, and years later I acted in plays with them. I also remember the row of shops opposite King and Harper. When we were met from Milton Road School we would often go to Longstaffs for flowers and fruit and the farmhouse cheese which used to be on a bench outside on a bed of straw.

You could see all the different shapes of the cheese or butter pat.” Joan has ordered a copy of the film from the East Anglian Film Archive in Norwich and is looking forward to reviving more memories.

It has taken Ken Thorn a little longer to get in touch – but then he is now in West Hills, California. News has got out to him about a photograph of children with a Guy Fawkes taken in the Cam Road area in 1932. It was sent in by Eric Ives from Taunton and was featured in Memories on 20th November. Eric had remembered the names of several of the kids featured, including Ken Thorn who had gone on to some repute in the music industry, first with the Vic Lewis Orchestra and then as composer for the Superman films. Now a scan of the picture is winging its way by e-mail to the West Coast of the USA. [SCAN OF GUY]

Memories 29th January 2003, by Mike Petty

On the night of Saturday January 31st 1953 in darkness and without warning disaster hit the East Coast. A combination of high winds and high tides swept away sea defences from Kent to Lincolnshire; the sea broke through, bringing widespread death and devastation. In a few hours 32,000 people lost their homes and 307 were drowned with damage estimated at £40m.

At Hunstanton the sea smashed a 90-yard gap through the sea wall on the South Beach leaving a trail of destruction, sweeping away nearly all the holiday bungalows on the mile-long beach connecting Hunstanton with Heacham - typical of what was happening throughout the area.

At Wisbech a severe northerly 113-mile per hour gale lashed the River Nene to record height on the Saturday night tide and water poured over the banks into the riverside streets and houses. Part of King's Lynn was flooded to a considerable depth, and 15 people were drowned.

The headlines of Monday's News took up the story:

Canvey is Isle of Horror, 100 bodies found, 400-500 missing. Dead in streets, on rooftops and trees

To a Britain shocked by the disasters of the weekend came the news today that the bodies over 100 people had been found in the Canvey Island (Essex) floods and that between 400 and 500 more were unaccounted for. The dreadful magnitude of the tragedy is becoming only too clear to rescue workers who see bodies – some young children – floating in the waters and others lying lifeless on roof tops with water lapping at their feet, and still more victims entangled among braches of trees – flung there by the might waves which engulfed the land.

The News sent its staff reporter, Charles Rudy, to see for himself. This is his report

“An elderly couple rummaging through the splintered remains of their bungalow home ... a luxury American car afloat in a field ... a factory isolated and knee-deep in flood water ... that is what the seaside coast of Norfolk looks like today. As I flew over the Snettisham-

Heacham-Hunstanton coastal strip in a Rapide aircraft chartered from Marshalls, the scene was one vast fiasco of scattered matchwood.”

For the first few minutes of his flight the view had been just the usual black, flat, wet fenland, but then the great Denver Sluice passed beneath them “Down there to the right of Denver Sluice the familiar black soil has vanished, acres of it. Workmen are toiling desperately to heal a 20-foot break in the side of the Ouse.” Soon those workmen would be joined by undergraduates, labouring to repair the damage caused when the high tide had spilled over the embankments for most of the 12 miles from Kings Lynn to Denver. The banks were breached in 13 places and 6266 acres were flooded.

“King’s Lynn lies straight ahead and so does the main railway line to Cambridge. But it lies awash at Watlington Junction. And flooded fields look like extravagant pools of water beside the station. A few minutes later: ‘There she is’. The observer points over the pilot’s shoulder, Shettisham, what’s left of it ... who’s the lucky guy with a converted railway carriage at the seaside?

“The sun smiles tragically on that devastated strip now left high and dry. The tide is out – and so is a part of a brown-timbered bungalow. It has been throttled and tossed and now it lies sadly on its side, a tattered curtain sighing in the wind. Two doors away the gale knocked and did not wait for a reply. The body of the building has gone and only the roof remains. The gust that snatched up the torso has dropped it again over a 30-yard stretch of field. This is something like a kiddies’ match-box toy-town ‘gone wrong’ after a vicious kick. There are folk down there climbing over the scanty foundation plants of their home. It is upside down and gutted to a skeleton status.

“We are flying now at 300 feet, and below us at Heacham two small boys look up and wave. Perhaps they are wondering if they could build a raft and float out to that Morris Ten bobbing up and down ... The larger buildings on the beachside seem strangely unscathed – but what is there left of that bungalow community? Very little but a gaunt and dismal graveyard of shattered woodwork. People are pulling at the planks of a converted railway carriage. It lies there with a broken back amidst a pile of wooden struts that look fit for chopping up. Another bungalow has survived the havoc but the front door has vanished. More cars ‘at sea’, more wooden litter, more and more wreckage ... and the sea laps daintily beside it all in great irony.”

News filtered in: one Cambridge lady, Marjorie Rappaport, had spend a night of terror in her holiday home, a converted boat at Heacham; she had to clamber on to the roof where she was joined by two Americans and their wives who had been duck shooting. She told the News: “That roof was the only thing above water – we were in the middle of a raging ocean. We tried to signal for help with two oil lamps and by firing guns, but the great waves and the noise drowned everything. Our bungalow was the only one which held together, yet it was washed a quarter of a mile from its original site. Every other residence around it was completely demolished and five people living almost next door lost their lives. When the tide started to go down we waded through and were met by rescue squads who took us to a rest centre”.

Harry Hagger and his wife had moved to Heacham from their home in Union Lane, Chesterton, 18 months before. He had been Commissionaire at the Rendezvous Cinema in Magrath Avenue, but this was more dramatic than any movie. He described his experiences on the night the sea came in: “It was a terrible. We felt a lot of bumping about and heard grating noises. When daylight came we found ourselves on high ground, safe and the bungalow all intact.”

All around the coast people were experiencing similar trauma; homes collapsed at Sea Palling, a thousand houses flooded at Great Yarmouth, three thousand were homeless at Harwich – the suffering was appalling, something had to be done.

The Women's Voluntary Service was in the front line; they already had stocks of clothing prepared for just such emergency but as soon as news of the disaster became known gifts of clothing began to pour in to their offices.

Cambridge was one of the principal distribution centres but so many lorries laden with parcels from Scotland, Wales and other parts of the country, converged on the city that they had to be diverted to avoid blocking the roads. Cambridge station sidings were filled with wagons containing relief material. The St Regis building in Montague road was already full by the first evening and old hangars at Madingley were taken over, trestle tables and racking borrowed and the unpacking and sorting started. The clothes were sorted into men's, women's, boy's, girl's and under-fours and all this needed an army of helpers. All the helpers had to be fed and at Madingley teams of WVS ladies cooking on Soyer boilers provided elevenses, a midday meal, tea and soup and sandwiches at night to the volunteers. They also fed the workers in other Cambridge depots as well, using insulated containers and tea-urns. In ten days 1,675 people were fed this way.

But still the gifts of clothing came in and in, with unpacked parcels reaching the high roof of the Madingley hangar. When all had finally been dealt with one remained stuck in the girders and had to be shot down with an air-gun as it could not be reached. The parcels were then distributed to where they were needed with many undergraduates driving lorries or even using their own cars for the purpose. Royal appreciation was expressed by the Queen Mother who watched undergraduates unloading the lorry loads of clothing before taking a beaker of tea - no sugar thank you - and moving on.

Other Cambridge people manned Food Flying Squads; they were the shock troops of the Ministry of Food's Emergency Feeding plans. Each squad consisted of four canteens, one food stores van, one camp stores, one water taker, one motor cycle and a utility van. They could cook and serve soup, stews, tea and sandwiches and required a team of 30 to 40 people. The Cambridge squad left at 5.30pm on the Sunday night, February 1st, for Kings Lynn to help with feeding the homeless where it worked for five days, by which time the United States Army had set up static kitchens. One of the party, Mrs Hunter-Rioch told how washing-up had to be done outside, at times in sleet and snow – but it had been worth it, and they had even been visited by the Queen and the Duke of Edinburgh.

Twenty-five years later, almost to the day, the gales were back and Hunstanton's 110-year old pier disappeared, most of it finishing up at Heacham. The tides were at least a foot higher than those which had devastated the area in 1953, but this time the coastal defences were better prepared beyond all recognition.

But for those whose holiday cottage beside the sea became a holiday cottage beneath the waves the memories of the great tide of 1953 will never go away.

Memories 5th February 2003, by Mike Petty

The snow that struck last week caused chaos as traffic skidded to a halt, roads clogged up – and the photographic files at the News were supplemented with more pictures of people manfully struggling in the blizzard conditions.

Memories this week is illustrated by a few of the pictures taken of earlier snowfalls around Cambridgeshire

Over the years journalists have reported the same story, time after time, month after month – but sometimes it can be hard to decide which date goes with which story as this selection may demonstrate. It is not comprehensive – can you supplement it with memories of your own?

1895, January- March

The great frost lasted from January to March unbroken except for very brief thaws. From January 18th to 25th there were snowstorms, floods & north-west gales; frosts of 15 to 20 degrees turned hundreds of acres of flooded land into skating rinks; for 2 months it was possible to skate from Cambridge to Grantchester or Ely. Three fields at Newnham were flooded & electric lights allowed skaters to flock there in the evenings; there were ice carnivals & skating races on river from Bottisham Lock to Ely

1900, February

The weather through the country continues to be very severe and in many districts traffic is almost at a standstill. In Huntingdonshire the drifts in many places were 6ft deep. The mail cart from Cambridge to St Neots got embedded in the snow and could not be moved. The contents had to be removed and carried some distance to another vehicle.

1908, April

Easter fell at the end of April, people planning a Spring break found the rooftops & ground carpeted with a couple of inches of snow with more large flakes falling. The fens lay covered to a depth of four inches whilst Huntingdon measured twelve inches and pronounced it the worst snow since the famous Easter storm of 1876. Traffic was disrupted although few actually went anywhere - the railways carried just 54 to Great Yarmouth, 75 to Huntingdon races and a scattering to Bury St Edmunds or Bishops Stortford. Everywhere trips to the country, or down the river were abandoned and those brave enough to venture into Cambridge itself did so with the certain knowledge that some wit would be sure to wish them Merry Christmas. Then at midday the sky cleared & the sun shone. Cambridge people were not to be fooled however & stayed in front of the fire – only to find the temperatures continuing to rise. At Ely a mini-boom of visitors climbed to the top of the Cathedral tower for a glimpse the snow-clad landscape. But it was to be May before the thaw came & the young folk of Milton had to be lifted over large snowdrifts before they could attend their village feast

1927, December

Snow began Christmas day & led to most complete stoppage of road & rail traffic since the coming of motor car. Many of the main roads in the county were blocked with snowdrifts from six to ten feet. Trains, motor buses and cars were held up and travellers stranded. The wheels of the mail vans were equipped with chains with the result that hold-ups were uncommon, though one van on the Histon – Milton road had to be dug out. A thatched cottage at Melbourn collapsed about seven o'clock in Sunday evening. The bedroom end of the house fell out, but, happily, Mrs Greig was in the bottom room and escaped injury. The Ortona motor buses had a terrible time in the blizzard. Two buses were stuck in snowdrifts out Newmarket way, one near Teversham corner, a Willingham bus on the Huntingdon Road near the Five Bells, a Caxton bus near Toft and a Saffron Walden bus near Whittlesford station, where they remained many hours. Another bus got nearly to Sawston before it got stuck and had to be dug out and the Fulbourn bus could only get as far as the Robin Hood, Cherry Hinton. Relief gangs were sent to the rescue of the stranded vehicles and they were being dug out and coming home one by one.

The snow was a major topic of conversation, even amongst senior Academics: With the extension of the Trans-Atlantic telephone service it was appropriate that the first "call" from Cambridge should be to one of the leading American universities. A room at Sidney Sussex College had been fitted up with plenty of receivers and the Vice Chancellor of Cambridge University and the President of Harvard exchanged greeting. Sir Ernest Rutherford then spoke to the President; he said: "We have snow on the ground in Cambridge. Have you also snow". "No I wish we had", was the reply.

Hardest frost for 35 years; the Cam frozen properly for the first time since 1894 & the Lent races postponed

1947, February - March

Bus passengers stranded when their vehicle ran into a 5 ft drift on the Harston-Fowlmere road, walked waist-high through the snow to another bus. A "Clippie" accompanied them. The 7.40 Premier Travel coach from Royston to Cambridge was stuck in the drift for 3 1/2 [three and a half] hours. A snow-plough called in to its assistance was itself stuck about 300 yards away. Several roads in the district were completely blocked. The worst local road, classified by the A.A. as "very dangerous" was the Cambridge-Huntingdon thoroughfare where the snow had been wind driven into three and four foot drifts. The heavy snow was later to melt quickly, causing extensive flooding in the fens

1950, December

Cambridge, along with practically every other town and village, presented a traditional Christmas-card picture with freshly fallen snow decorating the trees and hedges. The roads, however, were not quite so picturesque and once the snow had hardened on them they became very treacherous. Melbourn hill was completely blocked by three lorries across the road. Madingley Hill was another treacherous point, with cars unable to climb it and there were long queues also in the Girton road because they could not get a sufficient hold on a rising road

Sir – I would like to convey a word of thanks to the bus conductoresses who carried on so well during the snow, frost and fog of recent days. Those of us who usually sit near the door realise how very cold and miserable they must often feel standing on the platform for so many hours – the draught is terrific. One would think that a scarf around the ears would be more protection than caps, but of course the rule re caps may be very rigid – B

1951, January

The first day of 1951 saw England upholding its best traditions of variety as far as weather is concerned. When the bells rang in the New Year there was one degree of frost, then the rain came, followed by frost, then came a blizzard and a thaw. Anyone walking in the streets looked like a snowman within five paces. Traffic was brought to a standstill in Newmarket. Roads were icy and some cyclists found it impossible in some places to ride their machines.

1952, April

Burrough Green was cut off by snow and has been without milk since Saturday. The driving wind which accompanied the snow have created huge drifts around the village. Speaking by phone from the Post Office Mrs Walsh said: "We are completely snowed up. They tell us we shall be lucky if the road is cleared by this evening". The heavy snow has piled up on the rooftops and percolated beneath the tiles, causing considerable discomfort. Tiles have been ripped off roofs and people have been forced to move their beds downstairs. Everyone was busy shovelling snow.

Great blanket of snow, 24 degrees of frost [Dec 1962]

1963 January & February

The great freeze of 1963 was one of the worst ever. By early January, seven-foot deep snowdrifts blocked Cambridgeshire's roads, Cambridge's water mains had frozen and so had the river.

Cambridge itself was cut off for the first time in living memory, as were many villages. The city's police station became a hotel for people unable to get back to their rural homes. Bus services ground to a halt as diesel froze. Skaters turned out in their hundreds to explore the Backs and the commons. Others took their bicycles on to the river, secure in the knowledge that the ice was so thick it would easily bear their weight. The bitter conditions continued right through January and February and the Lent bumps had to be cancelled for only the second time in 136 years. Around Newmarket, the ground was covered in snow for an unbelievable 66 days. On the east coast, it was so cold the sea froze.

1975, April

Snow ploughs and salting trucks were fighting the snow-ice blanket which dropped over Cambridgeshire. In one of the county's heaviest falls the snow settled to two-inch-thick carpets on the major roads as county council emergency highway crews worked in darkness to keep them clear. Some of the worst affected roads were in the Haverhill area. Weather experts are reporting further snow falls today.

1975, June

1977, January

Heavy snow hit Cambridge as the worst weather for 14 years caused nationwide chaos and led to widescale disruption on the roads and railways. Weathermen say the snowfalls will be heavy and prolonged and warm winds could produce drifts. In many places there were snowfalls of more than one foot. Thousands of people were late for work as hard-packed snow, freezing fog and black ice made driving treacherous. And many trains were late or cancelled despite an all-night fight against the Arctic conditions by British Rail who called in their full cold weather emergency procedures.

1977, March

Motorists were caught on the hop today as snow spread across almost all of East Anglia. The A45 was blocked near Newmarket when a tanker crashed at the Red Lodge petrol pumps & an unladen tanker overturned near the Four Went Ways. The Chatteris to Ely road was almost blocked & at Haddenham a baker's van slithered across the road. Police say they have been inundated with reports of hold-ups and accidents. Villagers at Hardwick were still without electricity at lunchtime, 11 hours after power went off. Parts of Papworth and Eltisley are also without supplies.

Trapped in the snow

But for all the tales of hardship and people trapped in their vehicles there is still nothing to beat the epic experiences of Elizabeth Woodcock who was lost in the snow for eight days and nights back in February 1799

She had been shopping in Cambridge, pausing at the White Horse on Castle Street – now the County Folk Museum before setting off back to Impington just as dusk was falling. Snow was already falling and as she got near home she decided to take a short cut across a field. But her horse took fright at the snowflakes and she dismounted, intending to lead him. But the horse bolted, Elizabeth got disorientated and became lost and exhausted. She sat down under a hedge to rest - and got buried by the snow. Meanwhile the horse came home alone and her husband set out to search for her, without success. They searched the next day and the day after that. They thought she had been stolen by gypsies and would never be seen again - unless when the snow melted her body would be found murdered in a ditch. But then a shepherd noticed a handkerchief sticking out of a snowdrift - and heard Mrs Woodcock shouting at him. He dashed off and came back with men and shovels, together they dug her out. She had been trapped under snow eight days and nights, but was still sensible. They carried her home and called for the doctor. He put her to bed without delay & prescribed small quantities of weak broth – and no strong drink. But Elizabeth's plight attracted attention, people brought out prints and sketches, poems and rhymes all cashing in on her experiences and she had many visitors taking her stronger, more nourishing broth, and strong spirits. Her doctor persuaded her to take port wine and opium and she began to rally, but one by one her toes turned black and had to be snipped off. By April her general health had much improved, but the mutilated state in which she was left, without even a chance of being able to attend to the duties of her family was almost worse than death itself. Still the people came to see her, still they brought her hard liquor, and still Mrs Woodcock enjoyed it. She died on July 24th 1799 a victim of snow, frostbite, and hard liquor

The recent collapse of an old property at Whittlesford [PLEASE DOUBLE-CHECK IT WAS WHITTLESFORD – WAS IT BESIDE THE POST OFFICE] attracted headline news – it is not something that happens every day. [PIC FROM NEWS FILES]

There was one such collapse at The Grip, Linton in about 1913, which was recorded by members of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society, though they did not put the date on the back of the picture and I have not yet tracked down a cutting. But a comparison of the two pictures shows the importance of taking a pictorial record of places as they are now – one never knows when they might change. [SCANS OF HOUSE BEFORE AND AFTER COLLAPSE]

And then, just 75 years ago, there were two incidents within weeks of each other.

The last few days of December 1927 saw blizzard-like conditions; many of the main roads in the county were blocked with snowdrifts from six to ten feet deep. Trains, motor buses and cars were held up and travellers stranded. Perhaps because of the weight of the snow that caused a thatched cottage at Melbourn to collapse at about seven o'clock on a Sunday evening,. The bedroom end of the house fell out, but, happily, Mrs Greig, the occupier, was in the bottom room and escaped injury. She would not move however until the policeman came on Monday morning.

It was a story that would have worried anybody living in the old creaky, leaky-thatched-roof cottages which in those days were often in a very poor state of repair. But then less than three weeks later came news of another collapsed house:

“At day-break a four-roomed house at West Street Comberton suddenly collapsed while the occupants and their three small children were still in their beds. Both the upper and lower rooms at the north end, where they were sleeping, completely collapsed. One of the beds was precipitated partly into an adjoining yard and two of the ceiling joists fell heavily right between the two elder children sleeping in their beds. That they all escaped serious injury is a miracle. The greater part of the furniture was subsequently got out by willing helpers. Hundreds of people came and viewed the damage during Sunday.”

I summarised the report in my ‘Looking Back’ column and then a few days later I got a telephone call from Reg Course from Histon. Reg was one of the children sleeping in the bed when the Comberton cottage collapsed and he still treasures a cutting of the family’s plight that was published in the Cambridge Chronicle of 25th January 1928 - Reg is the curly-haired youngster on the left of picture four His father had thrown himself across the children to save them. The cottage stood next to a traction engine yard and it is thought that the vibrations may have weakened the house. [SCAN OF CAMBRIDGE CHRONICLE FEATURE]

READERS WRITE

Recent articles on Cambridge shops have brought some interesting letters.

Jack Smalley has written from Six Mile Bottom: “As the Director of Laurie & McConnal who was left with the unenviable task of closing the store, your article brought back memories, many happy, because there was some really good teamwork and camaraderie. But memories of the last days of the company were sad. Months of meetings and research took place to find ways of continuing, then some 200 redundancies had to be put into effect along with a major effort to find some new jobs for the staff. After the store was stripped bare I met prospective purchasers to show them round. They were miserable days.

“Seeing the photograph of the jazz band in the bandstand reminded me of amusing times. Shortly before that event I arranged for the Cottenham Brass Band to play in the bandstand which created much interest and publicity. Another light-hearted event was having Hughie Green, who was at that time the famous television presenter of ‘Opportunity Knocks’ to open our refurbished store. I met him in the University Arms and saw him into an open carriage before rushing back to the store to be there when he arrived. [SCAN OF HUGHIE GREEN PHOTO, PERHAPS NEWS PICTURE OF GREEN AT THE RE-OPENING – I WILL TRY AND TRACK ONE DOWN]

“Twenty-five years on it is always a pleasure to meet up with ex-Lauries people in the street and shops of Cambridge and Newmarket and also old customers who, without fail, bemoan the demise of the once-great store”

Reg Wood, who has moved from Saffron Walden to Bedford, receives his News by post, first thing every morning and reads it over breakfast. His hands are a bit arthritic and his eyesight’s not what it was when he first started taking the paper in October 1933 (making him probably our longest reader), but his memory is as clear as ever. He remembers the very earliest days of Woolworth’s in Cambridge: “My mother used to go to Cambridge on Saturdays. This particular Saturday she came home and told us about the new shop, Woolworth, where things were only 3d. and 6d; nothing over 6d, but things like stockings, socks and gloves were 6d each one. I remember she bought me my first pair of braces that day for sixpence.

I remember the shop well in those days, just one floor, dark brown painted counters with assistants in black dresses with accessories of red and fawn, and those on the sweet counters wore white dresses. It was always packed and when one went to Cambridge a visit to Woolworth’s was a must.

In the summer of 1927 I was staying with my mother’s cousin in Nelson Street when they had a special sale of rush bedside mats about 36x27 inches at 6d each (only one per customer). I went down with my cousin and bought one for my bedside. The range of goods was amazing. Full tea and dinner sets at 6d per piece, veg dishes at 6d and their lids 6d. Handsaws 6d, saw handles 6d. Ladies perfumes were the same price as were gramophone records, song books or sheet music”

Another letter has come from a comparative youngster, Henry Button, who didn’t begin shopping in the Cambridge Woolworth’s until 1931! He tells me that the first Woolworth store in England had opened in Liverpool in 1909, having been based on a chain of five and ten-cent stores established by Franklin Winfield Woolworth in the United States. Henry patronised various of the shops in Sidney Street, but was not really the sort of customer they wanted. In October 1937 he bought himself an overcoat from A.G. Almond, tailors and gown makers on the corner of Green Street. It cost him £3 5s. – and he is still wearing it over 60 years later!

Dr Ann Silver from Cambridge found her memories jogged by a picture of relief parcels for the 1953 flood victims being stored in hangars at Madingley Road – for she was helping there between April and June that year. She writes: “Your photograph gives a good idea of the scale of the task but it can’t convey the smell. On hearing of the disaster people instantly pulled out all the stops to send help. Their gifts were not confined to clothes but included toys, household goods and food. Sitting in a parcel till June hadn't done much for the generous supplies of cheese, ham, kippers etc sent off in February. There was also the unmistakable pong of socks that had been peeled off the donor's feet for immediate dispatch! [SCAN OF MADINGLEY HANGAR – SLIGHTLY DIFFERENT FROM LAST ONE USED]

It was an older article that caught the eye of John Matthews. He is secretary of St Andrew's Street Baptist Church in Cambridge and the story he spotted was another of my 'Looking Back' pieces, this one about the impending rebuilding of the church in February 1903. He has photographs of the old chapel and of the stone-laying ceremony for the new, the present building, which will be celebrating its centenary next year. A new chapter in the history of the church will open with the induction of a new Senior Minister, the Rev David Morris on the 17th May. The origin of worship on the site had dated back to 1721 when a group of dissenters met in a converted stable at the Stone Yard in Hog Hill (now Downing Place). More recently they have revived the name for their Stone Yard Centre which includes a coffee shop opened each weekday. It's named Livingstone's after the African explorer who would have seen the old chapel on his visit to Cambridge in 1857. He had come to address a meeting in the Senate House and found a packed audience anxious to view the man who had crossed Africa from coast to coast. They saw a plainly-dressed man of moderate height, his face tanned deep brown through long exposure to the sun and wind and furrowed by deep lines which spoke of the anxiety and hardships endured. His voice had lost its fluency, due to the fact that he had spoken African languages for the past sixteen years. At the end of his address the walls of the Senate House echoed with deafening cheers. Next night he received a similar ovation, this time in the Guildhall. Then he was off on his journeys again leaving Cambridge people to follow the story of his further journeys, and Henry Morton Stanley's search for him. Peter Snelson has written a brief life of David Livingstone, 'From Blantyre to Chitambo', published by Christian Heritage from the Round Church Vestry in Bridge Street, Cambridge. Memories 19th February 2002, by Mike Petty

George Dethridge from Bar Hill has sent me some of his reminiscences. His family came to Cambridge during the London blitz after their house in the East End had been damaged by a bomb. Their first home was a small end terrace house in Clement Place, close to the Round Church, with a Morrison air-raid shelter in the front room, taking up much-needed space. Then in 1941 came a new sister; now there were nine of them with mum and dad and they needed somewhere bigger.

George recalls: "We moved to Gwydir Street, off Mill Road, an end terrace house with a back yard with three bedrooms, an outside toilet and tin bath hanging on the side wall. Not forgetting that there were now nine in the family the three bedrooms were not really big enough but it was home and it was the best that could be done at that time. Mum and dad slept with my young sister in their bedroom and my two other sisters had the other bedroom, so that meant us four brothers had to share the third bedroom. With one double bed this meant that we had to sleep top and toe. We slept like this for many years to come.

"Downstairs was the front room with a fireplace and one gas lamp for lighting; this room was known as best room and only used on high days and holidays such as Christmas. The next room was the dining and cooking room with a cast-iron black hearth and a fire was always on the go to supply hot water. In the next and final room was the scullery with a brick boiler heated by wooden blocks for washing the clothes. Near the window was a deep sink with just a cold tap for the whole house.

“That was the inside of our home and the backyard was about four yards square, not a lot of space. In the yard was the toilet but no toilet rolls, just pieces of old newspaper squares that dad had cut up and hung on a piece of string. At the back of the house was a large warehouse storing magnesium, for incendiary bombs. This in itself caused problems with rats and other vermin so we had a cat to help to control this aspect of our daily lives. The garden was for growing vegetables, but as my parents did not have a garden they had to buy most of their food from the local shop in the street and maybe scrounge from whoever had some to spare. Many friends’ parents kept chickens and those who had bigger gardens kept pigs and ducks, so if there were any scraps of food left over it was taken to the house with the pigs

“As there was no electric in the house our wireless was powered by an accumulator battery which had to be recharged every so often. This meant taking it to a shop in Newmarket Road, carrying it either in a cycle basket or walking with a baby’s pushchair, as they were very heavy. Coal merchants delivered coal for the fire but on some occasions when we had run low we would cycle to the Gas Works on Newmarket Road and collect a bag of coke, then try to balance it on the cycle frame to get it home. If it was wintertime and the house was very cold and damp dad would give us a hot brick wrapped in brown paper to take to bed as we did not own any hot water bottles

“Saturdays was our family bath night, the tin bath would be put in front of the fire. Dad would be in charge of this operation, and he would keep topping up the bath with hot water from a kettle off the fire. Our sisters always went first, we boys were too dirty so we would be waiting our turn. As soon as the girls were done we would then get into the bath and try to get clean. There was always a scum around the bath as by now it had five or six of us in the same water. After the bathing of us all we would sit in front of the fire to dry out and mum would then go through our hair on our heads to check for hair lice (fleas or nits). Dad would empty the tin bath with a saucepan; this took some time to complete and was the worst job of bath night. Mind you we always had Donald Peers singing on the wireless and his opening tune was “In a shady nook by a babbling brook” and we listened with a cup of warm drink, so that’s how Saturday nights bathing would end, this happened week in and week out.

“Another thing we all had to do, as a family was to go to the Auckland Road every so often to have a bath in some sort of disinfectant. This entailed attending the baths, undressing and a large woman in a white overall would usher us into a cubical in which there was a large bath full of horribly smelling white fluid. The female attendant would watch over us a make sure that we got into the bath and that our whole bodies were submerged and that we ducked our heads under the contents, making sure we were well and truly covered top to tail. I believe we had to spend ten minutes in the bath we were then allowed to get out, dry ourselves and go off home. I was told that the baths were to get rid of all types of lice and to prevent scabies. One thing for sure it was horrible and not recommended.

“My eldest sister was 16 & had now married a GI and moved to the USA, so it came that eight of us moved from Gwydir Street to a new home in Kings Hedges Road. The house itself was much bigger although it still only had three bedrooms, but it had a bathroom, for us a luxury, the toilet undercover outside, and a hot water system from the open coal fire. The house looked like a two story pre-fab house made of sheets of asbestos. I can remember our first bath night in the new house. As usual it was a Saturday; we had a fire all day and with the fire we should have had hot water. We got into the bathroom, undressed as mum ran the bath for us all and guess what! The water was stone cold and poor mum had to put up with us moaning about the cold water, but needless to say we still had to have a bath and get on with it. The hot water system never worked in all the years we lived in this house. So dad had to purchase a gas boiler to heat the water and then it had to be carried up the stairs in buckets.

“In the late forties and early fifties Kings Hedges Road was very country-like as two thirds was open fields all the way across to Arbury Road. At the end of the road was a very large wooded area, which went all the way to Impington. But the real pleasure of the woods was a massive store of army tanks that were parked in an old army camp on the edge of Cambridge with the entrance on Milton Road. This camp backed on to the wooded area so we would scale the fence and climb onto the tanks to play but keeping an eye out for guards, as we were trespassing. It was an adventure to explore and if we were seen the guards would shout at us and we ran like rabbits back into the woods. There was a rail siding into the camp where all sorts of goods would be delivered and moved out but it was also where the dead American servicemen's bodies would be prepared for return to the USA for burial, sad times for many families."

In 1963, twenty years after George's family moved away, News columnist Erica Dimock surveyed Gwydir Street for her 'Down Your Street' feature. The terraced houses looked much the same as they had since they were built in the 1860s, but the atmosphere of the street had changed. It was becoming 'the Soho of Cambridge' as young families moved away to be replaced with people from Italy, Jamaica, Poland, Yugoslavia and a variety of other countries. One man who knew the street well was Harry Pateman, a magistrate. He had lived in the same house for 70 years and could remember when they had their own chemist's shop amongst the facilities on offer. The number of shops had declined but still included three grocery stores: Ernest Mills had been trading for 14 years, S.F. Cockell had moved there in the mid 1950s, and C. Harpur's shop had changed hands only recently. One newcomer was Sadie Segal who had brought her second-hand clothing shop from Norfolk Street, having been trading for 23 years, ever since she moved down from London during the war. But trade was not what it used to be, since people could now obtain almost anything on credit.

Shoes would always be needed, and would always need mending. The British Shoe Corporation had its repair works in Upper Gwydir Street where some 1300 pairs were repaired each week, as they had since 1914. But now things were changing and craftsmanship was being eliminated by new processes, stitching having been replaced by sticking.

Beer was an important part of the life of the street. Dale's Brewery dominated the area near Mill Road. It had been founded in the 1890s, when there were no fewer than 22 breweries in Cambridge. But by 1963 it was being used as a distribution depot by Whitbread and its landmark seven-foot high cup, a reminder of the gold cup won for the best beer at the Brewers' International Exhibition in 1911, had been removed for safety reasons. Of the five public houses that had once traded, two were closed by 1963; the former Prince of Wales had been owned for a while by Peter Cook of Footlights and 'Beyond the Fringe' frame and was then a lodging house, the Gwydir Arms was a private house. The Brewer's Arms had a good darts team, but the Alexandra Arms had lost its once-famous skittles club and at the Dew Drop inn the licensee, Leslie Peck, was lamenting the recent closure of the Embassy Ballroom in Mill Road, that had considerably reduced his custom. The Beaconsfield Conservative Club had itself formerly hosted dances in its imposing hall, then being used as a furniture warehouse, but both city and university judo clubs continued to meet in upper rooms.

It is hard to associate urban Gwydir Street with exotic snakes, lizards or spiders, but they were a regular hazard for H.W. Barnes, director of Whitehead's wholesale fruit and vegetable warehouse. They had hanging space for 900 stems of bananas some containing creepy crawlies, a quite impressive sight, & something like seven tons were received and despatched each week. Although oranges and South African apples were still very popular there was an increasing demand for more unusual fruit and continental produce.

But perhaps the most important building in the street was the Bath House with its nine baths for men, nine for women. It had been established in 1927 at a time when few houses had bathrooms of their own. By 1963 it was open from Tuesday to Saturday each week, charging a shilling a person, for which you got a hot bath, towel and piece of soap – with a supplement for scented bath cubes – and was used by 300 men and 100 women each week. But as housing improved so fewer people had need of its facilities, by 1975 it was losing £7,000 a year and its boilers – second hand when installed – were on their last legs. The baths closed in 1977.

Did you use the Gwydir Street baths, or do you have other memories of bath night. Write to Mike Petty

Memories, 26th February 2003, by Mike Petty

Last week's article on Gwydir Street has stimulate several readers to send in their own Memories of bathing in public – or at least in the Public Baths.

Ben Benstead from Victoria Road thinks he was the first paying customer at the Public Baths. "I was born in Gwydir Street in 1910. In 1927 I was a young apprentice working for The Electrical Wiring & Repair Company of Corn Exchange Street, Cambridge. Those of us living in the immediate vicinity had watched the building-work with great interest - this was the first public bathhouse that we knew of in Cambridge and news of its opening was eventually published in the Cambridge Daily News (the newspaper which my parents had read since before I was born).

"The opening day arrived and after work at 5.30pm another apprentice, Doug Smith, and I cycled to the baths. Unbeknown to us, there had been a problem with the heating boiler during the day and the baths were not yet in operation although several people were still sitting patiently in the Waiting Room.

"Doug and I joined them and in the next half-hour or so other people arrived: some ran out of patience and left until finally only about five of us remained. An attendant came in and told us that although there was no guarantee that the water would be hot, we could - if we wanted - have a lukewarm bath. Doug and I were the only two to agree to this offer. We paid 4d and received a tablet of soap and a small towel. A second towel was available for a further charge of 1d. (Just as well as the towel was less than 3ft long and 18 inches wide!).

"I was directed into a small cubicle with a stone/concrete floor. There was a slatted wooden bench and a couple of hooks on which to hang my clothes. The bath was already filled with water. (There were no taps, just a fill-pipe over the end of the bath). Lukewarm? -Forget it! My first real bath was in stone-cold water! Even so, I guess that Doug Smith and I were the first two paying customers in the Gwydir Street Baths.

"I used the baths over the next six years until I married and moved away. You waited in the Waiting Room until you were called to pay your money and receive soap and towel before going to the cubicle where your filled bath awaited. If you wanted more water you called out to the attendant 'More hot in number six!' and received the reply 'Water coming!' to give you a chance to move your feet away from the fill-pipe.

"Sometimes the Waiting Room got very crowded. There was a workhouse nearby at 81a Mill Road (which later became the Cambridge Maternity Hospital) and many of the local tramps used the Waiting Room in the baths until the workhouse opened its doors in the early evening. The attendant found great difficulty in discouraging the tramps and the genuine customers had to contend with the 'temporary visitors' smoking all sorts of cigarette dog-ends they had accumulated. It got very smoky in that Waiting Room!"

Tony Challis from Great Shelford was another who regularly patronised the baths: "As a young lad in the late 40's I was a keen racing cyclist and would generally go training straight from work. Most of our work was pretty dirty and many times I would visit the Baths in Gwydir Street. After paying the 1/- we would be shown into a bath cubicle. The attendant would turn on the hot taps from outside and, when the allowed amount had been delivered, would call out "cold water going in!". This phase of the operation was tricky. The temperature of the water had to be gauged just right. Too much cold and it was a tepid bath; not enough cold and you either had to wait or get scalded! After the attendant had been told to turn off the cold water there was nothing more to be said. No more water, hot or cold, was allowed. The soap provided, about two inches square and very thin, gave little lather and had no smell. The towel was, from memory, a starched piece of material which had poor drying properties. I must say that I don't remember being offered scented bath cubes or that there was a women's end (wish I had known). By today's standard it was all rather primitive, but it did the job and seemed to be well used".

Tony was apprenticed to George Lister and Sons of Abbey Road. He recalls: "Besides working in the Blacksmith and Machine shops we would work at many firms around the City. My mentor was Bill Rouse who seemed to be mostly employed in the breweries, Tolly on Newmarket road, Panton St. and, of course Dales. I recall one of our jobs was to refurbish the name 'Dale's Brewery' on the tower at the top of the building, steel letters some 12" high which were bolted on all four sides around the Gold Cup. The job must have been carried out in the winter because I remember it being cold and very foggy and we couldn't see the ground at all. The letters there now are probably the same ones. Not only did we climb to the top of 'Dales' we also descended to the very bottom, as one of our visits was to fit new leather washers to the pumps at the foot of the well that was just inside the entrance".

Eileen Devonport (nee Nightingale) lived at number 69 Gwydir Street from 1962-1972 in a house that had formerly been a shop; there was no bathroom and the loo was outside. She recalls: "There was no back entrance so when the coalman came he had to carry the sacks of coal right through the house to the back coal room. More than once I locked myself out and had to go round my neighbours and climb over the cemetery wall, which ran along the bottom of the gardens, and climb back over again into my own garden. I remember Mr. Mills and Mr. Cockell's grocery shops, and sometimes if I needed quite a lot of shopping I would leave a list with Mr. Cockell who would bring it down to me. Although it was the sixties I didn't have a washing machine or a fridge, so in the summer the back windowsill was used to keep milk etc cool, and the washing was done by hand. Our rent was £2 [TWO POUNDS] a week in 1962 and rose to £4 [FOUR POUNDS] a week in 1972. Both my children were born whilst at Gwydir Street and they often talk about how they had a bath in a tin bath in front of the fire. I remember having to boil umpteen kettles and saucepans of water to fill it. But once a week I would take them to the Baths where a Mrs Canham, who also lived in Gwydir Street, used to hand out the towels and soap, and I can remember having to call out 'its too hot' or 'its too cold'."

But Eileen would like help in recalling one aspect of life off Mill Road: "Before moving to Gwydir Street my husband and I lived in George IV Street, and I remember buying fresh baked bread and cakes at weekends from premises which resembled a stable yard. Can anyone else remember and tell me more. I think they were brothers, they were either milkmen or butchers, but only baked at the weekends."

Mrs B. Cullum from Cambridge also remembers Gwydir Street "I was born at no.138 more than sixty years ago and remember all you wrote about. When I remember the baths it was 6d for a bath with a towel and soap and a lot of people with no bathrooms used it. The other thing I remember is the old shop of Mr Hoppits who sold everything you needed, and the milkman Mr Biggs who delivered milk with a horse and cart. We used to feed the horse so it took twice as long to bring the milk to us. I also remember Dale's clock, it was also the backway to the Kinema and us kids used to try and get to the picture house without paying – but we were always caught!"

One of her near neighbours was Dorothy Allen. She was born at number 44 in 1932 and remembers the Street Party held at the end of the war; she can see her father on the picture I reproduced though not herself or her mother. But she remembers there was a fancy dress competition; she went along dressed as the girl from the Mackintoshes Toffee tin and won third prize in her category. She also remembers Mr Biggs and Mr & Mrs Russell who were landlords of the Alexandra Arms which was her father's 'local'. Her dad used to go on an annual outing from the pub to Ascot in a taxi and that was the highlight of his year. Dorothy Allen is now Mrs Dorothy Mott – and hers is a surname associated with Cambridge photography in the 1920s and 1930s. [LIBRARY PIX INCLUDING KINEMA, WORKHOUSE & BATHHOUSE]

Ted Mott's name features in no directory of Cambridgeshire photographers yet hundreds of his negatives are housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection. They cover a period stretching from 1917 to 1939 with the majority taken in the 1920s. Mott was less concerned with central Cambridge than the Newnham and Chesterton areas and although he did carry his camera to Fulbourn, Harston, Histon and Quy most of his shots were taken around the Shelfords, Stapleford and Trumpington. Some show accidents to motor cars or steam lorries, others fairground scenes with smartly dressed ladies sedately sitting on the prancing animals of a mechanical ride. Others captured scenes of tragedy as those of the great fire which destroyed Grantchester Mill in 1928 and attracted the greatest crowds of onlookers that village had ever seen. Thousands of sightseers, many from the most distant parts of the country, travelled to witness the ruins of the 13th century watermill. Ted Mott arrived during the height of the blaze and captured several views of the scene some of which he subsequently issued as postcards [GRANTCHESTER MILL FIRE]

Last week George Dethridge mentioned the open fields that used to stretch between Milton Road and Histon Road. Now Kathleen Moden, from Ely has lent me a photograph of two houses that stood on land occupied by the present Gilbert Road, Cambridge; they were known as Hall Farm Cottages, Histon Road and behind them were fields used by the Royal Artillery horses during the First World War. [SCAN OF COTTAGES]

The name Moden is one that will be always associated in my mind with cartoon postcards. Harry Moden was a quiet office worker who became buyer & stores manager for the Cambridge Scientific Instrument Company. He was a shrewd observer of the Cambridge scene who translated his observations into cartoon drawings that he issued as postcards & sold to the 'Cambridge Chronicle' newspaper between 1903 & 1914. When his health began to fail he cut back on his cartooning though he brought his pens out again to record the celebration of peace in 1918. He died aged 79 in 1960. Many of his drawings were produced at his home in Humberstone Road where as a young man he viewed with especial interest the activities of Undergraduates, with a series of cards depicting courting activities rudely interrupted by the arrival of the University proctor and his bulldogs. [SCAN OF CARTOON GRAD 1]

But now Margaret Rollinson of Girton has rediscovered two similar original cartoons that were collected by her father-in-law, Bennett Rollinson, a Cambridge policeman. They were found tucked away at the back of his garage in Priory Road several years ago. They seem very familiar but are not signed; can anybody shed any light on them please? THESE LAST TWO STORIES CAN BE HELD OVER IF NECESSARY

Joan Kerr (nee Bailey) from Bidford on Avon, Warwickshire, has discovered an old photograph of the Cambridge and Paul Instrument Works in Chesterton Road, where her late father Donald Bailey used to work. The firm was a combination of the Cambridge Instrument

Company and another founded by Robert Paul, a London instrument maker. They came together in 1919 and their service engineers progressed from travelling by public transport to motorcycle and sidecar and eventually a motor van. This could be seen in Petty Cury each morning where they collected a block of ice from MacFisheries ice works for use in calibrating thermometers. In 1924 the name of the company was shortened and 'Paul' dropped, so Mrs Kerr's photograph must date from that five-year period. [SCAN OF CAMBRIDGE AND PAUL PICTURE]

Another Cambridge company, Pye TVT, has been the subject of a detailed history by Richard Ellis. It covers the birth of the firm during the early years of television in the pre World War II days, through the developments of colour television and the introduction of digital technology. In these days when the erection of mobile television transmitting aerials are causing protest who now recalls the massive 180-foot high transmitting tower at the St Andrew's Road site from which the company would transmit test pictures. When in 1951 the debate on the establishment of a commercial television service was started Mr C.O. Stanley decided that Pye should put on a mock commercial TV demonstration to radio and televisions dealers. A studio was rigged up in one of the factory buildings and the guests assembled in the Board Room, some 200 yards away. To make it more authentic some famous personalities were to take part, including Richard (Dicky) Murdoch and Annette Mills of Muffin the Mule fame. The dealers enjoyed the show, but other TV viewers complained that although they got good pictures, they could not hear the sound. But the signal was not coming from the transmission tower at all, for the company had laid cables from the studio, along the back of the houses in Cam Road and across the road to the Boardroom. The signals residents received were caused by spurious radiation from the connecting cables. The book is full of technical details of Orthicon Cameras, Sound Mixers and the outside broadcast vans which were exported to many countries, together with some insights into the last-minute hitches in far-flung places which dogged the engineers who were sent to take the name of Pye of Cambridge around the world. Memories 5th March 2003 by Mike Petty

There are three holes at Three Holes, between Upwell and Welney – and that's about it. There's no church, no graveyard – just a weed-infested ditch that was once a mighty river and a bridge over a fenland dyke where the Popham's Eau meets the Sixteen Foot and becomes the Middle Level Drain. Plus a garage, some houses and a few farms down Gooseberry Lane and Mumberries Drove and a village hall.

There used to be a corn mill, a drainage mill, some pubs, a shop, a post office, a coal merchant and a knacker's yard. They've all gone, as has the Methodist Chapel and the Women's Institute – for there are few women in Three Holes, with only 81 households on the electoral roll. The landscape is flat and featureless; there are few trees – but there is an Acorn Club. It was founded in 1996 as an independent group for women. It arranges meetings in the village hall that was built in 1952 in time for the Coronation, and decided to mark the Millennium with a series of talks and displays on local history.

Local people spoke of the ancient history; how the Danes travelled down that weedy ditch when it was the great Old Croft River, how Hereward the Wake organised opposition to William the Conqueror and how 540 years later Sir John Popham forced through a new drainage channel to make himself "cursed of all the poor of that part of England". Then in 1609 it was decreed that a bridge "of good and sufficient brick be there placed with three arches each 8 foote broad with three sufficient doors to shut in time of necessity" and Three Holes was named. Somebody else spoke of the later drainage, the digging of the Middle Level Drain, and the installation of the wind pumps, diesel pumps and electric pumps needed to keep the rich agricultural land free from water. Fruit growing became one of the main industries, others turned to dairy cows; shops and pubs grew up, even an Eastern Counties bus garage. Residents turned out to listen to the talks, notes were made and somebody said there ought to be a book compiled.

Last Saturday afternoon the Village Hall was packed. From all around the droves people flocked in their dozens; the car park was filled, vehicles stretching back along the fenland roads. Once more there were displays of photographs and people were scanning faces to see who they recognised. Some who lived on the site of a long-dismantled windmill chatted to others who remembered it 80 years ago. There were tales of discoveries of mummified cats found under floorboards – perhaps to ward off evil spirits. It was a true Three Holes event; tables sagged under the weight of home-cooked cakes and produce, prepared by the Acorn Club ladies, television cameras scanned the multitudes, reporters sought their memories.

The occasion was the launch of the very first history of the village; a history compiled by the people who live in Three Holes and illustrated by pictures of themselves and their families. It arrived literally hot off the press, having been received from the printers only the night before; a history of a Cambridgeshire community supported by the British Lotteries Commission and published in Australia. Its a history that will probably never find it's way into Cambridge bookshops for the first print-run will be snapped up by local people and passed on to their children, a souvenir of a day that will live in the memory of those privileged to be there. But if you missed it and would like a copy of the 64-page book then contact Mrs Audrey Carnson at Whitesides, Main Road, Three Holes, Wisbech, PE 14 9JS whose daughter, Anne Jackson undertook all the compilation and putting it together from her home in Australia. And if you can add more to their story e-mail Anne at aejay@optusnet.com.au [SCAN OF VILLAGE SIGN, DRAINAGE MILL ON SIXTEEN FOOT, UPWELL CHURCH AND UPWELL VIEW]

Three Holes has no cinema, but Sawston had two, as Bryan Howe has discovered. It got its first when Henry Spicer, Managing Director of the village papermills moved there in 1926. He became active in community life, founding an infant welfare centre, providing a sports ground and converting an old Congregational Chapel building into its first cinema, adding an extension to make a projection room where silent films were shown, accompanied by a local pianist, Fred Samuel

But films in those days were notoriously inflammable and the building had too much woodwork for safety. When Henry Morris, the County Chief Education Officer was looking for somewhere to build a new form of Village College, Spicer provided eight acres of land and some finance, with the understanding that the new College Hall would be used for showing films. But what sort of film was to be shown? Morris did not want his college to be used for commercial gain and trashy films, but Spicer realised that Sawston people wanted something other than cultural fare. The two men fell out; Spicer gave up on the combined idea and built his own cinema between the college and the main road. Now there were two cinemas with fine projection rooms, but the College could not afford to equip theirs, though a film club was run using a 16 mm projector and showing films that Morris considered appropriate.

Spicer's cinema was a 400-seat affair, with a commissionaire attired in smart uniform. It was open from Thursday to Saturdays with moderate prices and cushioned seats; but its takings were hardly sufficient to pay the wages of the seven staff and the hire of films.

However there was another side to the film industry, for as well as paper Spicers were pioneering the development of a new form of non-flammable colour film, Dufaycolor, invented by a Frenchman. Cinema was a booming industry on both sides of the Atlantic and the development of high quality colour film was an exciting enterprise with the American Technicolor system as a main rival. In 1930 a party from the Royal Society, led by Lord Rutherford, toured the Sawston factory and were shown a film of their visit that very afternoon. But other directors at Spicers did not share Henry's enthusiasm for this side of their business and failed to keep up with the developments of their competitors. Dufaycolor worked well in amateur cameras but there were technical problems when it came to duplicating films for commercial purposes and the colours could not be kept sharp. After Henry Spicer's death in 1944 Dufaycolor, acknowledged to be the 'most truthful and artistic in its effects' passed into history. His cinema however survives and is now used by the Village College for showing films.

Bryan Howe has published his research into "The Dufaycolor Story or the time when Sawston almost got into the movies", but would welcome further information. Contact him at 16 Henry Morris Road, Sawston CB2 4JW if you can add to his knowledge, or would like a copy of his book (£7 including postage). [SCAN OF SAWSTON STREET, PIX FROM LIBRARY]

More Gwydir Street memories have come in from Mick White-Robinson who e-mails to say that he lived at number 15 in the 1950s; it was at one time a butcher's shop and he's been told it used to house circus animals when they came to Cambridge; he also knows who was responsible for the hole in the Dale's Brewery Clock. Terry Barnes from Bar Hill saw his father, H.W. (Bunny) Barnes amongst the bananas with Cyril Perry. He writes: "My father started worked with E. Pordage and Co in the stables in Union Road when he left school at the age of 12 years, sweeping the yard; and he stayed with the Company until he retired at 65, apart from six years war service. There were very few people in the fruit and vegetable trade who knew him as W.H. Barnes, but ask anybody who Bunny was and everyone knew who you were talking about" [REPRISE BANANA PICTURE FROM 18TH]

Sarah Fabian-Baddiel has sent me a snap of form 3A of Chesterton Girls School, Gilbert Road, Cambridge about 50 years ago; she's amongst them and would like to contact any of her old school pals. Memories 12th March 2003, by Mike Petty

Last week the News headlines were of the need for additional power lines if Cambridge was not to run out of electricity. Nowadays pylons are part of the landscape but they began to invade the countryside in 1926 following the establishment by act of parliament of 1925 of the Bedfordshire, Cambridgeshire and Huntingdonshire Electricity Company. They based their operations at St Neots near the main projected power house at Lt Barford but initially took electricity from companies based in London, Bedford and Cambridge.

For a start they supplied power to 13 towns and villages from Lt Paxton to Ely as well as to Sawston paper mills and Cambridge cement works. The expanding network of cables reached Cambridge in 1927 and one of the terminals were installed in a field adjoining the Observatory on Madingley Road. By 1929 there were 100 miles of overhead line and 45 miles of underground cable with plans for many other connections - a line between Whittlesey & March, another from March to Ely with connections to Chatteris, Ramsey & Littleport amongst others. Soon an additional 19 villages were connected and when the National Grid came into being the company became one of the first to take power from that source.

In 1934 the Cambridgeshire Regional Planning report summarised the situation with high-power transmission lines bringing current from the grid substation at St Neots to transforming stations at Histon, Fulbourn, Sawston and Shepreth from which lines ran out to different villages. But, the report added: "In the village centres it is satisfactory that the low-power cables are laid underground, so that no detriment is caused to the amenities of the village". Even today parish councils agitate to have power lines put underground to reduce the untidy mass of overhead wires disfiguring the streetscape Power cables can be a danger to birds. This was an issue raised at a County Council meeting in January 1924 when councillors were talking about adding the lark to a list of birds to be protected - a large number of them were caught every winter, and they were getting scarce. Councillor Jackson said there was no doubt the larks which sang in the summer did little harm, but there was another kind of lark that came over in huge migratory flocks and did a great deal of damage. The greatest enemies of the birds were telegraph wires and snowstorms, he claimed. Out in the countryside many overhead power lines are now decorated with reflective plaques to make the wires more visible to swans.

But the presence of other overhead lines has often proved controversial. In Cambridge the Electric Telegraph Company had established offices in Market Hill by 1857 but councillors opposed the erection of overhead telegraph lines across Christ's Pieces in 1898. The lines were also proving a nuisance to the fire brigade. That September they complained they were delayed in responding to a fire in East Road because the telegraph wires were so low that it was impossible to run their fire escape along without catching them and they'd got entangled in Burleigh Street.

Telephone, with its wires arrived in Cambridge in the 1890s. The National Telephone Company established an exchange in an upper room on the corner of Market Hill and Market Street to deal with local calls with another exchange for trunk calls in a room adjoining the Telegraph office in the Post Office in Post Office Terrace. In 1912 the National Telephone Company were taken over by the Post Office and a combined exchange was opened in Alexandra Street, off Petty Cury – a building swept away during the Lion Yard redevelopment. By 1927 Cambridge was connected to America by telephone wires when the first Transatlantic telephone call was made from Cambridge to Harvard.

The hard work involved in installing telephone lines was been recalled by Ernie Gill in his marvellous unpublished memoirs of life 'From muck-spreader to Mayor', a copy of which is preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection. In it he describes his part in erecting new wires between Cambridge and Norwich in 1919, sweating with pick and shovel throughout a long working day then cycling home at night.

In 1936 the linesmen had other problems in trying to connect their cables through to Sandringham where the King's life was moving peacefully to its close. Journalists flocked to the Norfolk estate and chose as their base the Feathers Hotel at Dersingham, its one telephone together with the one outside kiosk their only means of communicating the news to the Empire. Engineers immediately set about providing the extra lines needed. Heavy snow had blocked all roads, the AA advising that no driver, however skilful, could force a heavily loaded wagon through the surrounding drifts. Undaunted the Post Office made it. Round the clock they struggled to string cables along hedgerows, loop them over cottage roofs or tie them to trees or electric light poles. Soon there were thirteen telephones to be shared amongst the ninety reporters. The technicians watched as the body of their King left Sandringham on a gun carriage without pomp or pageantry. By the time they returned to their digs the story had travelled around the world.

But it was not telegraph lines, telephone lines but tramlines that caused the biggest controversy in Cambridge. In 1880 tramlines were laid linking the railway station with the Market Hill, along Regent and St Andrew's Streets and down to a depot on East Road. Along them ran single & double-decker tramcars pulled by horses. But soon competition came in, with horse buses fighting for passengers along the same routes. Other road users complained of difficulties in crossing and recrossing the tramlines & people expressed concern about the welfare of the horses. Then in 1898 came proposals to sell the horse trams to the British Electric Traction Company who were successfully operating trams in other towns. Their electric trams would be quicker, have better brakes and be warm in winter. But members of the University objected – for one thing there would be additional tramlines along the 'Backs' - but the main problem would be the unsightly overhead power cables that would have to be installed along the streets. The scheme foundered but was revived in 1904. Again it came to nothing for there was a new mode of transport around the corner – the motor bus.

News of the death of Adam Faith will spark memories for all those who queued outside the Regal Cinema in Cambridge during the early 1960s when he was part of the mass of pop stars who visited the city.

In those days he attracted crowds and mixed reviews. In October 1960 when he appeared at the Regal the student newspaper Varsity was unimpressed: "the show was deplorably uninteresting but the audience gave a magnificent performance", and the News too commented on the screaming and stamping teenagers whose enthusiasm amazed the incredulous and slightly-dazed parents who had also turned out.

Adam Faith returned in March 1961 along with the John Barry Seven, to be followed by the Shadows in May. In October that year Billy Fury was on stage at the Regal together with Eden Kane, Karl Denver, The Allisons, The Viscounts, Joe Brown, Tommy Bruce, Peter Jay and the Jaywalkers and Georgie Fame and the Blue Flames; prices were 5/6, 7/- and 8/6. But the crowds were in for a disappointment for Billy Fury had bronchitis and a throat infection and only did three numbers, including 'Halfway to Paradise'. Next day he collapsed and Eden Kane phoned for an ambulance from the University Arms Hotel to take him to Addenbrooke's Hospital

In 1962 Adam was back together with Cliff Richard & Phil Everley – but were you there and do you have memories to share

The Cambridgeshire fens are thought by many to be flat, black, fertile and dull and most artists concentrate on the huge skies, endless drains and featureless horizons. Now a new touring exhibition sees things differently, for it looks at the landscape through the eyes of some of those who live and work in the area. Although Ernie Gray, whose experiences have been chronicled on television, is depicted as sitting in an armchair in the middle of a black field, for the most part the environment is secondary to the faces. But the artists in the exhibition of Ouse Portraits have also interviewed their subjects and the paintings only part of the story.

Sid Merry, the Ely eel catcher recalls how he started using old wicker eel-traps made beside the river at Babylon while Arthur Paske lived as a lad at Lark Bank and for him a trip to Prickwillow was a treat: "When we became teenagers we ventured up into the village a bit more. We came up on our bikes in the evenings, there was an old galvanised shop at the end of the village run by a crippled bloke by the name of John Leggat and that seemed to be our sort of youth club. He sold crisps and Corona and it became our main meeting place. Sometimes on the way home we might meet the village policeman and he would ask us what we were up to. It might be only eight o'clock but he thought that was time we were getting off home and when he told us it was time to go home we went home as fast as we could". [SCAN OF PORTRAITS OF ERNIE GRAY AND SID MERRY – I DID ASK FOR PHOTOS TO BE TAKEN OF THE PAINTINGS WHEN THE ELY EDITION COVERED THE EXHIBITION LAST WEEK]

Ray Cross was born at Shippea Hill and recalls: "My working life began when I was about eleven years old. In the harvest time during the school holidays, when the corn was cut and ready to be carted from the fields to the stacks, the foreman came and asked me if I would like to work for him, driving the horses from shock to shock. The corn, after it was cut, was put into sheaves, then six or eight sheaves stood together to let the air through to dry. After church bells had rung on them twice, along came the men with horse and cart, one man would load and the other man would pitch up to him. My job would be to lead the horse from shock to shock until we were fully loaded. This was a job from 7.30 am to 7.00 pm apart from 'docky' and dinner time" [HARVEST PIC FROM NEWS LIBRARY]

Jenny Petengell from Aldreth has lived in the fens for 75 years: "When I first went to school we had to walk across the fields to Earith. Then my father arranged for the school bus to pick us up, but we still had to walk a mile each way. I left school at fourteen. You could either go into service or do land work. My first job was in service in the village, night and morning for twelve shillings and six pence a week. Aldreth then had a shop and two or three pubs: We would go to the pub in the evening and someone would play the piano accordion. The school house was like a community centre: dances and whist drives" [SCAN OF ALDRETH IN THE 1930S]

Other subjects have a much different perspective on the fens: "It's a lovely land but it can get a bit soggy", "The worst thing is the wind, it always seems to be windy" and, from an American serviceman: "I wish it was more hilly – but I like to look at the fields".

The Ouse Portraits exhibition is showing at Witchford village college until 10th April, after which it moves on to Wisbech, Littleport library and Prickwillow drainage engine museum.

Readers from around the world have responded to recent 'Memories' articles

Doris Lindevig (nee Tully) has written from Sidney, America, with her memories of Woolworths. The shop means a lot to her for it was there she met her G.I. husband on 3rd December 1944. Doris explains: "I was in the W.R.N.S. and had been sent to a convalescent home in Cambridge. On that particular day I was on my way to my parent's house in George Street but stopped in Woolworth's and this where my friend and I met two G.I.'s. I never did get to my parent's home that day! We were married in April 1945 and I sailed to America on the Queen Mary in the following March. We had a very happy marriage – 3 children – until my husband was killed in an accident in 1964". Doris has since married again and still lives in the States, but every time she visits Cambridge she pops into Woollies and her memory is refreshed. George Street, off Chesterton Road, is not to be confused with George IV Street near Queen Street, off Coronation Street, Hills Road. This was home to Terry Barnes, who now lives in Bar Hill. It is an area he calls 'Royalty Square'. Terry writes to solve a mystery that has been troubling Eileen Devonport who once lived in George IV Street, and remembered buying fresh baked bread and cakes at weekends from premises which resembled a stable yard. She it was run by brothers, either milkmen or butchers, who only baked at the weekends. Terry recalls that there had once been a bakery at no.8 George Street, he knows because that was the house he used to live in during the war: "I can remember playing in the old bakery part of the building and having a model of a Lancaster bomber on the floor – that is until our pet rabbit and cat got in and in the frantic chase smashed it up". That bakery had long closed by then but there was another: "I wonder if she is referring to Quelch Bakery in Union Road. There were two brothers there with their parents, Doug and his brother Ken. Doug was in the butchery trade whilst Ken drove for Esso or Shell petroleum out of Royston". Does anybody else have memories of 'Royalty Square' [PICS FROM NEWS FILES]

All of this was sparked by an article on Gwydir Street, and memories are still coming in. Eileen Fenwick worked at the Baths for 27 years, keeping the taps Brasso'd and everything clean and tidy. When she started it was wartime and she recalls the little evacuees who were brought in, one crying for his mummy. Later she met a wide range of Cambridge folk, including one who brought her own bucket – which she wore on her head! Rita Young (nee Page) and her sister were born above her dad's butcher's shop at number 15 Gwydir Street when they lived until the late 1940s. Her dad had a slaughterhouse at the back of the premises bordering on to Mill Road Cemetery and on market days cattle were driven in through the archway.

One of her near neighbours from those long-ago days is still living in the area. Margaret Cream moved to Upper Gwydir Street with her husband in 1940. They had a front, 'best' room, a living room with a cooking range and a toilet built into the end of the kitchen – but with the door outside. She remembers a large iron mangle with wooden rollers that her husband pushed round by the church to Gas Lane where the scrap dealer gave him fourpence for it. When her husband was demobbed they replaced the old tin bath with a proper bath fitted in the kitchen, with a table top and a coke boiler to heat the water. It was here she brought up her three daughters. She can remember all the local shops – Townsend's and Wards' cycles, Renbro's wireless shop, Frosts general outfitters & Freemans the furniture store who also supplied flooring. Her father-in-law worked there for many years, looking after the horses and driving the pantechicon to London. Milk, bread, coal and soft drinks were all delivered to the door and Mr Odell came twice a week with his horse and cart carrying fruit and vegetables. In fact there was little need to go out of the area for all necessities, not like today, she laments.

Margaret grew up in Trumpington and has vivid memories of the fire at Grantchester Mill in 1928: "the fire was on a Tuesday evening, Girl Guide night. We met over the stables at a Colonel Bainbridge's house; our captain, daughter of Grantchester's vicar, was not allowed to cycle past the mill and had to go the long way round, via Newnham. Next day Mr Robinson our headmaster took us to see the damaged remains and after a long talk we had to write a poem about what had happened and what we had seen." Such a scene of devastation would linger in her memory forever. [SCAN OF GRANTCHESTER MILL BEFORE THE FIRE]

Joan Howlett also has memories of disaster. She has written a wonderful, long letter, from her home near Stoke on Trent: "I was born in January 1923 at 12 Vicarage Terrace and had two brothers. It was a lovely place to live. We too had a bath night on Saturday in my mum's washing tub, being filled by my dad from water boiled on the gas stove. We left the Terrace in April 1940 when my parents took the tenancy of a public house, 'The Ship' in Princes Street off Coronation Street (near Terry Barnes' family). Little did we know of the terrible disaster which was to come for that wonderful street. The bomb that fell during the night of 19-20th June 1940 killed ten people, all of whom I loved and grew up with. Nobody except those who experienced the aftermath could possibly know the devastation felt by everyone. Body parts of the people whose house got the direct hit were still being found days after. My dearest Aunt, Mrs Watson, was a blessing to anybody who survived and I loved that lady dearly to her dying day. It was that kind of street. I put 10 poppies in my window every Remembrance Day for those lovely people." Joan continued to live with her parents after she married her husband, Ken but in 1957 they took over the 'City Arms' in Sturton Street where they stayed for five years. Later they took another pub, the 'Anchor' at Bottisham before moving back to Cambridge where they had a paper shop at the foot of Mill Road Bridge between 1964 and 1968. Since then move has followed move and they're now up in Staffordshire. Last October Joan and Ken celebrated their Diamond Wedding anniversary with a surprise party at the Gonville Hotel, with a copy of the News book 'Memory Lane, Cambridge' as one of the presents. They get piles of newspaper cuttings sent up to them to keep in touch with what's happening here in Cambridge and if anybody remembers them and would like to write to me I'll forward your letters. [SCAN OF MILL ROAD SHOPS IN THE 1960S, JOAN AND KEN'S DIAMOND WEDDING WITH THE 'MEMORIES' BOOK]

More readers have come forward who remember Chesterton Girls School 50 years ago; they include one of the former teachers, Miss Fromant, who is now 90 years old and living in a residential care home in Cambridge.

PICTURES ON DISK AND IN ENVELOPE WITH CHRIS ELLIOTT

The headlines this week have been dominated by war and protests against war; schoolchildren have been demonstrating in front of Cambridge Guildhall, marchers carrying banners have filed through streets. A week or two ago it was Cambridge University students demonstrating outside the Senate House, this time against – well against what?

Protest against war is nothing new; “No More War” demonstrations were staged throughout the 1920s with a Peacemakers Pilgrimage in 1926 and peace demonstrations on Parker’s Piece. In 1933 undergraduates organised an anti-war exhibition with a call for the abolition of bombing from the air following a meeting called by the League of Nations. But war came and Cambridge like many other places learned the meaning of aerial bombing, as Memories readers have recalled.

Once that war was done preparations continued in event of another. Fighting flared between protestors and supporters of the Suez campaign in 1956 after 600 undergraduates packed a Union Society meeting called by the University Labour Party. Supporters of Prime Minister Sir Anthony Eden booed and catcalled through speeches by Kenneth Younger and Anthony Wedgwood Benn who was brought to a temporary halt when roll after roll of toilet paper was hurled through a window. It got so noisy that the audience at the A.D.C. Theatre, next door, could not hear the performance on the stage. But comparative peace was restored by the arrival of the University Proctors. In 1966 there were protests over the war in Vietnam with 200 people demonstrating against the Labour Government support for American policies chanting “Johnson out. Wilson out. Peace In”. Peter Cadogan, national organiser for the Committee of 100, told a rally on Christ’s Pieces that the Prime Minister was wrong to support American policies: “Any man who supports the war in Vietnam must go. And Harold Wilson is just such a man”.

In 1951 the arrival of American atomic weapons in bases in East Anglia had brought opposition from a Cambridge Scientists Anti-war Group who described it as “a disaster” that would make us a target. More protest followed the establishment of a Thor nuclear missile base at Mepal which became the centre for CND marches in 1958. The tension came to a head in 1962 during the Cuba missile crisis, which saw the largest demonstration people could remember being banned from Cambridge Market Hill. The marchers made their way to Parker’s Piece where 500 people were involved in scuffles. The Mepal base closed in 1963 but ‘Ban the Bomb’ protests continued and reached a peak with the announcement that Cruise missiles were to be based at Molesworth in the ‘80s.

The 1960s and 70s were active periods of protest marches on other topics including the Ian Smith regime in Rhodesia and a Right-Wing military dictatorship in Greece which led to a rally outside the Garden House Hotel where a local travel agent was promoting Greek holidays. Police invoked the Riot Act as undergraduates surged forward pinning constables against shattered plate-glass windows and six undergraduates received prison sentences. There were demonstrations against Oswald Mosley (1960), Harold Wilson (1967), Enoch Powell (1968) and Reginald Maudlin who as Home Secretary became involved in a protest over the expulsion of ‘Red’ Rudi Dutschke who had come to Cambridge for the treatment of a bullet wound in 1968. The strike-torn 70’s saw numerous protests against Government legalisation with Trades Union Congress and National Front demonstrations; but there were also protests against the powers of University proctors.

Other rallies have been arranged on a diverse range of topics such as the need for more cycleways, the blocking of city centre streets to buses, proposed new bridges and roads, the closure of village schools and libraries and on and on.

For protest is not the unique preserve of the present generation; each was important in its day and some may have resulted in significant changes; but all exercised the freedom of speech that some other peoples do not enjoy. Did you take part in any of them, and if so what do you recall about the day you demonstrated? [SCANS OF DEMONSTRATIONS; PICS FROM LIBRARY FILES]

This week marks the 50th anniversary of the death of Queen Mary, an event that was marked by a message of heartfelt sympathy by the Mayor of Cambridge, Ald. S.T. Bull. But one man more than most had occasion to mourn her passing.

January 29th 1934 started as just an ordinary day for Percy Titmous. By the time it was over he was world famous, In the words of the New York Herald Tribune he had become a "motorized knight", a Launcelot who'd rescued his Queen from dire distress.

Queen Mary was a regular visitor to Cambridge, in fact her honeymoon train had paused here briefly when en route to Sandringham in 1893. In 1918 she visited Papworth Hospital and the Cambridge military hospital in Burrell's Walk with King George V. Three years later they returned to inspect the National Institute of Agricultural Botany where crowds glimpsed a tall Imperial lady inside the smoothly running Royal car,

It was the car that betrayed what was to have been a secret visit in 1932 to the Fitzwilliam Museum. The Royal car had again been spotted in January 1934 parked outside the Cambridge Tapestry Works in Thompson's Lane and then in St Andrew's Street whilst her Majesty chose numerous tiny ivory objects for her famous Dolls House from Woolston's antiques shop.

Three weeks later she was due to return. The police were alerted that the Royal car had left and were keeping the route clear so that the Daimler should have an unimpeded run. In fact it was nothing of the sort. Three times the limousine broke down through overheating, finally coming to rest outside the Slap Up public house at Waterbeach.

It was here that Percy found them. His wife suggested he turn round to see if they needed assistance, but how do you approach a Queen. Percy paused some way off and waited for a sign. Soon the Lady in Waiting approached to explain the predicament and ask whether the Queen might hitch a lift to Cambridge in their little car.

The constables charged with keeping the road free from traffic tried several times to intercept the Titmous vehicle, only to jump aside when they recognised the passenger. Even Cambridge crowds normally used to anything were stunned they saw the Queen arrive in such a car. Queen Mary did her shopping, took tea at the Copper Kettle, and continued her journey to Exning and Sandringham in a replacement Royal limousine

Percy Titmous himself tried to slip away unobserved, but somebody had taken his car number and a call to the Council offices soon elicited his name. The news spread quickly and soon pressmen, news agencies and even film companies were hot on his trail.

The American newspapers were full of the story: "Queen Mary Thumbs Ride as Auto Quits" ran one headline which went on to describe how "townspeople stared in amazement from the sidewalks".

The Queen herself seemed unperturbed by the incident; her visits to Antiques shops continued unabated, as did her motoring adventures. In May 1939 her car was involved in an accident; on another occasion she got lost in the lanes around Six Mile Bottom causing her escort considerable anxiety and in August 1948 the Royal limo again broke down again at Lt Thetford Corner

History was not allowed to repeat itself however and this time she continued her journey in a police car.

Queen Mary was a great favourite with the people of Cambridge and her death in 1953 was keenly felt. Amongst those present at the funeral service in St George's chapel, Windsor, was

Stanley Woolston, proprietor of the Antique shop she visited in a subject's car. [SCAN OF QUEEN MARY IN CAR, PIX FROM NEWS FILES]

Caroline Biggs is seeking more information about the fishing competitions organised by Percy Anderson who has been teaching angling for Cambridge City Council Children's Team for over 40 years. He himself was a world class fisherman & also played football for Cambridge United in the 1950s.

Caroline writes:

The Albion Fishing Club was formed in 1905. Mr John Hawkins-Cartwright, a local barber, was its president for many years. With his wife Hilda he did a lot to encourage junior angling in Cambridge. They were instrumental in organising the junior matches and their annual angling competitions became popular with children and parents alike. At a time when there was little entertainment, fishing was a popular pastime for many local children. The Albion competitions were well supported and children eagerly awaited the opportunity for a trip to either St Ives or Ely for a day's fishing.

Percy Anderson was born in Green End Road, Cambridge, the second of six children born to Renee and her decorator husband, George. Times were hard and it was often difficult to make ends meet, but despite this the area had a great community feel and people were happy. They had to make their own entertainment, and living so close to the river Cam it was inevitable that Percy and his brothers, like many other local children, would try their hand at fishing

When five years old he and his brother Lacy would walk from Green End Road to fish in the River Cam. "It was our entertainment", explained Percy. At that time the City Council used to cut the weed on the river and stack it on the bank & young Percy and his brothers used to poke around in it in search of elvers (baby eels). When he was seven, someone cut him a rod from a piece of willow while the hook was a bent pin and the line, catgut. His mother used to give them bits of dough to use as bait. It was simple but effective equipment that allowed them to enjoy endless hours on the riverbank.

Percy was 8 years old when he took part in his first Albion angling competition. Not many people could afford to have a holiday at that time so both children and parents eagerly awaited the annual children's angling competition. He join the merry thong on Parker's Piece where they were led by the Salvation Army band to the train station and off to fish in the Ouse at St Ives. This was where he caught his first prize fish – an eel. When still a relatively new angler Percy met top Cambridge Fish Preservation Society angler Bob Parr who was to give him some valuable coaching, and provide a turning point in Percy's fishing career. Percy was a quick learner and his natural skill shone through as he started winning competitions & fished for his country on seven occasions. He also became the English National Champion & enjoyed European Championship success in 1977. Locally his team the Pimpnells, are still remembered with awe, as they were to win 39 winter league events on the Cam. The team was made up of Percy, Lacy and George, Bob Hurst, Johnny Hutchinson and the late Frank Morgan. It is the only time in history (unless anyone knows different) that three brothers have won three gold's in a NFA Championship.

When Albion's recreation for children tailed off after the war, and there were no big children's angling competitions, Percy decided to do more for local children. From the 1960s onwards he started organising competitions for children. Since then many hundreds of local children have once again enjoyed the excitement and anticipation of a great days angling.

Percy met his wife, Pat in 1960 and they were married three years later. They had two children and lived along Newmarket Road, where Percy had a fishing tackle shop. But the tackle shop was not just a place where people went to buy equipment. With his vast knowledge and enthusiasm Percy was always on hand to give beginners tips. Local children regularly visited the shop and soon Percy found himself teaching youngsters how to fish. Some of the children didn't have much money to spend on equipment, but Percy, remembering how his mother used to improvise, showed children how to do the same. Pat and Percy soon became well know for their generous hospitality and countless youngsters benefited from the kindness shown by Pat and the patience of Percy as he taught them fishing techniques.

In 1962 Percy was approached by the City Council Children's Team (then called the Arts and Entertainment department) to teach fishing in the summer holidays. This was a job that he was to undertake for the next 40 years, teaching thousands of local children many of whom are still involved in the fishing world. It is a job that until more recently Percy has undertaken without payment. He highlights the fact that for years all the people who helped with the courses, those acting as stewards, giving talks and demonstrations and generally helping, also did so without payment, often giving up a days pay or holiday to do so.

However, Percy has also achieved significant recognition in six other sports. He played professional football with West Bromwich Albion and Cambridge United & represented the County in indoor and outdoor bowls, table tennis, snooker and pool.

Memories 2nd April 2003 by Mike Petty

ROY SHARP was born on April Fool's Day 1923 - but his grandmother thought it was just a joke and wouldn't believe it. He was not a handsome baby. One day his mother took him in a pram into Cambridge and left him outside Sainsbury's while she did her shopping. Then she hopped on a bus back to Mill Road, leaving him behind. He was still there when she remembered and came back - nobody else had wanted him.

The family moved to No 4 Coronation Street, a row of seven terraced houses off St Eligius Street, in Cambridge's New Town. Next door lived an elderly lady, Mrs Bates and beside her was Margaret Cox, a girl two years older than Roy. Mr and Mrs Francis were at No 5; he was a barber with a shop in Lensfield Road and their son, Clarence, nicknamed Sunny Jim, was a bit of a dandy who wore a monocle.

Mrs Conder at No 6, Mrs and Mrs Hinds at No 7 and an elderly couple at No 1, whose names elude him, completed their small community. At the end of the passage which ran along the back of the gardens was a gate which led to a large house occupied by a lady who painted in water colours - again the name slips his memory. Perhaps you can help.

Roy does remember attending St Barnabas Church of England Infants School, which meant crossing the busy Hills Road. His father arranged for the owner of a hardware shop on the corner of Russell Street to take him safely across the road. Each child took their own mug or cup, with a piece of coloured wool or ribbon on the handle, into which the teacher ladled cows' milk from a churn. (At home, like many others, they had Bull's milk.) Some children took sandwiches to eat with their milk; he recalls: "My mother would make up a pack of egg sandwiches which were wrapped in tissue paper. All the packages were placed on a table in the classroom when we arrived at school. One morning one of the girls whom I did not like wanted to leave the room. The toilets in those days were outside the building. A few minutes later she came back and told the teacher there was no toilet paper in the lavatory. So the teacher tore off some of the tissue paper which was wrapped around my sandwiches and gave it to her. I was horrified and when my sandwiches were handed to me at break time, I promptly dumped them into the waste paper basket. But the teacher saw me do so and fished them out and made me eat them."

Roy was an observant lad. On his way to school he would watch the billposter man sticking up a fresh poster, noting how the large ones came in segments and how, by using his long paste-brush, the man would position them and match up the pieces so they did not reveal the joins or overlap each other. Roy had his own hoarding on the garden fence and would ask a shopkeeper for the previous week's theatre poster that had been displayed in the window. This he would cut into two or three pieces and stick them on the fence, as he had seen the professional do.

In 1933 a series of special talks for children was given in Wellington Street by a well-known evangelist, Mr R Hudson Pope of the Children's Special Service Mission and Scripture Union where there would be models, stories, chorus singing and free gifts for everybody. Roy went along and was hooked. Four years later he was invited by the new vicar of St Paul's Church, Rev Gerald Gregson, to accompany him on a tour of the CSSM seaside holiday missions.

Then in 1939, as war loomed, he was asked to spend three weeks with the Caravan Mission to Village Children which aimed to take the gospel into the countryside, using a caravan, tent and a country missionary, then F T Varney. He recalls: "I joined him on the final day of his campaign in Caxton. The closing meeting filled the 'big-top' with about 200 villagers, both children and adults who, in view of the international situation, were very worried and turning to God.

"The next day was moving day; a local contractor came with his lorry to transport the tents, seating and prop. A shire horse was hired and attached to the caravan and Mrs Varney and I slowly wended out way to the next venue, Gamlingay, a small village with 18 public houses. Our first task was to erect our living and sleeping tents in the field, and then erect the 'big top'. I then had to visit every house in the village, leaving leaflets and inviting the children and their parents to the meetings planned for the following two weeks.

"Our first meeting was on August 20 and we had quite a good attendance. But then a few days later Hitler's troops invaded Poland and that same day evacuee children from London arrived in the village. 'Cor, look!' a little boy exclaimed on seeing our camp, 'a circus!'

During the night it started to rain and we had to leave our beds to loosen all the guy ropes because if they shrank they could pull out the stakes and cause the tents to collapse. The next day, Saturday September 2, Mr and Mrs Varney took their children home to Stapleford, leaving me in charge of the camp for the night. More evacuees arrived and next night we listened to Mr Chamberlain's broadcast in which he announced we were at war with Germany. Shortly afterwards the air raid siren sounded and the family we were listening with put on their gas masks and squatted under the dining room table. The all-clear sounded shortly afterwards.

"The next morning, just after breakfast, the village air raid warden came storming into our camp and demanded we took down our tents immediately. From the air, he said, it would look like a military encampment and would be bombed. We lowered the 'big top' and living tents and arranged for their storage for the duration of the war."

Does anybody remember these missions, or have photographs?

Roy Sharp moved away from Cambridge, joined the Royal Air Force, and had a range of jobs, including travel journalist and editor of his own newspaper, The Esher and Leatherhead Courier. Now he has published his autobiography, Never a Dull Moment (Serendipity, £12.50) which in its opening pages captures much of the detail of Cambridge in the pre-war days.

THE Cambridgeshire Family History Society fair at Impington last Saturday saw hundreds of people journey from various parts of the country to listen to lectures or browse through stands full of old postcards. Many scanned the latest microfiche - and more and more parish registers or files of census data are now being produced on these postcard-sized bits of film. But the problem is that you cannot actually read what's on them unless you have a microfiche reader, and this is a piece of equipment few people possess.

Nowadays many people have computers and there are masses of CD-Roms reproducing old county directories - though how do you know what you're getting? Unlike books, you cannot browse the contents. Whereas some contain a mass of additional material, such as old photographs, others have just copies of the pages, and some only part of them.

Which is why most people prefer the old-fashioned medium of printed paper and societies from around Cambridgeshire and beyond were exhibiting their wares. Some groups, such as the Fenland Family History Society, were selling pamphlets of no great literary merit, mainly lists of names - but names of people who had been incarcerated in Wisbech Prison between 1870 and 1878. It also lists the crimes -stealing, deception, garrotting, wounding - all of which serve to add a spark of excitement when seen at such a distance, though who would want to boast of an ancestor condemned as an "incorrigible rogue"?

The booklet is available from Wisbech and Fenland Museum, Museum Square, Wisbech or contact the society at www.cambridgeshire/history.com/societies/ffhs

Other family and local history societies, such as Histon, Littleport and Cottenham, have produced a mass of booklets and pamphlets, much of high quality. Many of them will never find their way on to the shelves of Cambridge bookshops, but they have an appeal far wider than their own parish.

SOHAM Community History Museum has issued a small booklet on the firm of C J Fyson which was founded in Paddock Street in 1848 to produce hundreds of the small windmills needed to pump water from the drains up into the fenland rivers. There was a high demand for replacement and renewals of such vital machines and there was enough work for both themselves and the other Soham millwright business of Hunt' Brothers.

Fysons went on to produce threshing machines, and had its own foundry for making iron castings. In turn this developed into agricultural implements and mobile conveyors used to load large ships. But most glamour attaches to the steam traction engines that the firm also developed to meet the unique conditions of the fenland farmer, being lighter and better suited to fen roads.

Many of the parts were brought in from other companies, including Dodmans of King's Lynn and Burrells at Thetford and by 1924 the company had manufactured 17 traction engines, of which most were to their own design. Some were sold, others hired out for threshing work, but for those children who attended the Baptist Church in Clay Street it was the Sunday School treat which was the greatest day of the year.

For they would enjoy a five-mile trip around the village in a wagon pulled by a Fyson engine owned by the Superintendent, Richard Fyson himself. At the end of the trip there would be a special feast in a barn opposite the Recreation Ground gates when the water from the engine boiler would be used to supply the hot water for making the tea.

The majority of Fyson's traction engines were scrapped in the early 1950s when more modern farming methods were introduced and it's thought that none of the engines now survive - unless you know better.

Memories 9th April 2003, by Mike Petty

Mitcham's Corner is one of the most famous names in Cambridge – but where exactly is it, and why is it so called.

Andrew Brett has lived in Cambridge all his life, as has his family before him, but, he told me: “Recently, I visited my old home neighbourhood of West Chesterton and posed the question to (often quite startled) passers-by: ‘Where is Mitcham's Corner?’ The answers I received were: ‘It's the roundabout!’; ‘The Portland Arms is on Mitcham's Corner!’; ‘It was over there - a shop where Staples is now!’ Only two people out of the twenty I asked gave me the answer I was looking for”

Andrew's researches show that in 1909 Charles Mitcham established a draper's shop at the corner of Victoria Avenue and Chesterton Road on land which was previously his father's garden and butcher's shop. The new business was highly successful, and other premises in Victoria Avenue, including a cigarette shop & a hairdressers became part of Charles Mitcham's empire with a men's wear department established on the other side of the Avenue. By the end of the 1920s, a large sign proclaiming 'Mitcham's Corner' had been erected above the shop, and Andrew has tracked down an early photograph announcing their Summer sale bargains.

Charles Mitcham sold his business to Dupont Brothers of London in 1944, but the shop continued to trade as Mitcham's. It attracted customers from far and wide, especially at Christmas time, as the News for November 1947 reported: “Cambridge is well used to welcoming Very Important Persons but none is so sure of a vociferous reception from the youngsters as Father Christmas. He was received with traditional acclaim on Saturday when, in the presence of hundreds of youngsters, he arrived at Mitcham's Corner, Chesterton Road. On arrival he proceeded to deliver the goods in the traditional way, leaving his ‘reindeer coach’, climbing up a ladder outside the shop and disappearing down a big chimney. A crowd of children saw him in Nurseryland, surrounded by his friends, the Three Little Pigs, Big Bad Wolf, Pluto, Micky and Minnie Mouse, Donald Duck and others. He will remain in residence until Christmas Eve”

Nor was it just the children who were rewarded by special events. In January 1948 austerity Cambridge was treated to a special fashion show: “An unusual kind of mannequin parade for a fashion house was staged by Mitcham's last night when they held their annual social in the Oak Room of the Dorothy Cafe, Cambridge. The hushed, expectant, awe-struck atmosphere of the genuine fashion parade was replaced by hilarious mirth as male members of the staff, suitably made up, and looking the last word in grace and charm ‘modelled’ the very latest styles for the junior miss, schoolgirl, young matron and matron. Even lingerie was shown in the form of a glamorous housecoat. A delightful demonstration of the Rumba was given by Miss Valerie Redfern who departed from the sublime to the ridiculous to give a demonstration reminiscent of a well-known music hall act, of an Egyptian Sand Dance”

The shop celebrated its Golden Jubilee in 1959 and was thriving in 1963, as Erica Dimock reported: “Originally a little draper’s shop specialising in fabrics, it has increased its scope of business to include carpets, china and hardware, and its particularly popular for its expert loose covering of three-piece suites” – at a price of £2.11s.6d for an easy chair

In the autumn of 1977 the shop was taken over by London Scottish, a Manchester-based Insurance and Investment group but a few months later the staff were devastated to learn that it was to close. The buyer, Mrs Janet Plumb who started work there in 1946 was shocked; “Not very much has changed over the years. Mitcham’s has stayed very much the same. It will be a pity to see the shop go. I am sure the people who miss it most will be the customers”. The assistant manager, Miss Ruby Holland, who’d been with the store for nearly 30 years said: “This is a very happy shop, offering a large range of goods with a personal service that is difficult to find these days”, while Manager Stuart Hamilton summed it up: “It was a unique sort of store; we know the customers and we know what they want and even who some are. One little lady comes in every day for wool, and even shows us what she makes. It is very sad to see it all go”

When people heard the news they could hardly believe it. Mrs Page of Kimberley Road told the ‘News’: “There was nothing in town like Mitcham’s, that sells anything any good”. Andrew Brett recalls: “My grandmother, Grace Hinchcliffe, was born in Corona Road in 1910. She always spoke fondly of Mitcham’s and her eldest daughter, Christine, worked there for some time after leaving school. Grace’s cousin, Muriel Wiles, lived in Springfield Terrace for over sixty years. Shortly before her death in 1987, Muriel gave me an armchair which had been in my family for years. The original cushions had long since perished and Muriel had replaced them - covering the new ones with material bought from Mitcham’s in the 1950s. ‘They sold lovely material - made to last!’ she told me at the time. The material endures to this day!”

Now the shop has gone and the premises are occupied by the Two Seasons sports shop. And, Andrew says, a brief inspection indicates that the entrance doors and some patterned glass window panels probably date back to the Mitcham’s era.

But the name remains for during the Great War a revolution occurred outside Mr Mitcham’s shop. Each morning, to the amusement of residents, a wooden structure with posts was dumped in the road at the junction of Chesterton Road and Victoria Avenue; each evening it was removed. The traffic island had arrived. As more and more motorists used the junction so it became busier. In 1932 came what was known at the time as the ‘Milton Road merry-go-round’, soon becoming known as Mitcham’s roundabout. The new experiment in traffic control worked well and another roundabout was opened at the other end of Victoria Avenue, Four Lamps.

From being a name synonymous with fashion “Mitcham’s” became associated with traffic jams and a nightmare for learner drivers. Year after year more and more traffic descended on the corner. In 1962 planners introduced a new experiment, sending traffic along Milton Road and down Chesterton Hall Crescent to Chesterton Road. This led to protests and was soon dropped. Five years later they came up with a major redesign which saw the widening of Croft Holme Lane (from Chesterton Road to Victoria Road) and a new road leaving a terrace of houses encircled by traffic.

By now “Mitcham’s” had become associated with a major traffic junction rather than a draper’s shop, as Andrew has discovered. But he suggests: “2009 will mark the 100th anniversary of the establishment of Mitcham's shop. Whilst the name lives on, it does seem a little sad that it is now only applied to the one-way system. Perhaps the local Council might consider putting up a commemorative plaque near the shop to remind us that Mitcham's Corner and what some refer to as 'Cambridge's answer to Spaghetti Junction' were not always one and the same thing?” [SCANS AND PIX FROM LIBRARY]

Can anybody help Joan Law from Hereford. She recently spent a week in Milton trying to find anybody who knew where Botany House, Cambridge Road, Milton is or was. Her husband, Estyn Law was born there in July 1939 but the family only stayed for a short time. Despite asking almost everybody she met, nobody could help her. Do you have any clues please? [SCAN]

Jo Edkins has had a query through the Cambridge Online City website (www.colc.co.uk) about the whereabouts of former Cambridge Gas Company W.W.1 War memorial in Newmarket Road. He’s heard about this somewhere but can't remember where. Do you know anything about it? If so contact Jo at colc@cambridge.gov.uk or drop me a line

Laurie Thomas from Bar Hill contacted me to say he saw a picture of himself skipping on Parker’s Piece in the picture taken by R.H. Brindley for the Cambridge Antiquarian Society photographic survey on 26th March 1937 (News 2nd April). He was almost 16 at the time and was working at a bicycle shop. He recalls that Burleigh Street was so busy on Friday nights in those days that you could almost walk on people’s heads. Laurie also recognises the lad facing the camera as Eric Cutting. [SCAN]

Memories 16th April 2003, by Mike Petty

When people reminisce about shops it is the Mitchams, Lauries, Joshua Taylor and Eaden Lilleys that come to mind. But just 25 years ago, in April 1978, Ruth Sealy turned her attention to another, more modern phenomenon – the freezer centres

East Anglia had just come out above the average a nationwide survey with some 43.1 per cent of homes owning a freezer & Cambridge had seen a growth in the number of such specialist centres. In a rural region such as Cambridgeshire it presented a saving on frequent trips to distant shops as well as storage for gluts of home-grown vegetables, she reported.

But it was not just the freezer centres that stocked frozen food: By then most supermarkets had sections, small or large, devoted to freezer owners, with the Co-op leading the way and Tesco’s dramatically expanding its frozen food sections, whilst some butchers, such as Dewhurst’s also had large freezer centres.

Ruth set out to see what was on offer. She stuck to five specialist centres all within easy reach of the city centre (although parking facilities varied) to see what sort of selection they carry and at what price. As a quick comparison she also took a look at the Beehive freezer food counter and at a small butcher and grocer, D. Traylen of Newmarket Road.

“Freezer centres must be among the most boring shops in existence. Everything is hidden away inside heavy-lidded freezers, hardly anything but the bulk-buy dry goods they also sell (large ‘caterers’ tins of coffee, marmalade etc) are on display. They consist of rows of clinically white boxes dominated by signs telling you where to find what and advertising ‘offers’. Some are better signed than others. At Bejam, Bridge Street, near the Round Church corner, you have to open the lids to read the majority of prices – which seemed a bit daft!” she reported

Prices were usually listed above the goods, but at Sainsbury’s, Coldham’s Lane, “I found I sometimes had to drag the packet out to find a price label and there was only a rough guide to where things are – ‘pork’ or ‘beef’ – which involves needless opening and shutting in pursuit of pork chops or rump steaks”

Peekay, in a warehouse-type store in a yard near the railway off Hills Road, had see-through lids on its freezers which seemed to make things easier. They were a private and locally-owned operation which had been going on since 1966. “I wondered if it had been hit by the emergence of so many competitors, but the manager said that as they are small they can be more flexible. Like the other centres they also sell freezers and run a 24-hour engineer service”. They had Northray peas at 69p for 5lb, 36 Birds Eye cod fish fingers at £1.68, 5lb of chicken portions for £2.21 and strawberries at 88p for 2lb.

Socold in Mill Road had half a New Zealand lamb at 52p per pound, although this was beaten by Traylen’s at 50p, with lambs’ livers at 49p and steak and kidney at 62p. Mince steak was cheap at 59p a pound, whilst ordinary mince was 49p. Bejam had peas at £1.79 for 10lb, whole baby carrots at 44p for 2lb, sweetcorn at 2lb for 57p and beef roasting joints at £1.05

The Beehive matched most of these prices with topside beef joints at £1.02, but also had Walls golden vanilla ice cream on offer at the low price of £1.03 for four litres.

Ruth also found that Sainsbury’s had half shoulder of New Zealand lamb at 49p per pound & chips at 55p for 5lb but their strawberries were expensive at 56p per pound. One section of the freezer row at Fine Fare in Fitzroy Street was devoted to bulk buying with half or a quarter pig at 51p per pound, New Zealand lamb at 56p, hindquarter beef at 79p & turkeys at 47p per pound. But Traylen’s had steak and kidney at 58p per pound and mixed vegetables at 37p for 2lb, which seemed cheaper than elsewhere. [PICS FROM LIBRARY FILES]

Andrew Brett writes to correct a small error in the Mitcham's Corner article; his researches show that their main menswear shop was at 9, Victoria Avenue from around 1915 - on the same side of the road as Mitcham’s other premises. A small offshoot of this opened c.1934 at 24c Chesterton Road but was only there briefly, being replaced by a cafe by 1948.

Alastair Gerald from Aldreth writes to share his memories of meeting royalty: “Reading about Percy’s Royal Surprise (Memories 26th March) reminded me of the surprise I had when I was a pupil at the King’s School, Ely. It would be about 1932 when I was walking down the Gallery towards the Cathedral when a car pulled up with a flag on the bonnet and the driver asked me if I could show him where the Porta Gates were. I said yes, so he said ‘hop on’ – I think they were called running boards in those days – I was thrilled riding on a royal car! We stopped in the college grounds and I suppose it was a lady-in-waiting asked me if I could find the Dean as the Princess Royal wanted to meet him. I raced down the college to his garden, rang the bell and walked with him to where they were waiting. He turned to me and thanked me, saying 'you're an angel'. I was flabbergasted!" [SCAN OF ELY PORTA]

Village life was not always quiet and peaceable, as Elizabeth Luck and Mary Symonds have been demonstrating. They have been plodding through old issues of the Cambridge Chronicle between 1784 and 1912 and have come up with some most interesting snippets of parish news relating to Horningsea and Clayhithe. For example in July 1819 when a Samuel Beales was accused of assaulting a woman, giving her a black eye and kicking her. But, it was explained: the women who worked for Mr Wheeler as osier peelers had their annual frolic that day and their master was so liberal that not one 'lady' of the party was sober. They began to fight amongst themselves, pulling off caps, and pulling hair until a pitched battle ensued. Samuel's wife was one of those involved in the melee and he decided it was time for her to come home, but Alice Green set about him for breaking up the fun. He did not retaliate, but his wife did, taking advantage of her husband's intervention to black her adversary's eye. [SCAN OF HORNINGSEA]

The opening of coprolite works in the village brought additional workers in each morning, many from Waterbeach. But first they had to cross the Cam. In March 1872 the usual crowd of men was waiting to cross just before 7 o'clock in the morning. There were eight men packed on the small ferry boat when another man jumped on board and his weight caused the boat to capsize, throwing the men into the water. James Beasley, who worked as engineer for the Conservators of the River Cam saw several men floating in the river and launched his boat to rescue them. He pulled out two, but one of them had been in the water for ten minutes by then. He took the man to the stable and the doctor rubbed his chest with salt and brandy, but to no avail and the 38-year-old worker was pronounced dead.

This added to pressure for a proper bridge at Clayhithe. A meeting had been called back in October 1870 when there had been talk of petitioning Parliament for an Act to enable the construction of three bridges, one at Essex's Ferry, Chesterton, the second across Midsummer Common at Cambridge and the third at Clayhithe. But they decided to press ahead with the latter first as it was needed so badly. There had been various incidents when threshing machines or loaded farm carts got stuck while being ferried across. They got their Act, people came forward to take shares in the new Clayhithe Bridge Company, and the bridge opened on 7th October 1875, charging a toll for all who crossed. They also invested in the adjoining hotel, improving the grounds and making it one of the prettiest places in the county. A new dancing saloon was created and the field alongside made suitable for enjoyment. By 1876 Alfred Mason was choosing it as a suitable venue to give his 50 labourers a celebration feast on the occasion of his marriage. In 1938 the tolls were removed after the County Council bought the bridge; they erected a new bridge the following year. Copies of the 'Horningsea and Clayhithe Chronicle' cost £6.50 plus postage from Miss P. Symonds, 34 Station Road, Fulbourn CB1 5ES [SCAN OF ERECTING BRIDGE; SCAN OF BRIDGE HOTEL]

Other tolls were payable at various places in the county, including the Somersham Road at Chatteris, as Joan Robinson recalled in 1992: "I remember an uncle and aunt of mine used to go to Bedford quite often from Chatteris and they come to the Somersham Toll when it was 6d. It was 6d each way if you were not local and didn't live in Chatteris. The people that had the Toll, they were brother and sister Dyson, and he was very keen on his six pen'orth you know! He used to sit up and wait for uncle - the rogue - to go back in the evening, and uncle would deliberately stay as late as he could, you know, so he wouldn't have to pay anything, because half the time he used to leave the gate open. He was very keen and I remember one Sunday they came, and I went out to them and there on the running board (they had running boards, didn't they, for cars all those years ago), and there on the running board was the 6d and they must have passed it out of the window and Dyson missed it, and it had dropped on the running board - so he didn't get that one!" More of Joan's recollections are included in "We're the characters now": an oral history of Chatteris which can be borrowed from libraries. More and more people it seems are looking to forsake the bustle of the town for the tranquillity of the countryside. Television programmes seek out quaint country cottages for stressed city dwellers anxious to experience the quiet life for themselves – a world where things are like it used to be. But even though cottages may not have changed from the outside the way of life lived in them has. Homes where large families were common now accommodate just one or two people.

And village life was not always quiet and peaceable, as Elizabeth Luck and Mary Symonds have been demonstrating. They have been plodding through old issues of the Cambridge Chronicle between 1784 and 1912 and have come up with some most interesting snippets of parish news relating to Horningsea and Clayhithe. Elsewhere some ferries have been replaced by bridges, as at Twentypence on the road between Wilburton and Cottenham, whilst others, as at Overcote have disappeared and modern travellers now face long journeys as a result, costing far more than the few pence charged by the ferryman. From around the world readers have been responding to 'Memories' articles

June & Tony Wilson have e-mailed from Canada, having just received a copies of Memories for 19th February sent by their friend Joan Berry who lives in Gwydir Street, Cambridge. June was born at the Gwydir Arms where her grandmother, Amelia Newman, was the landlady, back in 1931. She lived there with her parents, Cecil and Dorothy Brown for about three years. In 1950 June was working as a telephonist at the Post Office in St Andrew's Street which is where she met her husband, Tony, an engineer. They married and moved into two rooms in York Street but had to find larger premises when their daughter Lesley came along and moved back to Gwydir Street. Then five years later it was off to Canada.

All that is fresh in their memory; but what they can't remember is what was showing at the Regal Cinema on the night of their first 'date' on Friday 10th March 1950. I have checked the back issues of the News to see what was on. It was 'Your Witness' starring Robert Montgomery, Patricia Wayne & Leslie Banks with 'The Man in Black' with Betty Ann Davies, Sidney James and Hazel Penwarden as the supporting film [SCAN OF ADVERT]

The Memories article for 19th March has found its way out to Nita Elsley in South Australia; she writes: The article 'Picturing life in the fens' fascinated me, as I lived in Cambridge until I came to Australia in 1951. I worked at the Co-op in Mill Road and remember old Bowie Odell who used to sweep out chimneys, he was brother to the Odell who used to sell veggies". Nita has asked about copies of my 'Memory Lane, Cambridge' book, which are now getting hard to find - but of course the new one 'Vanishing Cambridgeshire' is available from the News as well as bookshops

Angeline van Sambeek lives in Holland; her husband is Dennis Clifford Mayes whose family speak about a tapestry made around 1935 for King George V that was designed by his uncle Clifford Barber. The family has no documentation about the tapestry but have been told that I featured it some years ago. The Cambridge Tapestry Company built up a great reputation for the quality of their repair work to valuable old tapestries and for the production of “period” panels from premises Cambridge Quayside. They employed some 80 girls working in the tapestry section, while another 80 did needlepoint. Tapestries used to be brought in from around the world to be repaired, having been cut about where they had been fixed on walls. Some needed great research to piece them together again. In 1934 Lord Fairhaven commissioned a completely modern design for Anglesey Abbey, near Lode. It was to depict the Abbey as seen from the air, with a view of the surrounding countryside, including the Jockey Club at Newmarket, St Ives, Ely & the Cambridge University Library. Various visitors used to tour the works including Queen Mary who arrived in 1934 and commented on the beauty of the Fairhaven tapestry. Next year personal friends of King George V and Queen Mary commissioned the firm to design and weave a tapestry of Windsor Castle for presentation to Their Majesties as a Jubilee gift. Although the King did not live to see the completed panel, the preliminary drawings were submitted to him and he commanded it should hang in the Guard’s Chamber at the Castle. Queen Mary visited again in 1936 to see the work in progress, and to count every window in the tapestry to make sure they were all in place. The Cambridge Tapestry Works closed in 1941. There is a snap showing the Windsor tapestry with the artist – who might be Angeline’s long-forgotten relation [SCAN]

Memories 30th April 2003, by Mike Petty

Tomorrow is May Day, but will you be celebrating or is this just one more tradition that has been lost.

The obituaries for May Day customs have been written many times over the years; as the News lamented in May 1897: “May Day is the name of a holiday that calls up all sorts of pretty rustic associations. In Cambridge the first day of the merry month is a most unromantic reality. A few small children straggle about the streets with more or less pretentious garlands and a Jack-in-the-Green may occasionally be caught sight of, but beyond this May Day in Cambridge is a memory of the past”.

But at a recent meeting at Cambridge Motor Boat Club people were recalling May Day celebrations at Stapleford and ‘Memories’ correspondents have reminisced about how schools used to choose a May Queen and her attendants or dance around the Maypole. [SCANS OF MAY QUEENS AT MELBOURN PLACE SCHOOL 1942 AND MILTON ROAD SCHOOL 1952]

However other celebrations do seem to have disappeared. At Rampton in 1988 they kept alive the tradition of May Day collecting when girls in long dresses and wearing flower garlands followed their May Queen in the May Ladies procession. It was thought to be the only survivor of the ancient customs that once flourished in Cambridgeshire.

The traditional plant associated with May Day was hawthorn, with its May blossom. In 1910 at Over young men gathered bunches of May and pushed them through the open windows of village girls, reciting:

Arise, arise my pretty fair maid
And take your May branch in
For in the morn it may be gone
And you will say I brought you none

At Great Gransden lads would get up early and leave a hawthorn branch at the door of their favourite lass returning the following evening to the houses where they had left the branches. One of them, called the May Lord, wore a shirt decorated with ribbon over his ordinary clothes, another was dressed in girls' clothes and was known as the May Lady, while the rest also wore ribbons in their hats. They sang a May song and collected money for a feast. In Waterbeach the young men left other plants; a branch of blackthorn, a branch of elder or a bunch of nettles signified their displeasure of loose women or nags whilst the favoured few found a branch of whitethorn planted by their cottage door.

At Stetchworth in the 1920s an old elm tree at the junction of Church Lane and Main Street was decorated on May Day and formed the centre for May games and festivities.

May 1st was a day associated with sweeps, the day when the boys who had to climb inside chimneys to clean them out had a holiday. At Whittlesford part of the Mayday celebrations was the reciting of a rhyme which started

First and second and third of May
Are chimney sweeps' dancing days

Until the start of the 1900s chimney sweeps wearing top hats took an important part in the May Day festivities. At Melbourn a procession of dancers was led by 'Jack in the Green', the local sweep, who walked through the village in a framework of tree boughs, with bells on his legs.

But one of the county's most popular traditions was May Dolling, which continued in some villages until the late 1930s. Village girls dressed up their best dolls and covered them with cloth. They asked villagers if they would like to see the May Ladies and the dolls would be uncovered for a small gift of money or sweets. Mabel Demaine recalled how at Haddenham "On May 1st the girls went Mayladying, carrying dolls; they knocked on the doors and greeted everyone with 'Please can you spare a copper for a Maylady'. My mother would not allow me to go Mayladying. She said it was only a form of begging, but how I envied the other girls who were able to take part, especially when they told me of their financial results. This collecting was supposed to end at midday and so the little girls often stayed away from school in the morning, going from door to door". Its thought that this was last carried out at Swaffham Prior about 1960, though by then the collecting of money had been forbidden.

Other villages had a more elaborate ceremony. At Toft an old lady recalled how two hoops were bent over and a doll placed inside. The cage and doll were covered with a white cloth. A rope was stretched over the road from one tree to another and the hoops suspended on it. Then on May morning girls gathered at the spot and as anyone passed the rope was lowered and a request made for money for showing the doll.

The double hoops were also used at Whittlesford, but there they were garlanded with flowers and carried around the village by girls aged up to 12 or 13 years old. At Hildersham about 1918, it was reported that the doll was formed from 'Mrs Jordan's wire skirt frame covered and dressed as a doll with Miss Goodwin's ribbons'.

Half a century earlier a writer described other celebrations in the villages around Huntingdon: "The May garland is composed of tulips, anemones, cowslips, kingcups, lilacs, laburnum, meadow-orchids, wallflowers, primroses and as many roses as possible. These are made into a huge pyramidal garland from the front of which a gaily-dressed doll called Madame Flora stares vacantly. From the base hang ribbons, silk handkerchiefs and other gay fabric. [SCAN OF DOLL IN A HOOP AT CAMBRIDGE 1904]

"On May Day morning the May Queen is chosen by her schoolfellows. She wears a white frock, gloves and veil, with a crown of flowers. The garland is carried by two maids of honour and with other male and female attendants she tours the village and before some of the houses the company sing and collect money to pay for the Coronation Banquet, usually held in the schoolroom.

“After this a rope is drawn from chimney to chimney or tree to tree and the garland suspended from the rope. The children throw balls backwards and forwards over the rope. Games and sport are played and are concluded with a dance to flute or violin”

On May Day 1976 the centre of Cambridge was filled with the biggest celebration for years when 300 schoolchildren joined in a traditional gathering around maypoles on Parker’s Piece and other localities. They were accompanied by Morris dancers from Cambridge, Thaxted and Wicken, sword dancers, folk dancers and dance bands. Jack-in-the-green was there, together with Lord Sweep in full morning dress, and his ‘wife’ “Lady Sweep”, together with their ragged “children”, banging noisily on dustbin lids. The dolls in their hoops were there, together with a Morris fertility cake baked by seven maidens. And whilst all this was going on a University degree procession of graduates in full academic dress was escorted by police through a maypole dance in Petty Cury.

At Burrough Green it was said that the statutes a boy and girl on the old school came to life and danced on the village green. Their footsteps were sometimes spotted in the dew. But not everybody was merry on May Day morning, for in the fens it was believed that if you went out too early you would see the ghosts of all those who had been drowned that year in the fen dykes.

Mrs Una Grainger, (nee Beeton) has written from Lt Wilbraham following Roy Sharp’s memories of the Caravan Mission to Village Children. She remembers Mr & Mrs Varney who ran the Mission & has a photograph of many of the village children that attended. Most have now passed away but she can name virtually all of them, including Ron Frost, Bill Frankin, Ethel Middleditch & Eileen, June, Joy and Brenda Dawson. Una is behind the ‘N’ of the Mission banner but she can’t recall the name of the lad just in front of her [SCAN OF MISSION PIC]

Did you respond to a request in the News for people who had spent their childhood in an orphanage or workhouse to share their memories with a lady in Lancashire who was compiling a book. If so you may be interested to hear that ‘Silent Tears’ is now available from the author, Mrs J.M. Shanksy of 27 Birch Avenue, Penwortham, Preston, Lancs, PR1 0PB for £7.50 including postage.

Last week’s photos in the ‘News’ of pickpockets in action is not the first time law-breakers have found themselves caught by the camera

Ralph Warboys from Oakington was snapped law-breaking by the Cambridge Independent Press back in September 1934, but any hope that his misdemeanour might be by now forgotten was dispelled when he was perusing the 'Cambridgeshire Explorer' CD-Rom of the 1904 Kelly's Directory of Cambridgeshire and found the picture included amongst the 1600-odd others. But Ralph is not ashamed of what he did, as he explains:

"Mains water did not come to Oakington until 1938 and not every house was connected to the mains until after the War. At our end of the village a ground water supply was not available, as the subsoil is clay for a great depth. Two pumps, one at Croft Lane and another at the junction of High Street and Water Lane were supplied with water from a well on Manor Farm.

"When I lived at 71 Longstanton Road water would be fetched from the Croft Lane pump for drinking purposes, my father cycling to the pump with a pail on each handlebar of his bicycle. We used rainwater collected in tanks for normal washing purposes or to supply livestock. But when this was exhausted my brother or I would be sent to the pump with a water barrow and would fill it with water from the pump, my father cycling down 10 minutes or so later to pull it back as we were not strong enough.

"It will be noticed that this pump has two spouts. By turning off the tap on the bottom spout, water would come out of the top spout and by means of a suitable trough, could fill a farm water cart. A trick we boys would play on unsuspecting town cousins would be to turn off the tap on the bottom spout and get them to look up the spout while we pumped with the handle and they would suddenly be deluged with water coming out of the top spout!

"In 1934 a drought caused other water supplies to run short and the Parish Council, fearing their would not be enough for human needs, put a notice on the pump stating it was to be used for domestic purposes only. But my father could not stand by and see his livestock to suffer and continued to use the water. This attracted the attention of other residents, and the matter got into the press with a letter written – supposedly by the pump itself."

Part of this read: 'My nearby neighbour is a humble thatched cottage, occupied by a peaceful, thrifty couple, the smallest of our hard-working smallholders. A passing cloud has darkened the lintel of their doorway, for behold, a jealous vigilant eye detected this small man in the act of drawing a pail of water to mitigate the cry of his thirsty pig while his neighbours, the large holders, allowed their swine and cattle to fare sumptuously every day. The might and majesty of the law was invoked and the mobilisation of the County Police Force threatened'.

But no police came and Ralph's father continued to keep his animals alive, as did fellow villager, Len Missen, now in his nineties who is seen filling his water barrow, with Ralph waiting his turn in the foreground [SCAN OF OAKINGTON PUM SHOWING RALPH WARBOYS (FOREGROUND) & LEN MISSON; SCAN OF NEWSPAPER ARTICLE FROM SEPTEMBER 1934]

Mitcham's Corner is in the news once more following the proposals for major resurfacing which will close the busy junction for some time at the end of May.

Don Unwin from Cambridge remembers the original layout; he writes:

"As I lived in Magrath Avenue I went to Milton Road School and I well remember the Island being built complete with the under-ground public lavatories. In those days the low volume of traffic enabled a visit to be made without loss of life! On the corner of Chesterton Road and Victoria Road was a water stand pipe and I used to watch the horse drawn water carts filling up in readiness for sprinkling the road to lay the dust. Also recalled (just) was the police station on the corner of Milton Road and Chesterton Road later replaced by a police box. Was it later replaced by one of those blue police call boxes with a flashing lamp on top like the one that used to stand in Sidney Street?”, Don asks. The police station which stood at the end of the terrace of houses was demolished in January 1930; it and its replacement are shown in photographs taken by Ted Mott. [SCAN OF MITCHAMS CORNER POLICE STATION AND THE POLICE BOX THAT REPLACED IT IN 1930; SCAN OF A POLICE CALL BOX IN SIDNEY STREET, 1973]

Don continues: “My Mum who did a lot of dressmaking used to shop frequently at Mitcham's for all sorts of materials and haberdashery. After I married my wife also used to patronise the shop for the same sort of things. During the 1960s I was building a long case clock with a music train to play a tune at each hour. For this I needed a particular type of domestic pin so I went along to Mitcham's armed with a micrometer and a magnet. The lady assistant seemed a little surprised when I asked to test the pins to see if they were magnetic, as it was essential that I had steel not brass pins. Having picked out the steel ones they were measured with the micrometer as I needed those close to 0.03" in diameter. The assistant was very patient, helpful, interested to know what I wanted them for and found me a box of 200”.

John Scruby from Milton has been hard at work tracking down ‘Botany House’, following Mrs Law’s request for help in locating the home in Milton where her husband was evacuated. After talking to various long-term residents he has tracked it down to no.71 Cambridge Road and even sent her some modern snaps.

Last week’s Memories of May Day have brought an instant response from Helen Coppen of Burrough Green who tells me that the tradition continues at their school with flowers, dancing, crowning the May Queen and a number of May characters including the green man, the chimney sweep, a whistler to sweep away the winter spirit and a jester. It ends with a procession around the village by the children giving out flowers.

Mrs Hazel Howe from Fulbourn saw her sister, Peggy Tabor, amongst the children at the Central Girls' School, Melbourn Place in 1942. Peggy was the Daffodil Queen and was dressed in yellow and green with a crown made of cowslips. "Being a little younger than my sister and as this was quite a special day for our family, I was allowed to go along with my parents and watch. The maypole dance still sticks in my memory", she adds. But, she wonders, where did they find the material for make such pretty dresses during the dark days of the Second World War

Finding material for costumes is one thing, making them is something else. And when you have costumes, a script, actors and a stage then you have a performance. And what a performance it can be to put it all together. In 1951 some ex-pupils of the Cambridgeshire High School for Boys, now the Hills Road College, formed an all-male revue group called the Pied Pipers. Their first productions were entitled 'Over the Hills' and 'The Gogs Go Gay' – which you could say in those days. But then they moved on to more elaborate productions in grander venues such as the ADC Theatre and the Arts. They acquired a name – the Pied Pipers Musical Theatre Club – and have been entertaining audiences ever since. Now Rex Freeman, who has been involved with the group since its formation, has produced a history which includes not only every performance, but names every performer, be it in front of house, in the orchestra, or backstage. So if you were a juggler in Carousel in 1982, Marley's Ghost in the 1966 production of A Christmas Carol, set designer for Sweeney Todd or a bit player in Barnum then you're in the book. And if you'd rather people did not know then you'd best get down to David's Bookshop in St Edward's Passage and buy-up the entire print run at £5 a copy, or contact Rex freeman on Cambridge 504821 [SCAN OF PART OF ALPHABETICAL LIST OF CAST AND CREW, SCAN OF PERFORMANCES]

Memories, 14th May 2003, by Mike Petty

Jane Becker has e-mailed me from Toronto, Canada. She writes: "I was very interested to read your article from the end of February about Mill Road Maternity Hospital, Cambridge. I have lived in Toronto for the past thirty years but grew up in Willingham. I understand that the Maternity Hospital opened in December 1948 or January 1949. I was born there on 3rd January 1949 and am wondering whether I may have been the first to be born there!"

It seems not.

The hospital was built in 1838 as a workhouse, an institution for the aged, the poor and the homeless and was administered by the Guardians of the Poor of the Cambridge Union. They had the job of undertaking a massive reform of the poor law system, amalgamating various parish workhouses into one new Union. It was a process that evoked much hostility and many protests before Mill Road Union opened with 250 places for 'prostitutes, spinning girls, vulgar youths, unruly vagabonds and rogues'.

Between 1838 and 1906 it evolved into an institution which places less emphasis on correction and custody and more on rehabilitation and care. By the turn of the century it was known as the Poor Law Infirmary with a largely elderly population who were both sick and destitute.

In 1906 a Voluntary Association for Maternity and Child Welfare was set up with a milk kitchen in Newmarket Road and a few destitute mothers who had given birth were cared for among the geriatrics at the Mill Road Workhouse, as it had then become known. This was its first connection with maternity services of any kind. It continued as a Poor Law Infirmary and Workhouse until 1930 when responsibility passed to the County Council and it became the County Municipal Infirmary.

It catered for the infirm, the able-bodied but homeless and had a nursery for children up to the age of five. Some huts at the back were for the tuberculosis patients, with a handful of beds for mothers in childbirth 'needful of confinement'.

The Public Health Act of 1936 firmly consolidated Mill Road in its hospital role and all workhouse activities ceased; the county council decided to develop the maternity side and established 20 beds for this purpose. Within three years the number of births had rocketed from 93 to 300. But not all the babies left to go home with their mothers, as one nurse recalled: "All the girls that had 'done wrong; had babies out of marriage, had to have the baby on ward 7 which was then adopted and then they were found a job in service. So you never saw your baby. The mothers were put in ladies' houses as maids. After having the baby they'd work in the laundry or the kitchen or on the wards until they were found a place in service". And not all the babies survived: "Years ago if you had a still born baby there were no funerals for them, so it was put in a bag and the carpenter from the hospital would make a box and it was put on the wall between the hospital and the cemetery. If there was a funeral that day they'd notify them and the box was put in with whoever was being buried that day".

Progress as a maternity hospital was interrupted in 1939 by the coming of war and it was transformed into an 'A1 Hospital' under the government's Emergency Medical Scheme. All the patients were moved out to other hospitals to make way for the expected influx of wounded, bombing casualties and patients from East Coast hospitals who would be in danger from coastal invasion. At this time a 'temporary' theatre and X-ray block was set up in two wooden huts.

Some of the first war-wounded were soldiers from the Dunkirk beaches, still clutching rifles and ammunition belts, but then came a steady stream of casualties from the fighter and bomber bases. Civilians, including expectant mothers, were still catered for, but spent their month before delivery in hastily improved accommodation at Cheshunt College in Bateman Street. In 1944 births at the hospital topped 1,000 for the first time.

When the war ended the county council decided to turn the hospital into a maternity unit only, with all the specialist facilities such as premature baby unit, midwives and support staff. Plans were drawn up in 1946 for 150 beds but were shelved, as the 1948 National Health Service appeared imminent. When this did not have the feared upheaval the county council went ahead with their plans until on July 5th, 1948 it became officially known as 'The Maternity Hospital, Mill Road'

When Jane was born there it had 91 beds and a premature baby unit of six cots. But it still had a 24-bed female geriatric ward attached and it was not until 1965 that the geriatric patients were transferred to Chesterton Hospital. In 1961 the hospital's board of governors succeeded in getting the Ministry of Health to agree to a proposal to resite the Maternity Hospital, which was by now overcrowded, to the New Addenbrooke's Hospital. But delay succeeded delay.

Conditions in the hospital were difficult for mothers and midwives as the 1960s moved into the 1970, as the News reported:

An expectant mother entered Mill Road in one of two ways: through an archway of plastic urine bottles or under a boiler-house chimney stack. The urine-bottle archway lead her into the ante-natal clinic which she might have to attend many times before being admitted to actually have her baby. In the ante-natal clinic she would jostle for space with dozens of other mothers and give her personal details within earshot of whoever happened to be next to her. She might have to squeeze past other patients in the narrow corridors to take her urine sample to the little window. The corridors were bad enough for people of normal size to pass each other, but pregnancy made it almost impossible.

In the examination room she would be reluctant to answer the consultant's questions except in a whisper because her replies could be heard in the cubicle next door – separated only by a curtain. The atmosphere could be stifling, because apart from her there might be the consultant, a nurse and several trainee doctors crammed into the room. In the changing cubicles she had to stand facing one way because her enlarged size did not allow her to turn around in the space available. To be weighed she had to stand in the corner along with all the others by the nurses' office and try to keep out of the way of people moving to and fro.

It snowed-in s on patients in the X-ray department and the operating theatre had to be creosoted – it was still the wooden war-time shed. There was only one lavatory for a dozen pregnant women on the ward, one bath alongside the bed-pan sluices. Lucky mothers might get a bed in one of the pink and peeling wards that had been condemned as below standard a decade before, perhaps just three feet from a bed with an abortion patient in it, no-one could be choosy.

But the hospital had the most modern equipment, it enjoyed the lowest peri-natal mortality rate in the country and attracted patients from all over East Anglia. In 1979 they delivered nearly 4,000 babies, many of whom would never have made it elsewhere – about twice as many as hospitals elsewhere.

In 1980 conditions at the hospital were debated in the House of Commons and it was announced that rebuilding would start within the decade, and with luck be completed by 1991. The prospect of another ten years of such primitive conditions were horrendous and a benefactor, David Robinson intervened to offer finance to allow a new hospital, the Rosie to be established by 1983. Mill Road Maternity hospital closed its doors and was refurbished as Ditchburn Place, a model sheltered housing scheme with facilities far removed from workhouse dormitories or labour wards.

Memories 21st May 2003, by Mike Petty

Think of the Old Vicarage, Grantchester and two names come immediately to mind. One of that of a millionaire author, currently residing elsewhere; the other is that of a poet who, although commemorated on the village war memorial, was never more than a lodger and whose final resting place is far away.

But there is a third name, one who has left a more permanent reminder of his time at the house, but who has been largely forgotten. Now Samuel Page Widnall has been brought back into the spotlight through the publication of a new book by another Grantchester resident, Lady Christine Jennings.

Long before Grantchester's Orchard had honey for tea the village was famous to horticulturists; for it was here that Samuel's father, also Samuel, had established a nursery specialising in dahlias. By 1830 he could offer over 160 varieties of double dahlias, which he claimed were 'not surpassed by any other collection in the kingdom' and his friendship with the curator of the University Botanic Garden ensured samples of the newest discoveries could be shared.

As the business expanded, with more and more greenhouses, so his fame increased and more and more visitors flocked to Grantchester. As he became more prosperous Samuel senior found outlets for his generosity, giving an annual treat for village schoolchildren, with tea and plum cake, bread and butter, consumed in a pasture opposite his nursery – the present Orchard Tea Garden.

Samuel Page Widnall grew up in Grantchester; he got to know its buildings, the cottages, the church and the Vicarage which was too small, damp and inconvenient for somebody as important as the Vicar who, like others before preferred to live elsewhere. So the church built a New Vicarage and Samuel took the old one off their hands and turned it into a family home for himself and his new bride. He repaired and improved the building, developed the gardens and built a 'Castle' – or at least a ruin of one, made of clay bricks, with carved heads and a crenellated tower. [SCAN OF NEWS PICTURE OF THE FOLLY TAKEN IN MAY 1965]

Christine Jennings charts the story of life and times in the Old Vicarage as Widnall decided, like others after him, to turn his hand to writing. He wrote 'The Miller's Daughter', seeking inspiration from the mill just along the river. He had no problem finding a publisher, for he printed and illustrated it himself. Subsequently he produced an African adventure novel, illustrated with impressions of flying dragons.

But Widnall also turned his attention to the area around his home; he wrote and published his reminiscences of Trumpington, a gossiping stroll around Cambridge and a History of Grantchester itself. For this he needed no imaginary images as he had actual photographs that he had taken himself, which he printed and stuck into each copy of the book. [SCAN OF WIDNALL PICTURE OF GRANTCHESTER CHURCH]

Samuel Page Widnall was one of the county's pioneer amateur photographers, rejoicing in its paraphernalia of camera, lens, tripod, and chemicals for fixing and varnishing the glass plates. He needed a studio to process his negatives and his ruined castle folly proved ideal.

Throughout the 1850s and 1860s Samuel snapped his family and friends, took his camera on holiday to Wales, wandered out to Haslingfield and into Grantchester, producing some of the earliest photographs of any Cambridgeshire village. But much of what he photographed remains unknown; a gothic folly beside a river is subject to damp and to flooding and while Widnall knew the significance of each glass negative to others they were just so much junk.

After his death the old Vicarage once more drifted into decay. In 1908 it was let furnished to a couple who took a lodger, Rupert Brooke. He found it "a deserted, lonely, dank, ruined, overgrown, gloomy, lovely house ... it is a fit place to write my kind of poetry in". Hidden under a shroud of ivy in the garden was a decaying, romantic folly.

After the Great War the Vicarage was put up for sale and the 'Ruined Castle' was indeed a ruin, part had collapsed and the upper floors were unsafe. George Rogers, a local lad, took the opportunity to explore; squeezing inside the Castle he recalled: "In a small room we found hundreds of photographic plates that were of little interest to us". When the new owners finally got round to investigating they found just pieces of old broken glass. The gardener however had known the importance of glass plate negatives: if you washed off the blackness you could get plain pieces of glass that were ideal for repairing greenhouses, or making cold frames. So he had removed a number of them to his garden shed, where they were discovered some sixty years later. Several of these pictures are now published for the first time in the book. 'Widnall: a capital contriver' by Christine Jennings is published by Folly Press of Swavesey at £20. ISBN 0-9544818-0-1

Another pile of photographic curiosities was discovered some 20 years ago in the basement of Botolph House, Cambridge headquarters of the Workers' Educational Association. There were boxes and boxes of glass lantern slides, the forerunner of the colour transparency, many of them of scenes abroad. Detective work established they had been taken by Percy Salmon. The son of a Cambridge policeman he had started photography as a hobby as a lad of 12 and in 1891 won the Cambridge Camera club cup for the best set of five photographs taken in and around the town.

Percy achieved many other awards including a Fellowship of the Royal Photographic Society in 1898 who elected him an Honorary Member fifty years later. By then he had retired to live in Melbourn where his interest in photography continued with many lectures illustrated by his lantern slides, and his journalist skills were exercised as village correspondent for the "Cambridge Independent Press".

Percy Salmon died in August 1959 but in November last year Mr M.J. Coles of Oakington was sorting through a pile of material and discovered a notebook. It had been compiled by Percy and it recorded not only his photographic outings but a mass of miscellaneous information about activities in and around Melbourn between 1932 and 1954. The retirement of Fred Winter from the bakery in May 1948, the erection of a telephone kiosk at the Elm Tree in October 1934 and Mrs Hitch's chimney fire in June 1929 all find a mention. But there was also an amount of genealogical information which has proved especially valuable to another 'Memories' correspondent, Stephen Martin from Harrow.

Stephen had contacted me in November 2001 to say he had discovered a pile of other material compiled by Salmon, copies of which he has now sent. They include a series of articles published in the Cambridgeshire Weekly News in which Salmon describes how on May 6th 1898 he was in Jerusalem, bribing his way into the Mosque of Omar with his camera and making more than 50 exposures. Some of these may be amongst those glass lantern slides which are now in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Lion Yard Library, Cambridge. [SCAN OF SALMON PHOTO OF FRUIT CART AT MELBOURN]

Now another reader is seeking assistance in tracking down some information on old photographers. Linda Gooch has e-mailed with some copies of photographs that belong to her mother, Mrs Eileen Mansfield. Two show anonymous groups of men but the third is more interesting. It seems to show some workers in the Lensfield Road area of Cambridge, with Hobson's Conduit in the background. They were taken by a photographer named T. Whiffin, who I have come across before. Can anybody add any information about the scene or the man who photographed it. [SCAN OF PICTURE OF WORKMEN BY T. WHIFFIN]

By co-incidence this morning's post has brought a letter from Catherine Moubrary, who discovered a collection of Kidd and Baker photographs that I featured in Memories last summer. She is continuing her research into that firm and has tracked down one of two more of the pictures they took, but could still do with more information. [WHAT'S FOR TEA - SCAN OF SPECTATORS AT MAY RACES BY KIDD AND BAKER]

Pictures do not have to be that old to be interesting. Ivan Wallman from Impington has sent me a snap of the Trinity Foot public house at the Swavesey turn as decorated for the Coronation celebrations of 1953. This was one way people celebrated, others organised or participated in sports or other activities. Do you have any snaps that I could feature in a future Memories, and what do you remember of that wet June day? Please send them to me at the News. Memories 28th May 2003

Fifty years ago this week preparations were being put in place for a most exciting event: the Coronation of Queen Elizabeth II

It had been a terrible start to the year, surely this would transform it

There'd been the trauma of the East Coast floods when a severe northerly 113 mile per hour gale had caused high tides that had devastated Kings Lynn and Hunstanton where the sea smashed a 90-yard gap through the sea wall on the South Beach leaving a trail of destruction.

It had swept away nearly all the holiday bungalows on the mile-long beach connecting Hunstanton with Heacham – leaving dozens of dead in its wake. A Cambridge woman had spent a night of terror in her holiday home - a converted boat at Heacham. She'd had to clamber on to the roof & spent five hours in the middle of a roaring ocean until tide finally went down she waded to safety. An appeal for assistance to for those made homeless had seen Cambridge in the forefront of sorting, sifting and sending masses of clothing from hangars at Madingley, and receiving a visit from the Queen Elizabeth, the new Queen's mother.

Another Royal mother had died. Queen Mary had been a frequent visitor to Stanley Woolstons antique shop in Cambridge where she collected items for her dolls house and was much loved in the City. She had been with her husband when he opened the University Library in 1934. [SCAN OF THE UNIVERSITY LIBRARY 1934] Now that library was being visited by the first head of a Communist state to visit Britain. The most stringent measures were put in place when Tito, newly elected President of Yugoslavia, toured the building. His visit had been marred by dramatic events at Duxford airfield. Along with much of the top brass of the Royal Air Force he had witnessed an air display during which a formation of meteor jets swept past him, each pilot giving the "eyes left" salute to the President, who saluted back. But seconds later two of the jets had touched and crashed to the ground in flames. The distinguished party witnessed the tragedy and walked back to their cars when there was a sudden triple bang and whine above the low cloud - a Hawker Hunter had smashed the sound barrier.

The county had other Royal visitors. Prince Akihito, the Crown Prince of Japan had paid a short private visit to the University Library where he was shown the Japanese collection of 30,000 volumes, one of the best collections outside Japan, while King Hussain of Jordan had toured the colleges after visiting Pest Control of Bourn, where he'd inspected a specially designed sprayer fitted to a dummy camel, one answer to the locust problem his country was experiencing.

Other research was underway at the Cavendish Laboratory, though what this 'DNA' was that Crick and Watson were celebrating was beyond most Cambridge people. They were more concerned about the removal of six zebra crossings, because the council could not afford the cost of fitting them with the flashing lights that were now compulsory. The globes had been declared 'undergraduate proof' when first installed – a claim quickly proved false

In 1953 change was in the air and an old tradition was being abandoned with the formal announcement that the Mortar boards were no longer to be compulsory undergraduate wear - they cost a £1 & were neither beautiful nor useful. They had been an encumbrance, to be pushed hurriedly into a man's pocket once the cardboard stiffening removed. In fact the custom had been dead for some time and could not now be resurrected. [SCAN OF STUDENT WEARING MORTAR BOARD]

Also destined for the scrap heap were the old Assize courts on Castle Hill Cambridge, the former headquarters of county government. They were old and decrepit and riddled with dry rot. The County Council wanted to demolish them and rebuild on the site, but they looked picturesque with their figures standing high on the roof looking over the town and the City Council were objecting. [SCAN OF ASSIZE COURTS] But they too had a structure they wanted to demolish – the Market Hill fountain. It would cost over £2,000 to repair the canopy with its figures but it too was crumbling. Although it was to prove the centrepiece for coronation decorations it would disappear shortly afterwards as both were removed. [SCAN OF MARKET HILL FOUNTAIN]

But by late May flags were fluttering in the breeze, decorations in traditional colours lined the streets, and there were special shop window displays, giving Cambridge the Coronation look. The city centre was a scene of gaiety and colour, heralding the approach of the great event. In roads radiating from the centre, decorations to shops and other buildings were being arranged, but the majority of householders were preferring to wait a little longer. The cost of decorations was an important consideration for many and consequently the emphasis was on effect rather than on elaboration [SCAN OF DECORATIONS ON CAMBRIDGE MARKET HILL]

Cambridge shops reported that many of the Coronation souvenirs were selling quite well with pottery mugs and beakers (from 1s.11d to 4s.) one of the best sellers. Framed photographs and statuettes of the Queen were proving popular, as were key rings with a tiny replica of the Coronation chair on its chain. It was anticipated there would be a revival of interest in Coronation souvenirs long after it was over. People would suddenly realise that a great historical event had taken place and they had not got a memento of it & rush to buy before it is too late.

Some souvenirs would be gone by then, including the Coronation sausages created by Derek Traylen of Newmarket Road. He had been painting his shop front blue, with a white and red fascia when his wife commented on the pleasing effect. "Pity we can't apply this colour scheme to the something else" she said and Mr Traylen looked hard at the strings of sausages. "Why not the sausages. We could dip the skins in vegetable dye and have a special Coronation line". He advertised them in the CDN and received a phone call from a journalist in Glasgow. Then came other enquiries from Manchester, the 'Daily Mirror' and 'Empire News' while the 'Meat Traders Journal' came out with a cartoon. Customers were delighted, but somewhat apprehensive with regard to the blue sausages.

But for those who were actually going to be at Westminster Abbey preparation was essential. Vogue's of St Andrew's Street had sold a dress to be worn in Westminster Abbey on Coronation Day by a Cambridge resident. It was an afternoon dress of pure silk, priced at 65 guineas. "We are absolutely thrilled, it is a great honour", said Mr M. Harris, the proprietor. They had also sold three evening gowns to be worn at Coronation balls in London connected with the Court.

Throughout the county, as around the Kingdom, preparations were being put in place. They were even planning to celebrate at Ely – well they had too after the earlier fuss. For Ely council had not proclaimed the Queen's accession on 8th February 1952 and its citizens had protested feeling the breach of traditional to be a slur on the status and history of the city of Ely. So the High Sheriff had made a special visit to read it on 15 March, by which time the proceedings had made the national news and Gaumont British sent cameramen to record ceremony. This time there would be a cathedral service, a procession and tableaux with a band concert dance until 2 am, a torchlight procession and fireworks - and children would be given a souvenir book "Elizabeth our Queen" written by Richard Dimpleby

So all was nearly ready for the great event on June 2nd. All that was needed was good weather – and the sun would shine, wouldn't it?

William Heffer e-mails from Cambridge with another chapter in the story of the Old Vicarage, Grantchester: "In 1976 I was called in by the then owner, Peter (Dudley) Ward who was about to move out of the Old Vicarage. I was shown, and ended up buying, a large quantity of items, boxes of steelyards, brass candlesticks, armour parts and much more, which had been bought by Peter from the clearance of an antique shop in Peas Hill many years before. I believe the shop was run by a Mr Turpin (I remember Lady Hinsley telling me tales of the amazing things she found there). They were all still in the boxes in which he had removed them, rusting and mouldering, but, needless to say they all sold well in 1976! The building at that time was very derelict and not in use”

Colin Cook from Upper Tything in Worcestershire writes:

“I am a native of Cambridge although I have not lived there for many years. I was a pupil at the Cambridgeshire High School in the days of the formidable A B Mayne and, as a young man, a teacher at Romsey School as was my mother in the earlier years of the twentieth century. I still have a fairly close connection with Cambridge & a friend is kind enough to send me clippings from the News. Your piece in the newspaper of April 9th brought back many memories of Mitcham's store. My mother shopped there often and, as a boy living in Haig Road and later Gilbert Road, I went with her. In those days it seemed to me to be a vast emporium which sold a wide range of goods. I was surprised that you did not mention the wonderfully alliterative notice which was painted on Mitcham's wall and which was clearly visible to passers by. It quite simply stated 'Famed For Fadeless Fabrics'. It remained visible for many years after the shop ceased trading, I can certainly remember it in the nineteen fifties and sixties.”

One man who would remember the sign is A.G. Lawrence from Cambridge who has lent me a picture of a Mitcham's staff outing to Clacton in the 1950s, showing himself, Mr Flack & Mr Williams with the ladies. [SCAN OF STAFF OUTING (85.01)]

Mary Fuller from Haverhill has discovered an even earlier photograph; it shows Sainsbury's shop in Sidney Street, Cambridge on the opening day in 1925. [SCAN OF SAINSBURY PHOTO]

Roy Stamp has e-mailed to seek your assistance. He writes: “We were at a party with some friends and, because of our ages, we were talking over old times and where we used to lived and a question came up that we could not answer: Why is Fen Ditton always referred to as the treacle mines?

I really don't have a clue, but have made a search for what readers have said about treacle in the past. George Dethridge from Bar Hill recalled:

“I attended the St Matthew's Infants School near York Street, which was very close to our home, so we all walked to and from school as just about every child did. I came home for lunch (we called it dinner time) and maybe had soup or jam sandwiches, or whatever mother had got me, usually something substantial to keep me going. Later schools started to supply dinner to pupils so we would then stay at school until going home time. Guess this pleased mum as we would not be under her feet and she would have more time to do her chores about the home. We always went to school with a breakfast inside our tummy it was usually porridge covered in Golden Syrup (treacle) or sugar, topped with milk and again if you were lucky it would a new bottle of milk on the table with the cream at the top. If you were first down for breakfast you got the cream and that would cause resentment amongst the rest of the family because the milk left was rather like cloudy water.”

The late Beatrice Stevens recorded something similar in her Feast of Memories of Stretham: “During the war years poverty and scarcity went hand in hand, at least, for ordinary people. We heard of men who ‘had done well’ out of the war, but for most families it was getting along as well as possible with what was available. Mothers of large families- and most of the families in our village were large - were used to making do with little money, and with their own flour and fresh fruit in the summer they made enormous puddings which often provided the whole dinner. They were served at the beginning of the meal, and if meat and vegetables were cooked these would be for “topping up.”

In our house we always had a substantial pudding. It might have a fresh fruit filling, rhubarb in April, followed by gooseberries in mid-May. Then came strawberries, (a luxury these), currants, red, white and black, and raspberries. Next came various varieties of plums, and apples, last of all, and these we had all through the winter. “An apple a day keeps the doctor away,” Father used to quote, and if this is true, we should never have seen the doctor. Apples were stored all over the house; boxes in the pantry and apples spread under the beds upstairs. We ate them raw and stewed, but best of all were the apple puddings, not made in a basin, but in a cloth, as round and almost as big as a football, dinner for seven or eight people. Ask any of our older villagers, and they will tell you of long jam rolls, spotted Dicks, a “nothing” pudding eaten with treacle, and, maybe, an onion roll, with scraps of bacon in it for extra flavour.

But there are other uses for treacle in some notes for dealing with plague in the fens in 1636 which, given the present concern over Sars, seems to have some modern resonance. Then the authorities were charged with viewing the dead bodies, burning bedding and hanging dogs.

The rules laid down: “If any die in any part of the town where doubt or suspicion may arise to be the plague, the body of that person not to be buried until it be viewed to the end that it is by the plague. Order may be taken to restrain the rest of the family from going abroad, and a cross to be set on the door. No person known to die of the plague shall be buried in the day time but either in the morning before sunrise or in the evening after sunset when most people are in their houses and at rest. And if none will carry them to the Church, then a horse and a sleigh to be provided for that purpose and the same to remain where the infected was buried last”

Anybody inflicted with the plague and unable to care for themselves were to be speedily conveyed into some out part of the town where few people visited. But those who could be left at home were to be supported by a collection which would go to the salaries and wages of people who would attend and wait upon them. If any inhabitants refused to pay his goods were to be distrained

If any market town was attacked then bakers butchers and other tradesmen of other places not infected, were to travel to the outskirts of the town to bring provisions . The some ‘trusty honest man’ would be appointed by the Minister to bring the food and place it in some convenient place where it could be reached the infected persons

The reference to treacle occurs in the section: “Mercers shall provide and have in readiness London treacle and Methridate (astringent narcotic) of the best and such other materials for medicine as is set down in the book as a direction for this time of visitation, and the same to sell for reasonable profit.

That year, 1636, King Charles I wrote to the Mayor of Cambridge and the Vice Chancellor of the University ordering them to forbid the holding of Midsummer Fair to ‘avoid the mischief from the contagion then raging in London’, which might be spread by those attending. He went on to order that the goods of Londoners or others be sold within the town or three miles of the same, which is just about Fen Ditton

Playford’s Soham Magazine for 1848 also mentions treacle in connection with a cure for fever: “As agues are so prevalent here, the most frugal and ready remedy, you will be surprised to hear, is the snuff of the candle. Strange as it may appear, it is now frequently used with great success. You may mix it with a little honey, treacle, or some other sweet that may disguise it, and you need not tell your patient what it is. Bark and snake root, mixed in beer or wine, is another remedy; but the most certain cure is the quinine, bark, which now most druggists know how to make up in proper quantities. It is, however, a very dear medicine. Cayenne pepper, or a large quantity of ginger taken in warm beer or spirits, often stops it at first.” [SCAN OF INSIDE LAURIE HAYNE’S SHOP NORFOLK STREET CAMBRIDGE 1920S – TREACLE WAS AMONGST THE ITEMS STOCKED; SCAN OF A FEN FUNERAL 1913 – IN THOSE DAYS PEOPLE WERE TAKEN FROM QUEEN ADELAIDE TO ELY FOR BURIAL, APPLE PICKERS IN 1920S] [PHOTOS OF FEN DITTON – WERE THERE REALLY TREACLE MINES?]

So is this a clue as to the Fen Ditton treacle mines story? Can anybody put Roy out of his misery?

As the weather turns warm so many people will be making their way to the seaside for a paddle. But in June 1940 thousands of men were taking to the sea, not for pleasure but for their very survival. One of them was Eric Morley, later organiser of the Miss World competitions. He was amongst those left on the beach to protect the evacuation of long lines of soldiers wading out to distant small boats and ships. But when his turn came he got off without getting his feet wet – all thanks to men like William Nightingale of Trevone Place, Cambridge, who was then a lance-corporal in the 250th Field Company, Royal Engineers. He recalls: “On 31st May 1940 I was evacuated from Bray Dunes, Dunkirk. Myself and two or three sappers towed all the three-ton trucks we could find into a row on the sand, reaching out into the sea, covering the tops of the trucks with planks etc to form a base on which men could walk. Many took advantage of this so-called ‘pier’ allowing them to walk into the sea to their rescue boats without getting their feet wet.” Eric Morley wrote to him: “Thank you for building the causeway. I have always wanted to thank whoever it was who saved me from wading through water”

Unsurprisingly there were few British photographers standing around on the beach to take photographs of the lorry-jetty, though the Imperial War Museum does have one taken by the Germans. But for the snap and Bill’s memories this might be a side of the war that was forgotten. [SCAN OF GERMAN PHOTOGRAPH OF THE CAUSEWAY, SCAN OF CUTTING OF ROYAL ENGINEERS ON PARKER’S PIECE SEP 1939]]

Another wartime incident nearer home has been revealed for the first time by Vera Layton (then Ellingham) from Ely. As a girl she lived with her family in the old Cross Keys, an isolated former pub beside the Great Ouse River, north of Ely. One morning, about 10.30 she was disturbed from her washing by the arrival of a group of soldiers on exercise, who needed to cross the river to make their way back to their camp near Thetford. The sergeant asked whether they might borrow the family’s flat-bottomed boat to row his men across. The first contingent arrived on the opposite bank, near Clayway farm, and the boat was rowed back. This time however disaster struck, as too many soldiers clambered aboard and the boat capsized, leaving men struggling desperately in the water. Other men jumped in to rescue their colleagues but found themselves in difficulties in their heavy boots and uniform. Despite all their efforts four of the soldiers drowned, two married and two single men. Their bodies were carried along the bank to Queen Adelaide – an incident recalled by Roy Lee who was amongst the children in the village school that were kept inside until the waiting ambulances had conveyed the men away. Life went on as normal for Vera and her family, the upturned boat was brought back by a tug driver who recognised it, and it continued to be used for crossing the river. But the next time Vera went swimming she could hear the screams of the drowning men so vividly that she shot out her leg and cut her foot on some hidden obstruction.

The date of the incident is not yet known, it may have been March 1942, although in May that year there was an invasion exercise envisaging enemy forces approaching Cambridge in which Military and Home Guard troops were taking place. People were warned to expect 'unusual sounds' with 'bombing' and planes. The following week the paper carried news of the death of a young soldier from an anti-aircraft unit who had drowned in the Cam, despite members of a University boat crew diving in to try and save him.[PHOTO OF ADELAIDE?]

Memories 11th June 2003

The horrific news from Germany of an incident in which a young girl was carried off by a hot-air balloon has brought into prominence some of the dangers associated with such innocuous-seeming conveyances.

In 1965 Cambridge experienced just such a fright, though one that had a less traumatic outcome.

It was in October that light-sleepers were awoken by strange noises in the night. Some of the sounds could be traced to the Regal Cinema where the Rolling Stones rocked and P.J. Proby shocked - his act was pronounced "too smutty" and was banned. At Cherry Hinton the blame could be laid at the door of the Irish - the Clancey Brothers who were topping the bill at the first Cambridge Folk Festival. Meanwhile Mill Road was learning to live with the rattle and clatter of a new phenomenon - Ten Pin Bowling. But some of the world's greatest brains were startled at an unearthly noise right outside their bedroom windows.

Searchlights were brought in to scan the sky - in just the same way that in Reach during the Great War one old lady had taken her candle to investigate the ghastly, ghostly shape of Zeppelins said to hover just above the trees. Elsewhere through the centuries others have run towards or away from other strange sights. Near Soham in 1785 an old man and a boy had witnessed an apparition that descended from the heavens into the field in which they were working. The lad fled, his companion stood his ground - too scared to move; then seeing the shape appearing motionless he approached it – "In the name of the Father, Son and Holy Ghost, what are you, speak and tell me". Eventually finding it motionless he had carried it into the village, doubtless boasting how he had overcome the monster from the skies.

Then in October 1913 it was the turn of locals near Sutton to become agitated: "Much excitement prevailed in the village when it became known that an airship had come down in the fens, not very far distant, and cyclists were soon speeding to the spot from all directions.

Many were under the impression that it was one of our army airships, but it proved to be the Bovril advertising airship which left Hendon last Friday and has since been touring the country. First Pilot R.F. Dagnell was in charge assisted by Second Pilot S. Heath. Mr Sole's Tubbs' Farm is not exactly a nice place for an airship to be housed, so that when Mr A. Drake suggested it should be brought nearer Sutton those in charge readily fell in with the idea of moving it. A gang of Messrs Drake & Son's men, who had been employed near by, therefore shouldered the car and proceeded towards the village. This was rendered easier as the envelope still contained sufficient gas to give it buoyancy and thus helped them over ditches and other obstacles. When they reached the high road a crowd soon gathered and it looked a curious procession that proceeded to Bury Lane where our aerial visitor was to spend the night, Mr E. Lowe staying on guard". Many people visited the scene before the airship was packed up and sent by rail to Hendon. Peter Hamence from Sutton has preserved a postcard of the scene [SCAN ON DISK]

Cambridge had seen military airships during army manoeuvres in 1912 but as daylight broke on 27th October 1965 modern academics scattered in fear of what was overhead. A steel cable rose into the air and on the end a wartime barrage balloon was hovering. It had broken away from R.A.F. Cardington carrying its weather instruments with it and dragged its wire rope thirty miles across country before becoming hooked on scaffolding at St Johns College. Magdalene College was evacuated whilst this one was winched to the ground, the firemen carefully avoiding protrusions that might pierce the hydrogen-filled canopy and cause an explosion [PHOTOS WITH CHRIS]

It all passed peacefully but one speculates on the nineteen-sixties headlines had the balloon as it descended been found to be carrying Mr Green and his aeronautical pony – a sight that attracted Cambridge spectators in May 1829 [SCAN ON DISK]

Flying horses may be one thing, treacle mines are something different, but various readers have responded to the story of those at Fen Ditton. Malcolm Busby, a ranger at Milton County Park has his doubts, but he says: "Being at Huntingdonshire lad we all said that Sapley near Huntingdon had treacle mines, but I never heard a good reason, though I reckon it had to be a way of getting kids to eat it, or else something daft like the saying about it being a bit black over Will's mothers"

Mick Hanks from Milton has no doubt: he writes: "The treacle mines were in the old Maltings, down Ditton Walk, in Fen Ditton parish [PHOTO OF DITTON WALK]. Ditton dockyards are in Horningsea, barges used to dock there years ago. I used to live in Howard Road and was told this many times by Fen Ditton residents"

Dan Jackson has another version he heard more than 20 years ago which he believes is the genuine one. "Fen Ditton treacle mines were first discovered towards the end of the First World War, I was told by a village woman who sadly is now dead. During the war, sugar was scarce and most families had to sweeten up with treacle. It came in large square tins which were difficult to dispose of when there was not a regular rubbish collection - the dustmen were all at the Front. There is a lane in Fen Ditton, Field Lane but now generally known as Filly Lane. It was then grassy with lots of big trees and bushes but now is cultivated right up to the bridleway. Mabel, the Ditton girl who told me the story, said the young people used to call the lane "Feel-me-leg Lane" but not when parents were in earshot. On the left of the lane are old coprolite workings, now completely covered over with brambles but in the First World War, it was used as a rubbish tip and by far the most common rubbish dumped there was treacle tins.[SCAN OF FEN DITTON IN 1920S]

“During the Bumps Races on the Cam, bright young students graced the ale houses with their presence and, after the war, the locals hatched a scheme to have a laugh at their expense. They would talk, in the students' hearing about the old village treacle mines. The idea was to arouse the curiosity of the students and eventually to offer to take them there. There was often a beer or a tanner at stake. But it was a much greater achievement just to convince the bright young lads that the treacle mines did exist - if only for a minute or two”

Peter O'Dell has e-mailed from Bar Hill about the Cambridge Coronation celebrations: “You mention the competition for the best decorated private house run by the city council saying it was won by Mrs. M. O'Dell of Staffordshire Street. Mrs. O'Dell was my grandmother and I lived with her in Staffordshire Street for a while towards the end of the war and just after it finished. I thought you might be interested in a photo of the house in Staffordshire Street decorated, I think, to celebrate the homecoming of my uncles, Bernard and Horace, from the Far East at the end of the war. The people in the photo are all Mr and Mrs.O'Dell's family (children and grandchildren) who are my uncles, aunts and cousins; there were quite a lot of us”. Peter has also enclosed a copy of the invitation to a Coronation Party at the Abbey Hall. He did attend but doesn't remember much about it. Were you there too? [THESE ITEMS WERE E-MAILED FROM PETRO ON 4TH JUNE 20:38]

Jim Mansfield, of Histon asks where the Black Swan hotel was in Cambridge. He has a miniature water jug which on one side advertises White Horse whisky. On the other side is engraved “Black Swan Hotel, Cambridge, Christmas 1905. Good Luck”. The water jug is just the size for holding a splash - recommended by connoisseurs to improve the texture of any good scotch.

The Black Swan was at no.8 Guildhall Street and is still there, but no longer as a pub. It was converted in 1924 to become Fisher House, the chaplaincy to Roman Catholic undergraduates and escaped redevelopment for Lion Yard. The landlord in 1904 was Alfred Belatti [SCAN OF GUILDHALL STREET IN 1937 WITH THE FORMER BLACK SWAN ON THE RIGHT]

Memories 18th June 2003, by Mike Petty

The news that the courts have recognised ‘Gulf War Syndrome’ highlights some of the after-effects suffered by those who fought in the deserts and in hostile climates. The troops underwent unpleasant, frightening experience while for their families it was a nightmare for four long months. But how does all this compare with the experiences of World War II veterans?

Cambridge resident George Arthur O'Dell, now 81 years old, served in the British Army in the Indian subcontinent from 1942 to 1945. He spent almost four long years in Burma and in what later became Pakistan and India. Presently he is the Chairman of the regional Burma Star Association.

George was 20 years old when he was posted to India. He had married only three months earlier so it was a particularly painful separation from his young bride. Mrs Beryl O'Dell was naturally apprehensive about George's overseas posting but gritted her teeth and had to “take it in your stride”

Sailing from Liverpool in January 1942, George reached Bombay via Durban, South Africa. After a short spell in Poona to get acclimatised, he embarked on a gruelling 12-day train journey toward Calcutta.

From Manipur, India's easternmost state bordering Burma, the troops went into Burma to defeat the Japanese. George served in the artillery in the Burma campaign which has been acknowledged as the longest and most ferocious campaign of World War II. [SCAN OF JAPANESE PRISONERS ON THE BURMA FRONT (NOT GEORGE)]

After Burma, George travelled to Lahore and Rawalpindi around December 1944. As a trainee pilot he was sent to Fatehjang, a place he describes as “out in the wilds, just an airstrip, that's all”. His final station was Secunderabad, near Hyderabad in India before going to Doolali near Bombay for the sea journey back home. By this time, the troops had had enough. No wonder “going doolali” means going mad!

“The only time we were not on duty was when we slept,” recalls George. “Thinking about it now, I wonder how the hell we managed out there.” But he has absolutely no regrets. He is thankful to the army for the experience and the self-discipline (he joined at the age of 17). It was tough but “we were young and silly”

On August 31, 1945, Beryl O'Dell, who was at the time working in an army shoe factory in Kettering, was startled to hear the public announcement: “Would a Mrs O'Dell come to the office”. When she got to the office she recalls: “George was standing there!” It had been almost four years of separation.

George and Beryl have been together ever since. George, who was born in Cambridge, and Beryl became school sweethearts and married just before George left for the subcontinent. They have lived happily in the same house in Ramsden Square, Cambridge since 1947. [WARTIME PHOTO OF GEORGE AND BERYL]

George finds it somewhat incomprehensible that British troops today spend only four months in Iraq and receive post-war counselling on their return. He was in the Indian subcontinent for almost four years. “We just did our duty,” he says. George and many of his surviving comrades of The Burma Star Association will be holding their annual service and parade in Barkway, Royston, on June 29, 2003. [POSSIBLE PICTURE OF EARLIER BURMA STAR PARADE IN NEWS LIBRARY]

But what George suffered had been experienced by other old soldiers.

Dorothy Constable from Cambridge recalls that her father had served in the Great War and that in February 1941, when the time neared for him to be called up again, the nightmares of the trenches returned to haunt him. She recalls seeing her dad very smart in his postman's uniform, with brightly polished shoes, and they exchanged a cheery greeting. Minutes later came the crack of two revolver shots and her mother's scream – “Bob's shot himself”; then came the ambulance and long weeks of intensive nursing at Addenbrooke's Hospital followed by more years at Fulbourn Hospital.

She recalls: “It must have affected us children, not forgetting our lovely mum, always there when we came home from school. How she coped I will never know. Women, thousands of them deserve a medal. They was no child allowance but luckily the vegetables growing in the garden and allotments and chickens laying eggs saved the day. We got free milk and malt at school, it should have been a teaspoonful but nobody noticed when I used to have a tablespoon of malt. When father went into hospital I had to collect relief money once a week. I walked from Coldham's Lane to Ditton Lane to collect it from the insurance man, £2-something a week. My mother was very upset and as I was in my last year at St Philip's Junior School I was allowed to be at home with her. I had to do all the shopping. Things were not the same anymore. Money was very short, no school uniform, no gym shoes and vests. Everything in those days you suffered in silence.”

If you enjoy getting out and about and exploring Cambridgeshire's history then there are a couple of events for your diary. Next Sunday, 22nd June you can discover the Garden of Eden and the rest of the hidden history of the streets around the Grafton Centre in Cambridge. But beware, in Victorian times the area was home to from one to two hundred prostitutes, about 100 convicted thieves and 200 other persons of questionable character who lived by dishonesty. It might be best to go in a group and Alan Brigham, Cambridge historian, will be offering 90-minute guided walks departing from the Grafton Centre Information Point at 11 and two o'clock. The tours are free and you can just turn up but to guarantee a place phone Cambridge 316201. [SCAN OF FITZROY ST 1961 & GOLD ST C1910] explains: "Our new priest, Reverend Michael Bowers suggested we cleared out the vestry in the Church at the beginning of the year and in doing so we came across an altar cloth embroidered in 1766 at the bottom of a trunk. Since then we have all been researching 1766 in Horningsea, Cambridge, London and the rest of the world! We have been able to draw on the Church records –there were four weddings but rather more than one funeral that year as many of the babies born that year also died. Older children were paid 4d for collecting weasels, hedgehogs and polecats. We have identified the houses in the Village in 1766 – there were about 38 houses (140 now) but the population was 293 (compared to about 310 now!). We have maps and photographs, extracts from diaries and drawings to illustrate the exhibition and have challenged village children to bring models of hedgehogs and polecats to the exhibition!"

Then on Sunday 29th June Horningsea is celebrating 1766 and all that! Why 1766? Lindsay Davies

Its all in aid of the church which in 1779 was 'in a deplorable, nasty and shattered condition and except the parish lays out an 100 or 2 pounds in repairing it, will soon fall down'. The north-east corner of the chancel wall was 'already dilapidated' and the eastern gable cross was 'very near tumbling down'. It still needs help to ensure it survives and you can see for yourself as during the afternoon there will be various groups coming to the Church to play or sing music from the 1760's. So go along – if possible dressed for the occasion - and join in [SCAN OF CHURCHYARD AND FAMILY BESIDE WALL]

Mrs Madge Taylor from Teversham has written following the picture of Fen Ditton that I featured in Memories on 4th June. With her husband she kept the Blue Lion public on the cross-roads from brand new for 26 years but its story went back much further. The old pub had been acquired by Jonathan Fison back in 1886 and it was then kept for 25 years by Willoughby Sargent, a carpenter who brewed his own ale and drew water from the well. Much money was earned in the village at that time by coprolite digging and the pub opened at six in the morning and did a good trade at that early hour. [POSSIBLE PICTURE OF OLD BLUE LION PUB IN LIBRARY FILES]

Quy local historian, Peggy Day, has another theory on the treacle mines debate; she recalls reading that 'treacle mines' referred to coprolite digging where the diggers encountered a particularly sticky patch. Does this ring a bell with anybody else

Francis Hookham has been pursuing his family history and had discovered a photograph. It shows a group of people on a boat trip – perhaps to Horningsea - including Sidney and Nellie Leech and Elsie Ayres. But he has little idea what it was all about. Can anybody help? Memories, 25th June 2003, by Mike Petty

Church clocks can be a source of controversy, with frequent stories of residents of new houses complaining that they are disturbed by the constant clanging throughout the night. Others find that the peaceful pealing of the quarter-hours make a long sleepless night more bearable

But who gives a thought to those whose job it is to keep clock ticking, day and night. Last week Tony Brothie recalled some of his experiences with Cambridge's most prominent clock, that of the Catholic Church on Hills Road.

It is now more than 60 years since, with many able-bodied parishioners involved in war work or away from Cambridge on military service, younger members of the parish had to undertake duties previously the responsibility of their elders. So it was that Canon Marshall approached Tony, then a strong healthy lad of seventeen, awaiting call-up for military service and just starting his career in the Fire Service. The canon needed a replacement winder for the church clock. The clock and its chimes required manual winding every day. Tony accepted this duty, as he recalls

"I was briefly shown how to wind up the huge weights which operated the chimes and the clock itself. The problem was that the chimes lasted only twenty-four hours before they had to be rewound. If the chimes ran down, the bells just did not ring until I started to rewind the weights. Then the bells started to catch up on each quarter of an hour that had been missed. Not only did the citizens of Cambridge complain about the missing chimes, they went berserk when on one occasion there was a continuous ringing of bells (the national warning that the Germans had landed). Most people took to their shelters. There was a clamp to stop the problem occurring but I had forgotten to apply this, which resulted in the clergy and three policemen climbing up the tower. I had visions of spending the duration of the war in the cells, but got away with a telling-off."

Nor was this his only brush with war-time security: "The fact that there were no lights in the tower caused another incident when I used a torch to wind the mechanism. Someone must have thought that 'those Catholics' were signalling to the enemy, because I was investigated by some men in long, black mackintosh-type coats - MI5 no doubt. After this I had to do the job in the dark or during daylight."

But there was another incident that caused considerable alarm to one member of the congregation: "Because of security and fire precautions, it was necessary to have a central point for the keeping of the various keys of the church and the rectory. I had to collect the keys from Canon Marshall's study and return them after use. Well, one day I left the keys in the door in the porch and proceeded to the tower. Someone saw the keys, locked the door and returned them to the canon. When I came back down the spiral staircase I was locked in. What happened next was to give a very devout lady parishioner a nasty shock. At first-floor level in the tower is the bell-ringers' chamber which is open to the interior of the church and I stood there hoping that someone would come to my aid. I called down to her just as she had blessed herself with holy water and the result was dramatic. 'Excuse me, could you tell someone that I am locked in', I said. She looked up to heaven but in my direction, blessed herself and disappeared. I escaped by climbing down a broken bell-rope" [PICTURE OF CATHOLIC CHURCH FROM NEWS FILES SHOWING CLOCK]

The Church of Our Lady and the English Martyrs is the most tangible presence of the Catholic faith in Cambridge, but by no means the only one, as a new book launched last week makes clear. Nicholas Rogers and Christopher Jackson have spent several years co-ordinating research and encouraging other long-standing members of the congregation to set down their memories; the result is a 400-page history, 'Catholics in Cambridge', published by Gracewing at £20. It shows how Cambridge's earlier Catholic church moved to Huntingdonshire! It was designed by Augustus Pugin, more famous for his work on the Houses of Parliament, in the 1840s, but was redundant after the present church opened in 1890. By 1902 it was in a ruinous condition and was taken down stone by stone, before being transported for fourteen miles and re-erected, practically without alteration at St Ives. [SCAN OF THE PUGIN CHURCH WHICH WAS MOVED TO ST IVES]

Another foundation to have moved was a convent of Carmelite nuns which opened on Chesterton Road, Cambridge in November 1923, on the site of the present St Regis flats. But the position proved too noisy and the nuns moved to a house at Waterbeach in a procession of cars, taking their altar with them. There was a brief period of three weeks during which friends and relatives could visit without the need for veils and grills and members of the public, both Catholic and non-Catholic took the opportunity to inspect the new community. On the day of Inclosure there were about a thousand people, although it was a working day afternoon. Cars and busloads of people came from Cambridge and 'the greater part of the men, women and children of Waterbeach must have come in, though there is not a Catholic amongst them', as the Bishop of Northampton attended by 50 clergy performed the ceremony. The community of nuns continued at Waterbeach for 50 years before amalgamating with another group at Chichester. [POSSIBLE PICTURE OF THE WATERBEACH CONVENT IN NEWS FILES]

But there was another Catholic chapel in Waterbeach, a hut built amidst the hangars on the airfield established almost next door which opened in January 1941. One man who knows Waterbeach airfield intimately is Bob Giddings who lives in a line of cottages at the entrance to the earliest Catholic presence in the village, Denny Abbey. As a lad Bob watched the wartime military activity and in 1951 had his own special playthings – the remains of wrecked aircraft that were being cannibalised for spare parts. He has snaps of them amongst his collection of old postcards. [SCAN OF BOB GIDDINGS AT PLAY IN A WRECKED HURRICANE]

Waterbeach is one village that has retained its railway station, many others have disappeared. Now Ruth Ivimey-Cook is trying to rediscover something of life on the old line from Cambridge to St Ives. She has spoken to Ruth Cross was the crossing keeper at Mow Fen a bit over a mile from the local village, reached by a quiet lane. Ruth lived with her husband Terry, a porter at Swavesey Station, in a house by the crossing. In common with three other such crossing-houses in the area, it was made of wood and was without mains services. Their water was delivered weekly by the railway, as Terry recalled: "We didn't have any mains water. So there were three or four platelayers -they would bring the trolley from Swavesey with a large tank on it filled with water and then they would stop outside our house. And these three or four men used to more or less chain this water through our gate and into our water tank. They used to do that every Monday."

There was no electricity so the cooking stove and the fridge that the railway supplied used Calor gas, and so did the gas lights on the walls. The fridge kept milk from the local farm cool. The cows on the farm were walked from fields at Over, a couple of miles away, for the milking season. Every morning they were milked in the fields. As Ruth recalls: "That was the highlight of the day because we didn't have many people go over the crossing. ... They used to bring the milking parlour down there on wheels, towed by the tractor and put that in the field and milk the cows in the field." Having to get a herd of cattle over a crossing was not peculiar to Mow Fen. Ruth remembers another crossing where the cows "were very skittish and if you didn't be very careful they used to tear up the line and jump fences and ditches ... but they were very select over our crossing because they were milking cows."

Ruth has a photo of the Mow Fen crossing house but would appreciate other similar pictures or reminiscences of other people on this line or the one from St Ives to March or Ramsey in the days when there was time to tend the station gardens – as at Histon in 1964. You can e-mail her at Ruth.Ivimey-Cook@ivimey.org or write to me and I'll pass the letter on. [SCAN

Another old line, that of the Grunty Fen Express that shuttled between Ely and St Ives was recalled by Eric Drake, a fenboy from Sutton. It was a train he took each day to Soham Grammar School. He remembered the Station Master at Haddenham: “He was an important gentleman with navy brass-buttoned suit and braided military-style peaked cap. He met every train and blew the whistle whilst standing on the platform. This allowed the train guard to wave his flag to signal to the driver. Goods trains travelled the line and Haddenham took away trucks loaded with bricks and cheese”. Eric’s memories are included in a new booklet of stories from tapes held by the Farmland Museum at Denny Abbey; entitled ‘Bog Oak Country’ it costs just £2. Geoffrey Peel from Pampisford writes with his unusual recollections of Coronation Day. “When I awoke soon after dawn on Coronation morning the first things I saw through the haze were Big Ben and the rooftops of London. I had spent a rather uncomfortable night dozing in an ancient leather armchair in a dusty penthouse on the roof of the Ministry of Housing, overlooking Parliament Square.

“I was a member of the team of Pye engineers who were about to send colour television pictures of the procession to various locations in London, including the Great Ormond Street Hospital for Children.

“We had set up the specially designed transmitting equipment on the roof the previous day, and in order to be certain of a timely start in the morning we had to spend the night there. We had security passes and had been told that no one could stay in the building overnight without one. However on going down in search of a bathroom it seemed that every office door was being cautiously opened as civil servants, secretaries and tea-ladies emerged on similar errands.

It is a fact of history that the transmissions were successful but I remember little of the procession; we were all too busy. My most abiding memories are of the sea of rubbish left in the streets after the crowds had gone, and of walking from Great Ormond Street to Whitehall one morning a day or two earlier, carrying a twelve feet long scaffold pole, on which the mount the transmitting aerial I had designed for the occasion. I would not like to attempt the journey today

Memories 2nd July 2003, by Mike Petty

James Robinson has e-mailed to ask to see a picture of Cook’s Fish Bar between 186 and 187 East Road where he spent many happy hours during the early 1970s. I have tracked down one photograph that was taken by the News in June 1989; does anybody have others? [SCAN/PHOTO OF EAST ROAD – THE SHOP IS EXTREME RIGHT, DO NOT CROP].

Fish and chip shops have been an important part of the Cambridgeshire scene for many years.

Writing in June 1974 Edgar Blincoe recalled how things had changed since he went into service at Cambridge University: “When I first went to the University all the undergraduates came up in lounge suits and bowler hats. Now you see them going down the street eating fish and chips". But when did you last see a Cambridge University student eating chips in the streets?

Perhaps it's something to do with the cost. When the News made a survey in June 1975 sky-high potato prices were forcing some chippies to consider closing. Mr Jack Holliday of the Quality Fish Shop in Mill Road explained the problem: "Either we put up our prices and lose customers, or we shut for a while. None of us want to sell chips at 14p a portion" If he increased his price for a portion of chips from 8p to 12p or alternatively halved the size of the portion the public would cringe.

By February 1976 there was nobody in Cambridge selling chips for less than 12p a bag and four shops had a minimum price of 15p. The most extreme difference in value were between the Quality Fish Shop in Mill Road at 7oz for 12p compared to only 5 ozs for the same price at Mike and Julie's in Wulfstan Way and D.G. Munns in Old Chesterton. Once more it was high potato prices that were being blamed, so in August 1977, when potato prices had dropped again, the News sent a reporter to do the rounds. He found that none of the shops had passed on a reduction to customers. The reason was that cod was twice the price of 18 months ago and the fryer was having to subsidise his fish price from chip sales. The best value was at D.G. Munns in Old Chesterton where chip prices were unchanged at 12p a portion and an extra 3p brought an extra half portion – three ounces of chips.

But no matter what the price there was another problem, as a Newmarket reader reported in February 1953 when he complained about the way in which fish fryers wrapped up fish and chips. "It seems to be an accepted rule that the bag must always be an inch too short. If you buy 6d worth of chips they will give you a bag which holds 4d worth. This is not a chance accident but a system which is rigidly adhered to with the result that at least some of the chips will be imbibed with the printers' ink of the newspaper in which it was wrapped." [PHOTO OF PEOPLE EATING CHIPS FROM NEWSPAPER 1960S]

But did you eat the fish in the shop, or in the street – this was the question that saw an Ely fishmonger in court in August 1903. Police Inspector Burton gave evidence that he was in Broad Street at 11.15pm when he saw John Duffy behind the counter in his fish shop serve two customers with fish which they started to eat. One of the customers came out, saw him watching and duck back into the shop. He then heard Duffy shout 'You can't eat that fish here: you'll get me into trouble'. He had reason to be concerned, for refreshment houses were supposed to be closed after 10 pm – but was his fish shop a 'refreshment house'. It had no forms, knives or forks or anything else, and those in the shop stood against the counter and ate the fish with their fingers. The magistrates found the case proved and fined him nine shillings. But Duffy was happy to pay – "This is another cheap advertisement for me", he told them with a laugh.

I have a picture of Mr O.T. Cross who ran one of the fish and chip shops at Littleport back in the 1960s, but do you have other snaps or memories. [SCAN OF O.T. CROSS, LITTLEPORT FISH AND CHIP SHOP 1965]

Were you married at St James' church, Lode? If so Julie Sale would love to see your wedding photos. The church celebrates it's 150th Anniversary this year and on Saturday 26th and Sunday 27th July it will stage a Flower Festival and an exhibition of the founding of the church, its records and history. They hope to have as many photos of weddings that have taken place at the church. In addition there will be an exhibition of Lode village life through photos, bygones and crafts at the Broughton Hall with home-made cakes and teas at the Social Club.

Many people bemoan the loss of the village 'characters' – people like the five 'Fen Tigers' from Lode who were featured in the News in April 1965. Mrs Hephzibar Watts was at 97, a year older than Billy Harvey, whilst Mrs Elizabeth Pettit was 95 and Maud Flack and Herbert 'Phippin' Cornwell mere striplings of 93 and 90 years.

Mrs Watts knew the secret of their longevity: "I think the oldest people in Cambridgeshire live in Lode. It is a quiet cul-de-sac with very little development, just right for a peaceful life. I think it's the Fen air that keeps us healthy", she believed. It might also have something to do with the beer, for Billy Harvey took the opportunity to revive his memories in the bar of the 'Cow and Hare' over a glass of beer. "I've not had a beer for a long time – but it was not all that time ago that some of us could manage 20 pints of beer – and walk home", he said.

If you have more memories or photos of Lode you can contribute to their exhibition please contact Julie Sale on 01223 811222 or Lee Robertson on 811351. Bob Giddings' photograph of himself playing in a wrecked plane (Memories 25th June) has brought an e-mail from Gordon Riley, author of 'Spitfire Survivors Round the World' - for it was a very special Hawker Hurricane.

Bob's plane, Z3687, was one of four Hurricanes at Waterbeach in 1951, two of which are still around. One of them, LF363, was maintained in airworthy condition by the Station Flight and the other three were used to provide spares to keep it going. Today it is still flying from RAF Coningsby as one of the two Hurricanes maintained by the Battle of Britain Memorial Flight, though it was almost completely rebuilt following a catastrophic crash at RAF Wittering a few years ago.

The other survivor of the four is today preserved at RAF Manston, Kent. It too contains parts donated by Z3687 - it having been assembled by taking the best bits of the three non-flyable Hurricanes and then parked outside for 30 years at RAF Bentley Priory, Stanmore, Middlesex before being totally restored some 10 years ago and put under cover.

Gordon says Bob's photo of Z3687 is interesting because it shows the unique high-gloss white colour scheme applied when it was flown between 1946-48 at the RAE Farnborough and fitted with special laminar flow wings built by Armstrong Whitworth Aircraft of Coventry. As the wings are missing in the photo he assumes that following the end of the tests the fuselage & engine were transferred to Waterbeach in an effort to provide parts to keep LF363 airworthy.

He continues: "It is a pity that the RAF chose '363 to keep going rather than Z3687, which had a much more interesting wartime history. It was one of a batch of 50 delivered in April-May 1941 to No.1 (F) Squadron. On the night of 11-12th May 1941 it was flown by Sgt Josef Dygryn, a Czech, when he shot down no less than three German aircraft, one Heinkel 111 over London at 00:35, another near Gatwick at 01:50 and a Junkers Ju88 near Biggin Hill at 03:25". Mrs B. Hall from Girton has also been having a sort-out and she's found a picture of a rally organised by the "50 Car Club" in 1951. It was taken at a stop at the Four Went Ways Café after a night-time treasure hunt. Her brother Harry Driver was a member of the club and worked at the time for Pest Control of Hauxton [SCAN OF CAR RALLY]

Roger Gascoigne of Arbury Road, Cambridge is more interested in scooters, especially the Vespas and Lambrettas of the period from 1962-1966 when Mods made trips to the seaside and attracted big headlines. He tells me there's a great reassurance of interest in those days and asks whether anybody has photographs of such gatherings, or indeed of the usual meetings at the Mill. I've tracked down one taken at the Mill Pool about 1965 which shows Lambretta registration no. CJE 6C – was it yours? [PICTURE FROM NEWS FILES]

Others preferred motorbikes in those days and, like Roger, still enjoy riding them as a substitute for the family car. One such group of enthusiasts are the Cambridge members of the Norton Owners' Club who may be able to provide details of the machine pictured outside Burtons shop in September 1963. Memories 9th July 2003, by Mike Petty

Some stories just seem to come around and around at this time of the year. In the News of 4th July 2003 [ELY EDITION PAGE 19 – COPY; PIC REF 112145 – ARE THERE OTHERS] an article headed 'Church pays for grant' reflected the difficulties being faced by the congregation of All Saints Church in Croydon where repairs are needed to the church roof.

Yet the same difficulties were being faced in July 1932 as the Cambridge Chronicle reported: Croydon church in the eyes of the 20th century visitor is remarkable for several features, but above all because it has never suffered destructive restoration. The visitor cannot fail to notice that the main walls of the church have been pushed outwards, that the new buttress has pulled the old buttress off the tower, and that the south wall of the nave with its arcade leans outward to a serious extent, while the walls of the tower are cracked at the centre of each side from the ground upwards. Probably there is no church in the diocese in more perilous condition. Thus stands this little church – to the antiquarian, a monument to Croydon's more spacious days; to the parish and its priest, a source of perpetual anxiety.

But an appeal then had its effect, as on 9th July 1937 the Cambridge Independent Press could report that the south transept had been practically rebuilt, the tower, which had cracked, had been 'grouted' and strengthened, the inside base of the tower almost rebuilt and the chancel roof renewed. But the church still needed restoration of the north side of the nave, the repair of the plaster of the interior and the rebuilding of the porch. It was photographed by Louis Cobbett as part of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society's Photographic Record in 1927 [SCAN OF CROYDON CHURCH 1927]

The Antiquarians also found their way to Croydon Wilds, a 17th-century moated house with a brick tower in the middle, which was later demolished in the 1950s. It featured in an advertisement in the Cambridge Independent Press in July 1897: Croydon Wilds, aptly so called, is one of the most remote parts of England. Its few inhabitants are housed in a couple of roomy cottages and it was to one of these cottages that a representative of the 'Cambridge

Independent Press' penetrated, and had a talk with the most respected and intelligent of the inhabitants, Mr Smith, who has lived there for thirty-four years. His daughter, as the reporter passed through the cottage garden, stood bright and blooming beneath the lintel. But she had not always been so fit: "I was weakly and unwell since childhood ... a doctor said I was in a consumption and I should never get better ... I went into the Hospital in Cambridge, but I had given myself up". Then came the miracle cure: "I happened to read of 'Dr Williams Pink Pills for Pale People' ... I had taken nearly one box when I began to feel better. Now I can walk easily, am strong and well, and quite able to get through my work without the slightest fatigue". [SCAN OF CROYDON WILDS 1928]

July 1978 saw a host of celebrities in Cambridge; stars of television, stage and the music world were on Jesus Green for the televising of a 'Star Games' contest. Top names such as Dickie Henderson, singer Joe Brown, Rolf Harris, Colin Baker, Kenny Lynch, Rula Lenska and Dave Dee were taking part to help raise money for the Variety Club of Great Britain Children's Charities.

But it was not all plain sailing; broadcaster Cliff Michelmore suffered a calf muscle injury & singer-songwriter Jackie Trent injured her leg – probably, the News commented – the stars were more used to flexing their artistic muscles rather than their lily-white limbs.

Grey skies kept away many spectators, with only a few hundred autograph hunters braving the damp conditions – though when the skies cleared more onlookers arrived, to the relief of Thames Television who were filming the 70 stars taking part in swimming, rowing, target golf and tug-o-war amongst other activities. It all resulted in more than £4,000 in sponsorship money – which 25 years ago was quite a sum.

The News photographs were there to record it – but were you, and if so do you remember anything about it [PHOTOS 1957.78]

Readers have responded to various recent 'Memories' features

Michael Bentinck, author of the books on wartime, writes from Chatteris about the Cambridge Catholic Church clock

"The other week in your Memories pages, you featured an article on the clock at the Catholic Church Hills Road. This brought happy memories back to me of my days as an apprentice Heating Fitter Welder, for the firm of T. Simons & Son's whose works used to be at 160 Histon Road, Cambridge - I believe this site now has an old peoples' care home built on it, called Simons House. [HISTON ROAD PIC FROM LIBRARY FILES?]

The senior fitter that I was apprentice to back in those wonderful days of the mid 1960's always liked to stop off in a cafe for a full English Breakfast each morning. As we left the yard at 6 a.m. each morning, I was always glad of this, for as you can imagine, as a young teenager it was always a great effort to get out of bed each morning at 5 a.m. and then to cycle the five miles to the yard to join the men for our days work.

The work we did was very hard manual work and was mainly installing heating systems in Hospitals and schools, all over East Anglia. Some of the pipe work we had to install and weld in these boiler houses was of 12-inch diameter and really took some lifting. As you can imagine on very cold winters mornings none of us really wanted to leave the cafe to climb into the back of an old works van which often left us arriving late on site.

The site foreman, or clerk of the works, would often say: 'Well what time do you call this then, wherever have you been to be this late again'. Our senior fitter would quickly reply: 'Don't you dare have a go at us for being late for we have all been up half the night working on the heating system around the clock tower on the Catholic Church back in Cambridge'. He would explain that this was such vital work as the good people of Cambridgeshire all relied on this great clock and the heating system around the clock just had to keep going to prevent the clock hands from freezing. He always got away with it and thankfully we never got reprimanded for being late. To this day I don't believe the Catholic Church has any heating for the clock!"

Colin Brett e-mails from Bar Hill:

"What a blast from the past seeing the Norton motorcycle outside Burton's on Market Hill. I am not sure who the owner was, but it was probably one of a group who used to meet up there most evenings. The model was probably a "650cc Norton Dominator" although it could be a Norton Atlas, but I think they were produced later in the 60's.

"We even formed a small unofficial rival club to the famous '59 Club of North London. At the time we thought the name to be pretty cool and original "the '66 club", with hindsight perhaps it wasn't?

"It was about this time that the local police acquired a Daimler Dart and this would check us out most evenings with a drive by. One of the drivers, Sgt. John Free, was a good friend to quite a few of us, as he organised the youth club in Harston and had the dubious job of trying to keep us all under control. A really good bloke, sadly he died a few years ago after moving to Scotland.

"A few of the lads that were on bikes at that time ventured into motor cycle racing with varied success, Paul Wright, Ivan Hackman, Phil Prest and Ben Taylor (sorry if I've forgotten anyone). Paul and Ben both road sidecar outfits and Paul could have gone on to world championship status, but I think lack of backing saw him drop out. Ivan Hackman had a bad accident in the Manx GP on the Isle of Man and I believe gave up after that. The Mods and Rockers thing wasn't a problem in Cambridge as most of us were mates anyway"

Chip shop memories have come from a number of readers

Mark Rix from Ditton Lane, Cambridge writes:

In Wednesday's column, you showed Cooks chip shop, which brings back fond memories. I am now 36 years old. My mum ran a B & B in Warkworth Street when I was between the ages of 11 and 16 and every day my friends and I used to finish school and go swimming at Parkside pool nearly every day. Some nights when we came out we used to go to Cooks chip shop on East Road, and if we didn't have any money left he would always give us a bag of fritters which always tasted delicious. Later on, when I was 14, I got a job there in the basement as a chip maker which meant pouring potatoes into a machine which peeled them, then into another machine which cut them, then into barrels of water ready for use. They were the only chips in town that were crinkle cut and famous for it. [WARKWORTH STREET PICTURE FROM LIBRARY FILES?]

Growing up in the kite area, I saw a lot of changes at the end of my garden. There was a burnt out pub, which was re-opened as the Free Press and was made the only non-smoking pub. The Elm Tree Pub a few doors up, later had a fire and I remember thinking that John Cooks store opposite was on fire as well. But it turned out that their cellars were connected and the shop just got smoked out. [SCAN OF FREE PRESS DURING REDEVELOPMENT OF AREA IN 1960S]

There used to be an indoor market on East Road where Chillies is now, where I bought my first watch - a new invention, L C D display Casio."

Barbara Rooney from Chesterton writes:

"I have vivid memories of our chip shop in Milton Road, Cambridge. I think it was called 'Webleys' or 'Whiteleys', now its called The Viking. All the kids from the Avenue went there for our two pen'oth of chips and, if we were lucky, fritters on the top. They were never put into newspaper, but into pointed bags which went soggy at the bottom from all the vinegar we put on them! [MILTON ROAD PICTURE FROM LIBRARY FILES?]

Because of the blackout during the war, the front of the building was made of wood with a door you went through before going into the shop quickly, so as not to show any light. Many times I recall going to the shop for my mother at lunch time, when a man would come in with loads of trays to be filled with fish and chips for a local factory. It seemed to me he always went to the front of the queue, which I thought most unfair.

As we didn't have many sweets in those days we really enjoyed our chips, and they don't seem to have done us any harm. We still go to the shop for our fish and chips, its much the same as all those years ago, still giving excellent value for money"

Memories 16th July 2003, by Mike Petty

Last week's announcement of the widening of parts of the M11 will increase the capacity of a road that was the subject of a long-running debate before it opened in 1980.

Back in the 1970s Cambridge was grappling with traffic problems and various new schemes were being aired. A new Elizabeth Bridge opened in 1971 but there was also talk of an western relief road across Lammas Land parallel to Fen Causeway, an Eastern Relief Road, a new West Road project and a Railway Route – something similar to the present Guided bus scheme. All of these were put on hold with the announcement in 1970 of a Cambridge Western bypass, followed a year later by news of another bypass to the North. Then came the wrangling and argument and an inquiry in 1972 that went on for 72 days, making it the longest and most involved ever held to that date. Even when the scheme was approved there were more years of delay and debate before work started.

Flying News photographers looked down as heavy machinery descended on farmer's fields and the new road crept slowly across the landscape. The new Northern bypass opened first in December 1978, the Western – by then the M11 - in 1980. [PHOTO OF TRUMPINGTON/HAUXTON JUNCTION OF M11 UNDER CONSTRUCTION IN 1978 ON CHRIS' DESK]

Immediately calm descended on Castle Hill and by 1981 the number of heavy lorries in Cambridge was down by 60% as traffic that had previously thundered through the city now travelled around it. Drivers making their way North from London could not expect a far easier journey than the previously plod up the A10. Provided of course they had maps up-to-date enough to show the new road.

An indication of the way Cambridgeshire's roads have changed can be gained by visiting one of Cambridge's landmarks, the University Library, whose tower dominates the area across the Backs of the Colleges.

For centuries the library has built up a collection of maps of the world and beyond that are available to researchers, but at present in the Library's new display area – open to everybody without formality – there is a magnificent display of maps of Cambridgeshire dating back to the 1570s [WHICH CONTINUES UNTIL – SEE PRINT OUT]

Amongst them is one of the original road maps, drawn by John Ogilby in the 1670s. These take the form of a strip map, similar to the Route Planners now produced by motoring organisations or delivered digitally to the dashboard. They show how dramatically the roads have changed since the days of the horse-drawn carriages.

Then the preferred route from London to Cambridge would take you not along the long slow drag of the main A10 road towards Royston but via the present the more undulating B1388, through Barley. Ogilby's maps give notes on what to expect; beyond Fowlmere you should ignore the turnings to Sheperheath and Thryplow and continue across a stream to Newton. Then the road continued over arable land and across a common on both sides to Hawkston, then, leaving the Mill on the right-hand side, past a hawthorn tree and across an open way on each side to Trumpington. Then it was yet more pasture to Cambridg itself [SCAN OF PART OF OGILBY MAP, SCAN OF COTTAGES ON LONDON ROAD, NEWTON 1930 WITH STEAM ROLLER, HAUXTON STREET 1936, PRINT OF STAGE COACH NEARING CAMBRIDGE FROM TRUMPINGTON]

The spelling of the place names is different, and one would perhaps question navigating by hawthorn trees, but are the modern computer-produced maps any better.

A few weeks ago I was invited to speak to a group who meet at Ramsey and the ever-efficient organisers sent me an RAC Route Planner to guide me from my door in Stretham to the venue in Stocking Fen Road, Ramsey. The route seemed clear with arrows pointing straight on or indicating bends and turns; it informed me how the B1040 Fenton Road would become the B1040 Mill Green and then the B1040 High Street before it became the B1040 Ramsey Road ... and on and on. Had there been a tree it would probably have mentioned it. It helpfully told me the distance would be 20.1 miles and that it would probably take 36 minutes to make the trip.

There were just two things that made me question the map. It named the start and finish places wrongly! According to the print-out I was starting not from Ely Road, Stretham but from Ely Road, ELY and when I finally turned right off the B1040 Great Whyte I would be in Stocking Fen Road, HUNTINGDON – not Ramsey! Max Jackson from Cambridge has written following a recent Memories mention of the Cambridge Mods who would meet in the evenings outside the Victoria Cinema on Market Hill. He recalls: "Those evenings were filled with fun and laughter and pride in our clothes and scooters which would line up outside the cinema, the multi headlamps gleaming in the street lights with the parkas neatly folded on the seats.

“Further along the street towards Burtons the motorcycles lined up, Matchless, Nortons and BSA. There was never any trouble between us. I remember the Daimler Dart cruising the streets only to come to an untimely end outside of one of the discos. A motorcycle I remember called a Vincent Black Prince was awesome. I attempted to kick start it one evening and was thrown halfway across the street. When I think back to the characters of that time I have to smile and be proud enough to say ‘I was there and I remember it’. I still keep in touch with some of the old mods, Buster Richards, Colin Southall, Sid Cosen and all who made the memories I have so wonderful”

Rhona Norman e-mails: “Your article on Mill Road Maternity Hospital a few weeks ago brought vivid memories of my experience there. It was during the bitter winter of 1963 having been admitted to the hospital my husband was quickly ushered away. Husbands were not allowed in those days! In the delivery room following the birth of our son I waited for some time whilst a bed was prepared for me upstairs in the ward. Two men dressed in three quarter length brown coats came in and scooped up the four corners of the sheet I was lying on and carried me in a bag fashion up the flight of stairs to the ward!

“Also I remember that during the antenatal visits all expectant mums lined up in a crocodile fashion to have blood taken. The girl directly in front of me passed out after observing the procedure in front of her. Those were the days!!” [MILL ROAD HOSPITAL FROM NEWS FILES]

Mrs Madge Taylor from Teversham has written following the picture of Fen Ditton that I featured in Memories on 4th June. She and her husband kept the Blue Lion public on the cross-roads from brand new for 26 years but its story went back much further. The old pub had been acquired by Jonathan Fison back in 1886 and it was then kept for 25 years by Willoughby Sargent, a carpenter who brewed his own ale and drew water from the well. Much money was earned in the village at that time by coprolite digging and the pub opened at six in the morning and did a good trade at that early hour, she tells me.

Mrs Christine Newman from Cambridge spotted a snippet in my ‘Looking Back’ column recently that related to the ‘Passive Resisters’ Movement in 1903. This was prompted by a change in the Education Act that introduced the teaching of the Prayer Book and the Catechism in schools. Many nonconformists objected to something they considered anathema to their religion and protested by refusing to pay a portion of their education rates. As the process dragged on eventually the Council sent in the Bailiffs. Mrs Newman explains: “My grandfather was a passive resistor. They had a chair just inside the door called the ‘Passive Resisters Chair’ and so when the bailiffs came to take some furniture to cover the debt, they always took this chair. Then the resisters went to the sale of their goods and brought the chair back for the money they owed. My aunt told me that nobody but the owner of the chair ever bid for it”.

I WILL BE AWAY FROM SUNDAY TO WEDNESDAY EVENING

Cambridgeshire's communities are constantly changing, only some seem to change more than others. One such is Trumpington, which was once a village but was absorbed into greater Cambridge in 1934.

But as a new book produced by the Trumpington Local History Group shows, not all change has been detrimental. There are now far more trees than there were fifty years ago, the standard of living has improved and there are few houses now without bathrooms and interior sanitation, gas or electricity – unless they have been cut-off for non-payment of bills. And there is less real poverty than previously. People are now more likely to spend the evening watching soap operas on television than doing other people's dirty laundry - as Mrs Matthews opted to do rather than 'go on the Parish' after her husband died. [SCAN OF WASH DAY]

However it is not all gain; many residents regret the increase in through traffic, with its lights and signals, noise and fumes. They forget that when cows walked down the High Street each morning to graze in Trumpington Park they invariably left some tangible evidence of their passing, just as some dogs do today. [SCAN OF COWS AT MANOR FARM, 1930S – NOW BEVERLEY WAY; SCAN OF TED MOTT PICTURE OF HIGH STREET IN 1920S]

In 'Trumpington Past and Present' (Sutton publishing, £11.99) Shirley Brown and her team have brought together a wealth of old images, from engravings to postcards and photographs. Many were taken by Ted Mott of Shelford Road, hundreds of whose pre-war glass negatives are preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection. Before him Percy Robinson, the village schoolmaster from 1908, had entertained packed audiences with his lantern lectures, which were in turn reprinted in the Cambridge newspapers. In November 1995 Percy's pictures were reshown to another packed meeting, providing the impetus for the formation of the Trumpington Local History Group

It's one of those books you just keep looking through, comparing the old and the nearly-new, discovering the reason for things – why did 'Whitelock's Yard' drop the 'e' and become 'Whitlocks' when it was rebuilt in 1968. Was it that the name was thought disrespectful to the elderly people who lived there at the time? Now the bedsits provide homes for some of the Filipino nurses recruited by Addenbrooke's Hospital to aid their staffing problems.

Trumpington has a rich mixture of houses, some small, some very grand but perhaps their oldest house was built in the mid 1930s, having been discovered in Cambridge when the demolition men moved in.

Pre-war Cambridge councillors were anxious for a new Guildhall, to match the grand new edifice constructed by the County on Castle Hill, and cope with their expanding boundaries. They had tried before, even getting grandiose plans drawn up in 1898 before they were thrown out by ratepayers incensed by the mess they had made of the new sewers – but that is another story.

By 1935 it was really going ahead. Despite a last-minute proposal to build their new headquarters on the corner of Parkside and East Road – much more sensible it was claimed, because of the increasing traffic that would make it difficult to get to meetings in the town centre – the plans were approved. The old Guildhall would be replaced by a new Guildhall to be constructed in stages.

Demolition men moved in to remove the nondescript range of buildings on the west side of Peas Hill. They included an old butcher's shop where once they killed their beasts and washed the blood in a stone tank in the back yard, more recently converted into a bookshop. Above was living accommodation above that had been home to generations of tradesmen and their families. It really was not much of a place. [SCAN OF PEAS HILL SHOWING

BUILDINGS DEMOLISHED FOR GUILDHALL; SAME SCENE AFTER GUILDHALL BUILT, 1938]

But as they started to pull it down a remarkable history was revealed. There were timbers had once been part of a ship that had sailed the North Sea in the fourteenth or fifteenth centuries. Then the ship had been broken up and the wood passed into the hands of an old builder who shaped them into the upper storey of a house, numbering each timber to show where it fitted. But he did not erect them. Instead they were brought down the Ouse and Cam for sale at Stourbridge Fair. There they had been bought, transported to Peas Hill and assembled – or so it was conjectured.

When complete it had a high pitched roof and overhanging upper storeys and was panelled within and plastered without. It was a fine, fashionable half-timbered dwelling. But fashions changed. But why pull down an old house when it could be modernised inside and out. So the lower section was brought forward to disguise the fact that the rooms above had jutted out, the old timbers hidden behind plaster and red tiles nailed to the front, disguised to look like bricks with imitation pointing in black paint. It was now a modern, up-to-date house.

Soon people forgot what the old place had looked like. More improvements were made inside: a fireplace with Dutch tiles painted in floral designs, some fine Queen Anne woodwork, sliding windows with bottle glass lights. Layers of paint were applied to ancient oak, panelling was gradually covered with wallpaper, the first being a hand-blocked design of the late eighteenth century printed on waste sheets of a Bible.

All this was revealed as work progressed, but it was no longer demolition, it was a careful dismantling with the ancient timbers carefully taken apart and laid aside ready for a new home elsewhere. Reginald Lambeth, who supervised the demolition of the other houses along that side of Peas Hill, produced a drawing showing the buildings in Tudor times before these too were removed. [SCAN OF REGINALD LAMBETH'S DRAWING OF THE PEAS HILL HOUSE FROM CDN April 1935]

So where did the timbers go? According to the Trumpington history some found their way to Long Road, to a home first owned by Councillor E. Savill Peck, an antiquarian and photographer well aware of the need to conserve Cambridge's past, even if it meant taking it piece by piece to Trumpington for safe keeping. [SCAN OF LONG ROAD HOUSE BUILT WITH OLD TIMBERS]

But the book reveals how history has repeated itself. In Trumpington by 1974 all the buildings between the Green Man and the village hall had been demolished, except one. The house in High Street stood neglected and forlorn while developers fought over the land around it. Eventually someone bought the timber frame, which was all that remained. The timbers were numbered carefully and taken for reconstruction at an unknown destination. If you know where then let me know. [SCAN OF TIMBER-FRAMED HOUSE BEING DEMOLISHED AT TRUMPINGTON 1974]

With the world and his wife apparently entranced with the latest hairstyles of famous football players I wonder if anybody can identify these members of the Cambridge United squad preparing for the new season in the tough Second Division in July 1978. And who were the hairstylists? Just to give a clue the names, in alphabetical order, were Lindsay Smith, Gordon Sweetzer and Graham Watson. Another person whose head was in the News back in July 1978 was Councillor John Powley who was then spearheading the plans to transform the Kite area of Cambridge into the Grafton Centre. Some of those opposing the scheme commissioned a local artist to draw an outsized portrait of Coun Powley which was then electrically wired up and served as a dartboard at a 'Save the Kite' fete.. Anyone hitting the 'brain cell' rang a bell. During the afternoon more than one Labour councillors was seen surreptitiously to aim a dart at the target. If the style of the portrait seems familiar it may be because it was drawn by Peter Fluck, who later went on to become part of the award-winning 'Spitting Images' team and to turn his caricature skills to even more famous politicians. Another Head in the news 25 years ago was Gordon Chambers who was saying a fond farewell to the 25 pupils at Hemingford Abbots School. It was not just the end of a term, but the end of an era for the 138-year-old thatched school was being closed down as an economy measure. It was not all gloom, for the school swimming pool would be given a new lease of life – it was to be dismantled and taken to the Wheatfields school at St Ives. Did you attend the school – and do you recognise anybody? [TEACHERS AND CHILDREN ON LAST DAY AT HEMINGFORD ABBOTS SCHOOL – PRINT FROM NEWS FILES]

Memories 30th July 2003, by Mike Petty

Did you do your courting at the Turk's Head in Trinity Street, Cambridge. If so this is a week of nostalgia for it is just 25 years ago that it closed its doors for the last time. No more of those gammon steaks, chicken in a basket or schooners of sherry from the barrel. No more drinks in the Stable bar so packed with undergraduates that by the time you'd got your larger and limes you might find your date had attracted other admirers.

The Turks Head catered for all kinds of people for all kinds of reasons. In October 1976 a bridal party attracted more than usual attention after the Vicar of Thaxted "married" two female couples in a 'double wedding'. The women had their union blessed in the parish church by the vicar, who was president of the Gay Christians, an organisation for homosexual men and women, before the couples and their friends celebrated with drinks at the Turk's Head Stable Bar. Then the guests went on for more drinks at the Gay Scaramouche Club in Cambridge.

Berni had opened its Turk's Head in 1962 as a restaurant where a range of inexpensive meals could be had across a wide price band and survived a series of fires. Before that the building had housed Matthew's Restaurant and Café boasting a palm court atmosphere and wicker chairs. In October 1927 they had added an extra attraction as the News reported: The fascinating experience of lunching in Cambridge in the atmosphere of our Elizabethan forefathers is made possible by the opening of new rooms at Messrs Matthew's Café in Trinity Street. They have acquired the two upper storeys of the building & turned rooms which were formerly part of a lodging house into a charming medieval retreat. The original beams and window frames remain as well as some beautiful old carvings and the rooms have been furnished in the style of the period, pains having been taken to secure faithful reproductions even down to lamps and pewter pots

It became a regular meeting place for farmers attending sales at the Corn Exchange and, on a different level provided dinners for the University Beefsteak & True Blue Clubs. The members were mostly titled undergraduates who had to prove their prowess in an initiation ceremony involving the drinking of a bumper of claret straight off.

Delving even further back the building had been home to the Turk's Head coffee house which attracted earlier generations of students. As Roger North commented in the 1660s: "It is become the custom after chapel to repair to coffee houses, where hours are spent in talking; and less profitable reading of newspapers of which swarms are continually supplied from London. And the scholars are so greedy after news (which is none of their business), that they neglect all for it; and it is become very rare for any of them to go directly to his chambers, after prayers, without doing his suit at the coffee-house; which is a vast loss of time grown out of a pure novelty; for who can apply close to a subject with his head full of the din of a coffee-house?"

But in between all the eating and drinking the building had been home to a bank founded by Ebenezer Foster, a miller. He started his banking by simply issuing receipts to farmers who would exchange them amongst themselves instead of cash, trusting the Foster name as a guarantee that the bill would be honoured. The bank began trading in Bridge Street but in 1836 moved to the Turks Head Coffee House where security was provided by three junior staff who were obliged to sleep in the bank, one in front of the strong room with his sword by his side. The bank prospered and by 1890 the premises were too small and the decision was taken to move. The London architect Waterhouse was employed to design the new buildings and authorised to spare no expense. In November 1893 the new bank opened with a flourish, its 100-foot high clock tower dominating the town centre from its position opposite the entrance to Petty Cury. Ten years later it amalgamated with Capital and Counties Bank and in 1919 was absorbed into Lloyds.

The closure of the Berni Inn in 1978 was attributed in part to the opening in Rose Crescent of a somewhat more up-market sister establishment decorated in a Dickensian theme and there were plans too to turn the Plough and Harrow public house in Madingley Road into another Berni restaurant.

So what was to happen to the old building in Trinity Street? At the time there were proposals for a number of restaurants, one in the cellar offering international cuisine, another on the first floor specialising in English food and a Pasta Kitchen right at the top. Then it was announced that the main ground floor was to be taken over by Laura Ashley, one of the fastest rising fashion and fabric businesses in the world. Now they have expanded into the upper areas with modern shopfittings disguising the ancient structure still so apparent from outside.

Jack Diver from Histon has been having a clearance and has come across a group of photographs of an event which seems to have been almost forgotten. At the time it was obviously important for hundreds of people stopped work and lined either side of a road through a factory – a factory where smoking was banned, as large notices testify. Then a small motor car – registration number CVE 539 - drove past, with a figure in uniform in the front passenger seat. It was followed by a limousine. Then it was all over and the crowds surged forward.

So what was going on? Jack says it was the Queen, who had flown back to Oakington airfield after a visit and was then driven through Chiver's factory to Histon station to take the Royal Train to London. But he can't quite remember when. The Centenary issue of 'Contact', the news-sheet of the Chivers-Hartley pensioners association confirms that the Queen with the Duke of Edinburgh did indeed drive through on their way from Cambridge to Histon station and were greeted by employees along the route, and gives the date as 20th October 1954. Mystery solved – or is it? For the Photographic Memories of Histon and Impington book says the date was 1955.

So I turned to that source of all Royal Cambridge information, Marion Colthorpe's book of that title.

She confirms the date as 20th October 1955, one of the most important in the history of the Corporation of Cambridge for it was the first time that a reigning Sovereign was to visit a Cambridge Mayor in the Guildhall. The weather did not appreciate the importance of the occasion as rain poured down steadily all day. Despite this crowds gathered early at Cambridge station to witness her arrival and lined the route to the city centre. All the Market stalls in front of the Guildhall had been cleared away and a dense crowd and a Guard of Honour had taken their place. But what should the City present as a souvenir to a woman who has everything? How about an electrocardiograph for monitoring the hearts of the Royal horses. After a speech from the Queen the Royal couple moved out onto the Guildhall balcony overlooking the Market Place. This was the moment the vast crowd had been waiting for, and the cheering was deafening.

But there was more to follow. The Royal couple drove through the rain to Newnham College, where they inspected an undergraduate's room. Then on to Trinity College, where trumpeters on the top of the Great Gate sounded a fanfare, and the College Choir sang madrigals from the Minstrels' Gallery during the lunch for 275 guests in the dining hall. But the main event of the day was the opening of the new School of Veterinary Medicine in Madingley Road. The day's final visit was to Girton College, where among those introduced to the Queen were members of the recently founded New Hall, the third of the Cambridge women's Colleges. Then it was time to leave for Histon Station and the London train – but as Jack's pictures show there was another reception – that of the Chivers staff as the Queen drove through their factory. NOT NOW USING THE PICTURE OF ST PAUL'S SCHOOL

From time to time the News reports the latest archaeological discoveries as a new and unexpected aspect of Cambridge history is revealed. But is there another one on the way: Peter Robinson from Clare College writes:

“The article in last Tuesday's Evening News about the excavation of the corner by the Catholic church to relay a gas main reminded me of a local historical question that has been nagging at the back of my mind for several years.

“When I was a student, some 25 years ago, someone told me that there was a complete Victorian public convenience buried under Hyde Park Corner in Cambridge. The story was that the entrances had to be blocked and paved over to make room for the slip roads in the corners when the junction was enlarged. The hut on the corner of Parker's Piece was then put up to provide alternative toilets.

“Is there any truth at all in this story? I have mentioned it to a number of people over the years and nobody else has heard it, including a friend who was training as a City "Blue Badge" guide. Is it just an urban myth or a hoax for which I fell? Of course, if by any chance it is true, it would be wonderful to take the opportunity to open it up for guided tours when then gas work is being undertaken...”

There were certainly underground lavatories at Hyde Park Corner. They were being discussed in February in 1899 and had been constructed by October 1902 when the News reported how the manager of the Cambridge Tramways Company had been summoned for damaging, injuring and spoiling the public convenience situated at Hyde Park Corner by scribbling on the woodwork with a pencil, thereby doing damage to the amount of 2s. After looking round to see if the custodian, Mr Thompson, was there he had scribbled “Thompson, old pig” on the woodwork.

The toilets were constructed beneath an ornate shelter that stood on an island at the junction of Lensfield Road and Hills Road / Regent Street. But what is its story. It was probably constructed in connection with the horse-drawn trams – a sort of light rail transport system – which had been opened in 1880. The shelter was there by 1899 and is depicted on a postcard of the Catholic Church taken in the early 1900s. It is marked on the OS map of 1927 and shown on a photograph of an Ortona bus taken in the 1930s. But when did it come down. [SCAN OF SHELTER BESIDE CHURCH c1900, BUS AND SHELTER 1930S]

Other underground loos to be erected at the same time were those on the Market Hill, that still serve the market traders. These have had a dramatic history, having been ransacked by undergraduates during construction in 1900 to provide fuel for a bonfire to celebrate the Relief of Ladysmith in the Boer War. Later they were the scene of incredible discoveries when, in the excitement of the excavations of the tomb of Tutankhamen in Egypt a number of undergraduates in exotic dress brought up pot after pot from the ‘tomb’ of ‘Toot-and-Come-In’. That was in 1924 but could there be other treasures to be found in the lost Victorian loos beneath Lensfield Road?

And while on the subject of street antiquities, what is the story behind the dates inscribed on the wall of a house at the corner of Fair Street and Maids Causeway. There are a series of dates and the letters HTP. Some people think they mark the height of various floods, others that – more likely – they indicate the parish boundaries of Holy Trinity Church and record the dates these were surveyed. [PHOTO FROM NEWS FILE OF THE INSCRIPTIONS] In the old days it was customary for children to accompany their elders on such surveys and then beaten at strategic points to ensure the location remained fixed in their minds. Enid Porter recorded one such incident:

“An old lady living in the Castle End district of Cambridge who died in 1960, aged nearly 90, said in 1950 that she could just remember what was, she thought, probably the last beating of the bounds of St Giles' parish which she was taken, as a small child, to watch. She recalled that the Vicar, Canon Slater, and the churchwardens had to go through the house occupied by a butcher, locally known as 'Porky' Evans, in Evans' Passage which used to lead from Castle Street to St Peter's Street. To enter the house so as correctly to mark the parish boundary, the Vicar and the rest of the procession had to climb through a ground-floor window.” [SCAN OF EVANS PASSAGE]

Readers write:

A recent Memories article about a house in Trumpington built from pieces of ancient timber salvaged from a house on Peas Hill has sparked an interesting letter from Alan Fakes of Willingham.

He writes: “You may be interested to know that I remember working on the house erected in Trumpington Long Rd, Cambridge for Mr Peck. I was a young man at the time, which I think would have been approx 1937. I carried out the leadwork to the support of the antique weathervane in the middle of the main ridge of the roof, which incorporates a lead pineapple, all still in situ. I also did some copper roofing to a flat roof at the rear, or it may have been the back, of the house. I remember that it was very cold winter weather at the time. We were told at the time that the timbers of this house were ones being re-assembled from a house which had been demolished on Peas Hill, Cambridge”

But it was not just this building that Alan worked on: “I also remember, as a young apprentice, working on the building of the Shire Hall on Castle Hill, Cambridge. Also on the previous demolition of the old prison on the site, the bricks from which were salvaged to build the new Shire Hall. Being young I took a macabre interest in the Execution shed, and Gallows, the Condemned cell, padded cell etc. I also carried out the copper roofwork to the tower of St George's Church in Chesterton, which I notice has now developed a fine green patina, which makes it visible from all around.” [SCAN OF GAOL]

Margaret Cream from Cambridge also had her memories jogged by the Trumpington article and in particular by the mention of Ted Mott, the photographer. Margaret lived next door to Mott and his sister on the Shelford Road until she was ten years old, before moving to near another 'character', Kitty Willers and her parents. She continues: “My husband worked for Mr Bull, dairyman who used the yard next to the 'Coach and Horses' and his cows were taken to and from the meadows between the railway bridge and the mill. The family who did the washing were the Poulterers and they lived in Whitlock's Yard. [REPRISE PICTURE?] They pegged washing on lines on the recreation ground, where the shops are now. A Mrs Matthews lived on the High Street opposite the 'Tally Ho'; she made very good coffee and village children would go to her back door to buy it for only a few coppers.” Margaret also tells me that the picture of the old gentleman on the cover of the 'Trumpington Past and Present' book – taken by Ted Mott – was her grandfather [SCAN OF COVER ATTACHED]

My mention of the Turks Head restaurant has also prompted letters and e-mails. Reg Stokes writes: “We started our courting at the Turk's head on February 29th 1968 with a meal of chicken and chips and then went on to the Victoria Cinema to see 'Up the Junction'. You certainly stirred up the memories – the lady in question has been my wife for the last thirty-three years!” [REPRISE PHOTO?]

Trevor Cowell from Cherry Hinton works for Kershaw Mechanical Services and in the 1960s they were making and fitting extract canopies and air conditioning in many of the Berni inn chain of restaurants. They used to ‘borrow’ a menu to tick-off where they’d been and has sent a specimen from September 1964 to jog memories of what was on offer, and the prices charged. [MENU]

M.J. Pearce from Sawston writes: “At the time of the closure of the Turk’s Head my older brother was the Managing Director of Berni Inns. He left Sawston Village College when he was 14 years old and started work as an apprentice chef at Trinity College in 1937. Later he had a number of senior jobs in catering and at the time of the closure, working for Berni, he came to negotiate a new lease of the property with Trinity College who were the owners. The agent for the college was a gentleman named Pemberton of the Trumpington family. They could not conclude an agreement so the lease was not renewed and the Turk’s head closed. My brother told me afterwards if the agent realised he was negotiating with an apprentice chef from the kitchens of Trinity College”

Rodney Dale from Haddenham can add further details to the Royal progression through Chivers factory in 1955 (Memories last week): “The Queen drove from Oakington to Histon via Park Lane (Histon!) and down Station Road presumably to Chivers. Station Road had been resurfaced for the occasion. We stood at the gate and said 'Hurrah!' It must have been 1955, because I was in Germany doing National Service in 1954”

Memories 13th August 2003 by Mike Petty

The changes in refuse collection and the introduction of wheelie-bins in South Cambridgeshire have brought the question of rubbish back into the news columns and letter pages. But similar issues have been reported time and again over the centuries

Back in 1575, the time of the first Queen Elizabeth, an agreement was made between the Town and University for the correction of common nuisances. Part of this saw arrangements for the streets in front of colleges, churches, houses of students, the market place and other central areas to be cleansed and swept twice a week, on Wednesdays and Saturdays with all other lanes cleaned once a week at least. The muck and filth was to be carried to common dunghills – and no other place on pain of a fine of £1. But householders could spread their own muck on their own grounds, or in other men’s fields, providing they got permission of the owner.

It also appointed two or more common carters to collect all muck, mire and filth laying in heaps within the precincts of the town and to prevent people taking advantage it limited the amount of horse or cow dung that could be collected. But as some people had more muck than others the agreement allowed for the extra to be removed at an additional charge which they could negotiate with the collectors.

Despite centuries of practice at getting such operations right the papers have been full of complaints; in May 1897 a correspondent to the News, signing himself “Shopkeeper” complained:

Will you allow me a small space to refer to the arrangements for sweeping and cleaning Fitzroy Street? After one gets one's place thoroughly cleaned and dusted, ready for business, we have three men commence sweeping the street and it is impossible sometimes to see across the road for dust. After this is done and the cart takes the rubbish away the water cart makes its appearance about two hours later. Considering that Fitzroy Street is one of the busiest streets of Cambridge I think these things could be altered to the benefit of the tradespeople of the street

But this was in addition to the everyday – or once-a-week - refuse collection which has prompted various complaints and in March 1901 saw a Cambridge lady taken to court:

Miss W— of Regent Street, Cambridge was summoned for causing an obstruction by leaving some refuse tins in the street. P.C. Cole said he saw the tins outside her premises at 10.11 pm and they were still there at one o'clock the next morning. She said she placed the rubbish outside overnight because the scavenger came so early in the morning – 6.35am - before she was up. The Chief Constable said something had to be done to stop the practice of putting pails of rubbish out overnight. The defendant was cautioned and dismissed.

Some thought that the dustmen themselves were the problem; as the CDN reported in January 1952

After Monday wash day it's Tuesday bucket-and-shovel day for the women of the Cambridge's Queen Street, or Dustmen's Folly as it has been re-named by the residents. Tuesday is the day when the dustcart calls to empty the conglomeration of tin cans, ashes, kitchen waste and other refuse. Every Tuesday morning as regularly as clockwork 20 housewives place 20 dustbins on the pavements for the dustmen to empty. Promptly at mid-day the dust-cart hoves in sight and the contents are emptied into the cart with a liberal application for the road as well. And 20 housewives wait for the metallic clang that is the signal for them to go into action with brushes, buckets and shovels to clear up the mess the dustmen leave behind – for the street is in a worse state than it was before they called. And so seldom is a street cleaner to be seen that to the majority of the residents he is a legendary figure, though Mrs Fry who runs a little general stores does claim to have seen the Abominable Dustman

Others claimed that better-off residents got a better service: thus in 1913 it was alleged that in the De Freville area the binmen collected rubbish from the back of the house, but in poorer areas people needed to take it to the front.

Both rich and poor were asked to be selective in what they put out; in April 1923 an official urged:

I am asked to point out to the public the danger of getting rid of their war relics by placing them amongst their refuse. Thoughtlessness of this kind might have serious consequences for the men working at the Corporation destructor. No less than eight live cartridges were found in one load recently, and fortunately they were discovered before they reached the destructor. People should think twice before depositing explosives amongst their rubbish, and in this way endangering the lives of those who removed and destroy it.

But no matter when it was collected, or where it was collected from, one issue was what the rubbish should be deposited in.

In 1911 Cambridge councillors proposed a new byelaw that refuse should be placed in galvanised receptacles, but some felt that the cost was too high and that these would be abused - tenants might use them for wheelbarrows, coal scuttles or to give babies baths in.

By April 1948 the issue of dustbins was again being aired in the letters page:

Sir, I am interested in the letter of H.O. Fleming on the collection of refuse. The only way to have the old dustbin removed is to see the dustmen personally and make a suitable arrangement with them. I have had to do this myself and have found them very civil and helpful. The dustmen are highly selective and seem to go through the bins carefully, taking out anything they do not fancy and strewing it about. They also batter the bin out of shape very quickly and in may case leave it some distance away from where it is placed outside my premises. - R.Partington, Maids Causeway, Cambridge

But a dustman's lot was not a happy one, as one explained in September 1947

Sir - A dustman's wage is £3.16s.0d a week, irrespective of loads or journeys. I wonder if your readers would like to try this job for a while. They would then find out the discomforts which are a dustman's lot. He mustn't mind when lifting a bin if water and filth trickle down his neck through a hole; he mustn't mind if somebody puts some acid in a bin which when emptied sprays on one's clothes and burns holes in them (these are not replaced). One pair of overalls a year is the limit. Each motor is given a district and that has to be cleared, and if the dust and smell should make him feel ill he must just carry on. With all this we are expected to sort all the paper from the dirt. If all householders kept it separate it would be different. Critics should try on a windy day, emptying a bin that has been crammed full. It is impossible to do it without some dropping but if the loaders stop to pick it up every time, the driver would be in the next street - A Dustman

About 50 years ago News reporter Philip Osborne took a look at the situation in Cambridge. He found:

There are 33 dustmen working in Cambridge together with nine drivers for nine lorries and a foreman at the Mill Road depot to act as a peace-maker between his men and the owners of dented dustbins.

Bill Oliver, who is 52 in November, has been a dustman since 1928, the year before the mechanised transport came in. He is a big jolly dustman who speaks of the trials of a dustman's life: "The dustman is always in the wrong. Suppose a dog knocks the lid of a dustbin and the wind takes it some way down the street. The dustman picks it up and because he's in a hurry, puts it on the first bin he sees without one. Some party will be sure to complain 'The men have taken my dustbin lid'

"I had one party in Garden Walk. She had a lot of rose cuttings in her bin. I left my scuttle in her garden while I went outside to shove her cuttings in the lorry. I wasn't supposed to, we're supposed to leave garden rubbish. Then she complained about me leaving my filthy scuttle in her garden"

There are the 'wide boys' with their own lorries who collect waste paper a street or two ahead of the dustmen and leave litter on the ground so people say 'Look what the dustmen have done'

It seems the poorer the district, the more rubbish there is. The Rock Estate is light work compared with Romsey Town. George Gray, the foreman, says "You hardly every go to a working-class house and find the bin half full. There is usually a full bin and a bit at the side"

But in all districts are to be found the forbidden garden rubbish, the brick rubble, the hot cinders, sump oil and liquids that make an untippable mush of the refuse; rubbish stamped on and jumped on to get more in (and make it impossible to get out again); and often, instead of proper bins, rusting tins, & boxes of oil drums with jagged edges.

Now all this is to change and all will be peace and tranquillity – or will it? The opinions quoted are from the news of the past, what betting they are not repeated in the News of the next few months?

Memories 20th August 2003, by Mike Petty

We live in a world of constant change; things that have been part of our lives and landscape for as long as we can remember suddenly disappear and we find it difficult to remember just what they looked like.

This is not a new phenomenon; in August 1903 – 100 years ago – William Beales Redfarn wrote to the Cambridge Daily News:

“Sir – I believe a great number of antiquarians will learn with regret that one of our most ancient links with the past has just disappeared. The Falcon Inn Yard in Petty Cury has always been one of the sights of Cambridge but now like so many of its kind it has been removed to make way for modern improvements. So quietly has the old Falcon taken flight that I fear our local photographers have not secured pictures of the old buildings and its destruction has escaped even the lynx-eyed representatives of the Press”.

Redfarn was a politician, Mayor of Cambridge four times, leader of the Conservative party, chairman of this, leader of that, and Director of the New Theatre in St Andrew’s Street. But he is best remembered today as an illustrator. Born in Cambridge in 1840 William had studied for some years with J.F. Herring, the famous animal painter, who then lived at Fulbourn. But it was in 1875 that he started to record the ancient and interesting buildings of his home town before they were lost forever in the demolition and restoration that was then the rage. The engravings were issued in monthly parts but then brought together into a volume entitled "Old Cambridge" which was published in 1876.

One of these featured the Falcon Yard. In the accompanying text Redfarn described its lofty gables, the yard which had almost entirely escaped modernisation and was a fine specimen of a timber building, its galleries, low arched doors, wide oak staircases and the large banqueting chambers which by then had long been divided into tenements.

But another Cambridge illustrator was less concerned about the change – indeed it might boost his income. Robert Farren, who published a number of books of engravings, responded:

“Sir – the alarm about the old Falcon Inn, Petty Cury, being demolished unrecorded seems to me unnecessary. Certainly within the last 40 years I have sent out almost as many drawings of it, to say nothing of the etchings. It, with the old Wrestlers Inn, has been a small gold mine to me. One noticeable thing I might mention: it was the last inn to hang out a flag as a sign that the recruiting sergeant was at home”.

The Cambridge Daily News was quick to comment on the demolition:

“Our attention has been drawn to the fact that another link with the fascinating past of Cambridge is being severed by the almost entire demolition of the one-time famous ‘Falcon Inn’. Historical spots and places, interesting, even sacred, though they may be, have at times to give way to the requirements of modern times. The old Falcon Inn is one of these.

“Many years ago the front of the building, with its fine old gables facing Petty Cury, disappeared and about eight years ago the buildings on the left side of the Falcon Yard were demolished to make way for business extensions. Now the rooms on the right side are in process of demolition in order that extra accommodation for the Lion Hotel may be afforded. The back part possessing a small specimen of the open gallery which was an architectural feature of the Falcon remains and still gives a faint idea of what the ancient inn was like. For many years the Falcon has ceased to fulfil the functions of an inn. Modernites forsook it. Its glory is entirely in the past”.

Indeed in 1850 a journalist had reported on his visit to the Falcon Yard which had become the most disgraceful slum in Cambridge. About 300 people lived in the Yard and “there are two privies for the use of the whole of the inhabitants, but as they are at a distance of fifty yards from some portion of the premises those of the inhabitants who have back windows to their rooms are in the habit of throwing all their refuse out of the windows on to a large dung heap in the Red Lion Yard, the reeking steam from which is constantly penetrating the room”

One woman described the single room in which she had lived for 34 years, the bed “as big as an old pocket handkerchief” had to accommodate her husband and daughter as well. Another bedded down in a room with no light whatsoever, a candle revealing a black hole in which a pile of clothes on the floor served for bedding.

The stately galleries so loved by antiquarians had been divided into apartments let at rent varying from 1/4 [ONE SHILLING AND FOUR PENCE] to 2/- [TWO SHILLINGS] per week and although several were remarkably clean “the majority are as wretched as it is possible to conceive”. By 1885 they had been condemned by the Medical Officer of Health and the poor forced to find other lodgings.

The redevelopment that followed was itself ripped down for the present Lion Yard shopping precinct, with its multi-storey car park, courts and roof-top public garden that will soon be redeveloped once more. Perhaps in the future somebody will lament “Do you remember the Old Lion Yard Car Park”.

Now in 2003 comes news that developers are moving in on another of Cambridge’s much-loved ancient buildings, the White Horse Inn on Castle Street. Part of the inn yard, which once echoed to the sound of horses, is to become a construction site. This creaky old building, with its narrow staircases, low beams, ancient fireplaces and secret room is packed with antiquities; old paintings hang on the walls, heavy old furniture, pots, pans and domestic knick-knacks from bygone days abound, for it is home to the Cambridge and County Folk Museum.

But this time the changes are to be welcomed. For when the builders finally leave next summer there will be a new extension slotted in to the rear with better facilities, a meeting room, a lift, loos and more space to display the wonderful range of material the museum has rescued and cared for since it opened in 1936. The Inn Yard itself will once more become the focal point and main entrance to the site with panels interpreting the history of this area of Cambridge. The old White Horse Inn building will have been taken back to the way it was a century ago. The creaky steps & ancient timbers will still be there but the fabric itself will be allowed to tell its own story, as well as being a home to bygones.

There is still time for us all to have one last visit before work commences on 1st October and the Museum shuts its doors until next summer. To climb those rickety stairs, admire the great hearth around which travellers rested, the pots and pans, old vacuum cleaners, half-pint milk bottles, fenland tools, dulcimers and the rest. To revive our memories of the past and ensure that in years to come we can say, “Do you remember the old Folk Museum?” [SCAN OF

Joy Fuller of Westmere Farm Upware seeks your help:

“In the autumn of 1995, a new Cock-Up Bridge was built over Wicken Lode near Upware, to replace the old bridge which was in a very sad state of repair. Following representations from local people it was agreed that the new bridge should be a replica of the original. Even though only pedestrian public rights were recorded over the bridge, the new bridge was built to be suitable for use by horse drawn vehicles [SCAN OF THE OLD COCK-UP BRIDGE WICKEN SHOWING SLATS FOR HORSES]

“But why is the bridge called a Cock-Up Bridge? Like the 'cock horse' going to Banbury Cross, a cock horse is a trace horse - as would be used for towing or 'haling' boats on the Lodes, or hitched in front of a shaft horse to give an extra pull along the fen droves. Bill Coppin, formerly of Upware, can remember working with a 'cock' horse, helping to pull carts along the Swaffham Prior fen droves and crossing the River Cam by chain ferry at the 'No Hurry'.” [SCAN OF JUNCTION OF BURWELL AND REACH LODE SHOWING BARGE c1900]

Charles Lucas, a Burwell doctor, recalled in 1930 when there were other Cock-up bridges & there were built like a drawbridge

“The construction was as follows: a floor, ten feet in length, attached at one side to a hinge, spanned the stream. On the hinge side were two upright planks about fifteen or sixteen feet long and an oblong frame twice the length of the floor and suspended between the two planks, so that half the frame projected over the floor, the other half over the bank. Two heavy weights suspended on chains which ran down part of the frame projecting over the floor and, hanging down at the end of the frame, were hooked on to the floor. In the centre of the back part of the frame a chain was attached: when this chain was pulled down, it raised the floor from a horizontal to a vertical position, so that there was a free course for boats to pass with masts up. These bridges were very prominent features in the district and could be seen for many miles around. From the mode of lifting up the floor the Fenmen called them 'Cock-up' bridges.” If you can help further please contact Joy on 01353 720288 [SCAN OF ANOTHER COCKUP BRIDGE AT BURWELL WITH CHILDREN DIVING, SCAN OF MODEL OF OLD COCK-UP BRIDGE]

Dr Lucas knew the area well and could comment on the changes:

“At the Priory Farm, near a cock-up bridge in 1849, a gatepost was put down on into the solid earth a distance of eight or ten feet and a gate was hung on it, just clearing the ground. At the present time the gatepost is still in existence and a gate is hung on it, but the ground all round has so wasted and disappeared that a horse and cart can be driven with ease under it, showing distinctly the difference of level then and now”.

The soil continues to erode and motorists driving from Swaffham Prior or Reach through to Upware will find their cars tossed from side to side on the lumpy road. But it was worse in Lucas' time:

“My first memorable drive into the heart of Swaffham Fen will demonstrate the alteration in the level. The conveyance was a Stanhope gig with very high splaying wheels to negotiate the deep ruts and throw the dirt away. In those days it was always more or less an adventure, because one would be lucky if one got home without a broken spring or shaft or without being pitched into a ditch. The start was from Barton Bridge Reach. The drove was forty feet wide, the track in the centre was the most desirable, the two side tracks being impossibly rough, and the ruts were from fourteen to eighteen inches deep in soft black earth. The wheel tracks were most uneven; one wheel would be down and the other up; and when the horse gave a plunge forward, it took a lot of practice to keep a firm seat. It was only possible to go at a walking pace. After proceeding thus for about three miles we came to the main drain, and here we went down a steep incline to the bridge and then up again on the other side. If it had not been for the apron I should have been pitched into the drain. At the present time there is quite a three- or four-foot rise to get over the bridge

“About a mile farther on we came to the Cam bank; as we sat in the gig we were on a level with the towing path, and the number of horse-drawn lighters was a surprise. Turning to the left on the road by the Cam bank we went to Upware. Just before we got to the Swaffham engine (which had not long been erected) we passed the foundation of the old water-mill which used to scoop the water out of the Fen. Looking over the right side the expanse of land towards Reach was on a level with the river-bank, which is now like a wall six or seven feet high above the road - clear evidence of the sinking of the land.” [SCAN OF UPWARE PUMPING ENGINE c1930]

Briscoe Snelson knew the area in the inter-war years; he was an enthusiastic photographer and his lantern-slide views are preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection. They capture the beauty and tranquillity of the area – and there is the problem. For at a public inquiry at the Gardiner Memorial Hall, Burwell on Tuesday 9th September inspectors will consider whether Harrison’s Drove and the route along Wicken Lode should be designated a byway. In an age when horses and carriages have been overtaken by four-wheel-drive motors the decision is an important one for the future enjoyment of the area. [SCAN OF SNELSON VIEW TOWARDS UPWARE – SHOWING STORM CLOUDS GATHERING]

Another area of tranquillity concerns Ann Sanderson who e-mails to say that St Bede's school, Birdwood Road, Cherry Hinton, have been doing a local heritage project, researching a small site in Cherry Hinton called 'Giants Grave' or 'Springhead' or 'Robin Hood dip'. This is the Spring site opposite the Robin Hood pub at the junction of Cherry Hinton Road and High Street. Over the past year, they’ve researched its history, done surveys, metal detecting, archaeology, botanical studies, theodolite measurements etc etc, and visited the Records Office, Cambridgeshire Collection, local library, and University Department of Aerial Photography. Now they have a wealth of information, which the students are presenting to the local historical society and have a grant to cover the cost of printing an information leaflet and manufacture of a permanent site board.

But there are still some things missing. In all their enquiries they’ve had no response from local residents with memories of the site – the sort of things that don’t get written down. Nor can they confirm a rumour that the original Robin Hood pub burnt down in the middle of the last century, though they know from Greene King that the present building was opened in 1960. Finally, they know the site was relandscaped between 1951 and 1972. I believe this probably took place in March 1969 for I included a picture in my book ‘Memory Lane, Cambridge’. The News reported: "A new water park at Cherry Hinton: When the City Council Parks Department began to make a thorough clear-out of the old sping opposite the Robin Hood public house, they realised it had an island in the centre. Plans for the newly-cleared area include the planting of willow trees, spring bulbs and bog plants in wetter areas. The spring is the source of the brook which flows through Cherry Hinton and across to Brooks Road. For some time it has been home of weeds, rubbish and bicycle frames". [SCAN OF SPRING SITE 1969, SCAN OF ROBIN HOOD PUB 1953]

Ann is the parent helper and co-ordinator for the student project and would welcome any information. If you can help e-mail her - ann@foxton.freemove.co.uk, or phone Cambridge 870799

The Hyde Park underground toilets continue to attract letters

Anthony Battle Evans e-mails: "Your item about the public convenience at Hyde Park Corner reminds me that my grandmother always complained that it was intended for men only and that ladies were seriously inconvenienced." Rodney Dale from Haddenham says that he and hundreds of others who went to the Perse School when it was at Gonville Place, will testify to the entombed public lavatory under the road between the Catholic Church and The Oak Public House. Mrs Grace Atkinson writes: "I am now 85 years old, but I certainly remember the loo at Hyde Park Corner. As a child I caught the bus there to go into town for my parents. It was painted green with a roof on it, so I waited in the dry. Then in 1940 I moved to Bedford where my late husband was in the army and I drove the Eastern National Buses there. When five years later my husband was invalided out of the army we returned to Cambridge and I applied for release, but oh no! I was transferred to Eastern Counties buses and drove in Cambridge. Thinking back to those years in the late 40's I am sure I still picked up and put down at that loo on Hyde Park Corner Margaret Cream from Gwydir St Cambridge also remembers the Hyde Park loos, though she never went down them. She points out that it was toffee – not coffee – that so attracted the children to Mrs Matthew's house opposite the Tally Ho in Trumpington High Street (Memories 6th August). She adds: "The only coffee most folk had in those days would be 'Camp', a dark liquid in a square bottle. Not many children would be allowed it. I often made a cup for the A.A. man on 'point duty' at the crossroads on the Shelford and Hauxton junction. I knew all the A.A. men, friends of my dad.

That opens two new areas for memories – coffee is now an everyday part of our daily lives, but what do you recall of your first taste of it; and what reminiscences do you have of the A.A. man, his yellow motorbike and the roadside telephone boxes? [SCAN OF AA MAN AT TRUMPINGTON 1920s]

Memories 3rd September 2003, by Mike Petty

John Jennings e-mails to say that his eagle-eyed brother-in-law John Cooper has spotted something odd about one of the pictures I featured in my Memories article on 30th July. Jack Diver who discovered the original photograph believed it showed a visit by the Queen to Chivers' factory at Histon in 1955, and Eleanor Whitehead and her team of historians agreed with him, including a similar picture in their excellent book 'Photographic Memories of Histon and Impington'

But John noticed that the small car registration number CVE 539 leading the limousine past cheering crowds of Chivers workers appears to have headlight filters fitted. These were used during the blackout in the Second World War to reduce the danger of vehicles being bombed by enemy aircraft – but they would have been removed by 1955. [SCAN OF CARS AT CHIVERS]

Comparison with another picture of such filters on cars parked on Cambridge Market Hill about 1943 confirms that John is probably right. [SCAN OF CAR ON MARKET HILL SHOWING HEADLIGHT FILTERS]

So if it was not a visit by the Queen what was going on? In 1949 Chivers issued a booklet entitled "Another Chapter" detailing their contribution to the war effort in which they mention two visits of 'important personages' to the Histon factory. One was the Duke of Gloucester who showed great interest in the preparation of Mashed Potato Powder and Blackcurrant Puree. The other was Lord Woolton, Minister of Food. He spent a whole day at the factories at Histon and Huntingdon to express appreciation for the contribution being made by the farms and factories to the appeal for increased food production. He visited each department and addressed the staff over the broadcasting system. So was it one of these in the limousine? Can anybody help to put the record right?

Dr Alf Peacock, formerly director of the York Educational Settlement, was born in Histon and recalled his memories of the war-time years in the village in an essay published in the late 1970s. His parents worked for Chivers – but not in the factory:

"My father and mother were both agricultural workers - agricultural labourers they were called in those rather more forthright days. My father came from a large family and worked for well over 50 years for Chivers and Sons, the famous jam manufacturers. I have a presentation gold watch recording this long and 'loyal' service. On the eve of the Second World War my father got 'thirty bob', which with deductions meant a take-home wage of 29s. 4d (£1.47). He gave my mother 29s. and undoubtedly spent the remainder on Digger Shag tobacco - he rolled his own foul fags and used to say that his craving for tobacco could not be satisfied by even the ferocious Woodbine. Mother also went to work - in the fields for most of the year and, if she was lucky, in the winter in Chivers' 'potato shed', where she and her mates graded the vegetables for marketing. Wages here were low, but better than nothing.

"We lived at number 8, Orchard Road, Histon in a 'non parlour' house. Orchard Road, then, was a council estate, and we were the first tenants. Prior to that we had lived in a little 'one up and one down' white washed, wattle and daub cottage opposite the Sally Army hut in Impington Lane. You got to the top floor of our cottage by a ladder - and next door to our abode was a big walnut tree. One night there was a gale, and next morning our cottage roof was bare and the walnut tree was thatched. Maybe this was the reason why our house was then condemned, an administrative decision which undoubtedly helped us get a house in Casey's Court as Orchard Road was sometimes known. My parents had to indicate whether they wanted 'parlour' or 'non parlour' and my mother continually regretted - when things got better - that she did not have the front room which undoubtedly would never have been used except at Christmas and on 'Feast Sunday'.

"In Orchard Road, and in the village as a whole, there were a large number of people who were employed at the jam factory. If you worked there you had a shorter working week, certainly better conditions than did farm workers, but most important of all you earned an extra pound or so a week. This extra quid enabled you to do much more than we could (and live in a parlour type) and I remember many many explanations about why we did not have holidays when others did, or why my friend could go and see Bertram Mills' Circus in Cambridge and I could not. 'They get more money than us', my mother would explain, 'their dad is at the factory and earns a pound a week more than yours'. Funny thing I always accepted this, never, ever, felt any resentment and accepted the fact that we were second class citizens.

"Why did people like my parents not leave the land and work in the factory? The answer to that is easy. They were not allowed to. My mother desperately wanted to become a 'factory hand', but she could not change. Maybe during the war she was not allowed to, it was impossible, as there were official restrictions on doing so. So what could my parents do to get a little more money? They could take other jobs- and that is what they did. Father, an expert gravedigger, and his wife, looked after Impington church. She cleaned the place, he cleaned the church yard, lit the fires, pumped the organ, rang the bells and locked up. [SCAN OF IMPINGTON CHURCH]

“I do not know how much time my mother put in at the church but my father worked there for several evenings a week, a long time on Saturdays, and all day on Sundays. For this the pair of them got the princely sum of five shillings (25p) a week. Eventually they had to ask for assistance from the state. The means test ‘came round’ and they were refused help. Why? Well they were told it was because they had ‘two incomes’. Get this. People at ‘the factory’ getting £2 10s [TWO POUNDS TEN SHILLINGS] (£2.50) a week could qualify for help, these two working on the land, then in the evenings, then on Saturdays and Sundays and still getting 15 shillings (75p) less than the factory hands did not. It all seemed dreadfully unfair and made my father bitterly resentful. I am sorry to have to record that he took it out on the one representative of authority that he could get at - the vicar - by causing thick coke fumes to permeate the church”

“You keep a quiet” was included in ‘Essays in York History’ edited by Alf Peacock in 1997.

News that the blockbuster musical “Buddy: The Buddy Holly Story” is to come to the Cambridge Corn Exchange from 8th to 13th September has coincided with the discovery of a fuzzy photograph thought to show the real Buddy Holly on Cambridge’s Magdalene Bridge. But did he perform here or did anybody see the real Buddy Holly in concert. [SCAN OF PICTURE OF BUDDY HOLLY ON MAGDALENE BRIDGE RECEIVED FROM NEWS]

Recent Memories articles have prompted replies.

On the initials on the wall in Fair Street, John Newnham, Chairman of the Society of Cambridge Tourist Guides e-mails: “There is no mystery to the inscriptions on the wall of the house at the corner of Fair Street and Maids Causeway. They mark the parish boundaries of Holy Trinity. Similar marks are to be seen on the west side of Trinity Library marking All Saints Parish and St Mary’s Parish.” Heather Richardson of Cambridge confirms the initials as being those of Holy Trinity; she believes the bounds were beaten again in the late 1980’s or early 90’s when she was churchwarden there. [PHOTO OF THE INSCRIPTIONS]

Anthony Battle Evans e-mails: “Your item about the beating of the bounds of St Giles parish mentioned that the vicar and the churchwardens had to go through the house occupied by the butcher Porky Evans in Evans Passage. Evans Passage is named after the pork butcher’s shop at its entrance. The shop was owned by William Battle in the eighteenth century and the passage was called Battle’s Passage. In 1793 Elizabeth Battle married John Evans and their son Zachariah took over the shop and the name then changed to Evans Passage. Zachariah called one of his sons William Battle Evans and the name Battle has been a forename of four later generations, though unhappily it was never carried by the line which ended with Porky Evans.” [SCAN OF EVANS PASSAGE]

Memories 10th September 2003 by Mike Petty

On 8th September 2003 security was intense around Cambridge's University Arms Hotel for a meeting of senior NATO generals. Uniformed police were on patrol together with numerous gentlemen in dark suits and sunglasses muttering into their communicators. Inside uniformed delegates discussed matters of military moment. Later they adjourned for dinner to Trinity College where they were joined by Minister of Defence Geoff Hoon [PLEASE CHECK HIS TITLE AND SPELLING OF HIS NAME]. Such gatherings are nothing new to Trinity – but I wonder if Monday night's delegates appreciated how they were following in the footsteps of other distinguished military leaders. [OLD PHOTO OF UNIFORMED PORTER AT UNIVERSITY ARMS HOTEL – IS THERE A MODERN PICTURE OF THE UNIFORMED DELEGATES]

For at Trinity College in September 1907 other military men were making plans for the deployment of thousands of British troops. Soon 130,000 enemy soldiers would land at Great Yarmouth and Lowestoft and head inland. Cambridge took it all very placidly – watched the officers start off in their motor cars, and chatted to the men in the bar of the Lion Hotel. For this was just a paper exercise with Sir John French and his cronies returning nightly to the peace of that College.

Within a year the troops were real as 150 horsemen passed through Cambridge. One squadron of cavalry spent the night on Grantchester Meadows, another by the side the Witchford Road at Ely & yet more in Withersfield Road, Haverhill. A country policeman found eight soldiers in full uniform with hats and spurs, their horses tethered by their side, lying dead to the world, fast asleep. Meanwhile the invading Irish Hussars fought inland from Colchester. Again Cambridge did not panic – it was just a military exercise.

In September 1910 the German army swarmed ashore at Kings Lynn and conquered Lincoln. The King issued a proclamation imposing military control throughout Cambridgeshire as the invaders swept south. This time Cambridge fell and a fierce battle raged from Helions Bumpstead to Kelshall, fiercest around Elmdon where British trenches were more than once captured by the Magdeburg battalions only to be hurled out again by the Coldstream Guards. By noon the magnificent palace at Audley End was in flames and desperate fighting was taking place in the streets of Saffron Walden. The timely arrival of General Packington's force from Potton proved decisive; despite a final cavalry charge the Germans were slaughtered, swept out of existence by a terrible cross fire. By nightfall there was no unwounded German south of Whittlesford, except as a prisoner. The Battle of Royston was hailed as a great victory in the Daily Mail of September 10th 1910. But this too was a fictional war, recounted in a novel, 'The Battle of Royston', by William Le Queux that had been published to point out the likely impact of such a real invasion, a story that so impressed Field Marshall Lord Roberts that he added a Foreword. [PERHAPS FIND A PICTURE OF AUDLEY END FROM LIBRARY?]

Two years later in September 1912 the soldiers were real. There were scenes of great activity, of route marches and cavalry charges, airships and artillery as an invading army - led by Sir Douglas Haig - advanced across the ground around Newmarket, Royston and Linton. Though the men and munitions were real it was, once more just an exercise directed by Sir John French from his base at Trinity College. But there were guards with bayonets fixed at the gateway when the King came to encourage his soldiers, of both sides

Then in September 1914 the troops on the Cambridge commons told their own tale, as real soldiers gathered for a real war that would test all the practices of the previous decade. As that war progressed Trinity, like many other Colleges, turned its front courts over to officer cadets and its rear cloisters for an open-air hospital for wounded casualties of the fighting planned within its walls

Who knows what history will learn of the Cambridge discussions of September 2003.

Was it Buddy Holly on Cambridge's Magdalene Bridge I asked, and did you ever see him perform?

"The photo doesn't look too much like Buddy Holly to be", says Emma Martin from Lt Downham, "but my judgement may be clouded by the 45 years that have passed since I saw him. Buddy only ever made one tour of the UK and I was lucky enough to be taken to see his show in 1958 at the Davis Theatre (or was it the Grand) in Croydon, Surrey. I was 11 at the time and my lifelong remembrance is of 'Raining in My Heart' and watching a member of the Crickets playing the tubular bells. One of the few '78s that I still have is 'Oh Boy' and 'That'll Be the Day' on Coral records. Shame I don't have a record player that will play '78s any more"

Other readers are certain it was him. Philip Brooks e-mails: "Yes it is a photograph of Buddy Holly and the Crickets taken from a home movie possibly filmed by Norman Petty, Buddy Holly's manager or Vivien Petty, his wife. It was shown on the BBC Arena Programme to mark the 25th anniversary of Buddy's death. The group were sightseeing in Cambridge on Sunday March 16th 1958 while on their way to Leicester after performing in Ipswich the previous night".

Sid French from Witchford has a copy of a 1986 video made by Sir Paul McCartney which shows the colour film whilst Peter Feast from Cambridge identifies two of the Crickets as Jerry Allison and Joe B. Maudlin together with Buddy's road manager Wally. He adds: "I was never one to bunk-off school but if I had known they were in town I may well have gone sick or something. I don't know if the tourist office ever mentions to visitors that Buddy Holly and The Crickets once stood on that bridge, but I think it would be nice if the council mounted a plaque on the site".

If you should happen to catch a glance of somebody like Buddy on the bridge in the next day or two it might not be a ghost. For the blockbuster musical "Buddy: The Buddy Holly Story" is showing at the Cambridge Corn Exchange this week [PHOTOS OF BUDDY HOLLY, REUSE PICTURE FROM LAST WEEK]

Memories, 17th September 2003, by Mike Petty

Browse through any family album and you're almost sure to come across a faded snap of an old school group, the young faces staring wonderingly at the camera. But who were they, and what did the world have in store for them? Last night Over villagers celebrated the publication of a book that answers some of those questions.

There were two schools in Over in 1904, a National 'Church' school and a British 'Council' school, which was mainly for non-conformists, and feelings ran high when a popular schoolmaster was dismissed by the vicar. But who needed education when the youngsters would find jobs in farming, horticulture or the expanding fruit and flower growing businesses. Entertainment would be found at the church, chapel or in the eight public houses. [SCAN OF OVER SCHOOL GROUP 1904]

A decade later the village gained new residents, outsiders - foreign refugees from Belgians forced out of their country by advancing German troops. Many of the boys pictured in the school photographs took the opportunity to see the world – or at least mud of France and Flanders. Nearly 140 Over men served in that First World War, fifteen were killed, others wounded or gassed.

Yet when the survivors returned they found not peace and plenty but influenza, unemployment and hardship as the Depression Years drove many off the land to seek work in the cities. For those who stayed within the village there were improvements, council houses 'fit for heroes', piped water, even electricity. There was a Jubilee and a Coronation to celebrate and another war was looming.

The Second World War saw nearly 100 men depart for active service and about the same number of new strangers arrive – this time evacuees from Islington who found life in the fens flat and boring, despite the number of planes, from both sides, filling the skies. As rationing was introduced so farming became once more important, fen fields were ploughed for the first time and fen droves concreted.

The end of the war saw the men return, once more to a life of shortage and hardship. Again agriculture came under pressure, this time from a Labour Government's land nationalisation plans and from the fenman's oldest enemy, the 1947 floods. It was the same in village after village.

All of this was reported, week by week, in local papers. Now John Symonds from Waterlooville, Hants has plodded through the back issues the Cambridge Independent Press, transcribing the reports penned by the village correspondents, to compile a massive 540-page volume that records the hopes and fears, tragedies and triumphs of this small Cambridgeshire community from 1900 to 1950.

All life is there, for newspapers invariably report the sadness as well as joy, the accidents and crimes that brought distress to victim and perpetrator's family. If your ancestors ever lived in or near the area, even if they played cricket against the village team, then they may be named. There is no name index so such mentions have to be sought for, page by page.

But as well as snippets there are larger articles such as the memories of Jack Cook that literally throw light a subject not normally recorded, one that affected communities everywhere.

"Until 1909 the village streets in wintertime were in darkness, except for large oil lamps at the Churches, and one on Wayman's gatepost opposite the building yard. Then the Parish Council installed the first street lamps. Fifty-four lamps it was. They paid £30 for the season. But they found out that with a man finding the oil, trimming and cleaning and one thing and another, it couldn't be done under a pound a Lamp. My father put in for the job at £50 a year.

"We had to make a special kind of barrow on pneumatic wheels to take our gear round the town, in order to wash and clean all the glass chimneys and cages on the spot. There were few things like suitable mops ready made in the shops. We slotted sponges into sticks. A dry one was run through first, and then a wet one followed by a polisher to leave the glasses really clean. Then every burner had to be scoured out, the wick trimmed and set at exact level and the cage dusted out. Every lamp was left as bright as a house lamp.

“Starting at 8.30 or 9 a.m., it took two of us until three in the afternoon. That routine was followed for three days of one week, and two days the next, and so on alternately. Then we had to go round at night to light up, and yet again for the third time to put the lamps out. It was almost exactly a four-mile trip round the town each time.

“There was a variation in the lighting and dousing of the lamps, according to the phases of the Moon. No lamps were lit for six nights before the full of the moon, nor for two days after. On other days, times of lighting and dousing varied according to the times of moonrise.

“We used the best White Rose Oil which was fivepence farthing a gallon,. Matches were a penny farthing a dozen boxes - they were re-headed brimstone matches struck on sandpaper or scratched steel.

“Generally, I did the lighting and extinguishing of the lamps. Usually I left the ladder at home and shinned up and down the lampposts as it might be tree-climbing. But this was not possible on wet and windy nights.

“On a very stormy night, we might be called out several times on receiving complaints that lamps were blown out. The lamp at Berry House in Chapel Lane corner was the worst offender. The cross draughts there would either blow the lamp out, or, first cause it to smoke, and presently catch fire to the soot so formed. We would have to turn out and have to take the lamp home, thoroughly scour, clean, dry and trim it, and return again to the same spot, mount the lamp and light it.

“Even the right use of matches required study. On bad nights we would carry three boxes of matches. You could not just carry them in a coat pocket, take a box out in the rain, and strike it. We had to dry our fingers continually, and draw out one match at a time with the utmost care.

“At one time, I tried to surmount this difficulty by constructing a home made lighter using petrol. The lighter worked perfectly well. Unfortunately, flame rises upwards and it was impossible to point it down on the trimmed wick. Turning the wick up to catch the flame was out of the question. as when the wick was trimmed during the day it had to be set to exactly the right permanent level at which it would give a satisfactory flame after warming up. So, back to matches again.

“For dousing the lamps at night we could not just turn the wick down to blow it out, and trust to luck for turning it up to exactly the right level again. So we made a gadget like a tin trumpet, as the lamps had centre draught, all that was needed was to point the trumpet to the base of the lamp, and puff. If you miss-timed the puff, you might cause the flame to rise and smoke the chimney, which in turn added another cleaning job to your round.

“In the larger houses before 1914 there may have been as many as twenty Standard, Table, Swinging, Wall-Bracket, and hand lamps. All these had to be cleaned, brass-work polished, wicks trimmed, reservoirs filled, chimneys washed with chimney brush in soapy water, every morning for two-thirds of the year, as an odd chore at the beginning of the household day.”

“Into the Twentieth Century: a Chronicle of the Village of Over 1900-1950” compiled by John Symonds is available from Ann Shepperson, 148 Boxworth End, Swavesey – 01954 230313 -for £10 plus postage. Supplies are very limited, so be quick to phone for a copy.

Memories 24th September 2003, by Mike Petty

When I was a lad I biked off with my mum and nan to the orchards just along the road. There I built castles with the wooden fruit boxes whilst they picked the apples and plums until it was time for dockey. But other generations of children worked, not played. [SCAN OF BOY – NOT ME – PICKING FRUIT, SCAN OF FRUIT PICKERS WITH BASKETS]

Laurie Arnold, born 1925, recalled: “I started work in the orchards as soon as I could walk. The younger children would pick the bottom branches, my mother and father would do the ladder work. The baskets would have a hook attached that you’d hook on to the branch”. The “Holly Leaves” magazine in for 1900 featured a youngster in the harvest field with the caption: “The small girl, surely no more than five, knows how to prepare a long band to tie up the loose wheat into sheaves. No doubt some children were forced to work, but the majority were only too anxious to help – and when all are working any task becomes more fun than play”. [SCAN OF ANOTHER HOLLY LEAVES PICTURE, INCLUDE CAPTION]

It was not fun but a necessity to feed the family, as a Government inquiry into the child labour gang system in 1862 found. An unsigned letter from a working man in Coates explained: “There is about 200 children of both sexes and all ages goes in the gangs to work from 6 years up to about 14 or 16 years. The youngest gets about 5d per day and the oldest about 7d ... where there is large families these poor children is often the only part of the family that gets work; their poor earnings is all there is for to live on; indeed half the work is done by the children in these fens and those that sees them go in a morning think they are like so many slaves and the drivers is not much better”

Even when education became compulsory school harvest holidays were there so youngsters could help on the land. In 1952 Cambridgeshire Conservative and Horticultural Society asked the County Council whether arrangements could be made for schoolchildren to assist in the potato harvest. There was a shortage of labour and food was more essential than education in the case of boys between 14 and 15. The previous year they’d been allowed a week’s holiday, but a fortnight would be better. The County MP said: “I don’t think it does any harm to children that they should lend a hand in gathering the potato or any other harvest. A very great deal of good is done by allowing children, under the proper circumstances, to deal with things like that”. They’d like to see the summer holidays staggered with three weeks at potato lifting time and three weeks at harvest time. Similar alterations in the long school holidays are again in contemplation but for other reasons.

Today times have changed & few people bike out to work in the fields; instead white vans transport gangs to harvest the crops. Now giant factories on wheels crawl across the fields and provide seats for those who pack the lettuces that will appear on supermarket shelves. [SCAN OF CELERY PICKING AT PRICKWILLOW 1974, LETTUCE PACKING ON MACHINE 1991]

But however mechanised agriculture becomes it still needs labour and is hard physical work that few local people are prepared to undertake. The answer is to import workers from outside the area. In September 1953 the News reported an appeal for people to accommodate foreigners: “Sir – for six years German students have been visiting Britain to help with the harvest. One who stayed near Cambridge wrote: ‘This week in an English family is what I value most of all ... and the friendly reception I got’. Next week about 800 students from universities all over Germany will be coming to help farmers harvest potato and sugar beet crops. If you can help offer hospitality please contact the German Student Harvest Scheme”.

In 1968 a holiday camp at Friday Bridge near Wisbech was offering board and lodging for just £6 a week – even less for women. They would supply packed lunches, sheets, blankets and pillows, but guests had to bring their own wellington boots and thick gloves, if they came during June or July. They expected between 400 and 500 visitors during the peak harvest season who would recover their costs by piece-work in the fields, picking strawberries, gooseberries or raspberries and later plums, apples, beans and potatoes. [SCAN OF FRIDAY BRIDGE AGRICULTURAL HOLIDAY CAMP 1950S SCAN OF GOOSEBERRY PICKING NEAR WISBECH 1940S]]

It was part an agricultural revolution that had started in Victorian times when farmers had had laid down hundreds of acres of raspberries, strawberries & currants. At the peak season there was far more work than local pickers could handle - 30 to 50 tons of fruit a day employing up to 1,300 people. The answer was to import them, many from the East End of London.

By 1925 it was usual for men, women and children of all ages to come for a month at a time. They lived in ‘bunks’ - a name which covered various types of accommodation such as tin huts, old stables or converted railway carriages. But unlike at Friday Bridge in 1968 where discotheques and television, billiards and table tennis were the norm, in the 1920s there were no such distractions. It was not the farmer’s duty to provide amusements for his workers and the only entertainment was in public houses. Mothers brought their children but there was nobody to look after them in the fields, and the working conditions produced a host of minor ailments such a sceptic finger - to leave it untended would be dangerous, to go to Wisbech to the doctor would mean a day off work.

A remedy for these problems came from an unexpected source – Cambridge University. The Cambridge Fruiting Campaign was launched around 1910 to supply the recreational, canteen, medical treatment and day nursery needed. Out came undergraduates and academics - Dr Swainson from Sidney Sussex college to organise the canteen and play the organ, T.C.C.M. Moor of Trinity to give medical aid and lantern lectures whilst G.H. Hewitt from Fitzwilliam Hall would give recitations and J.W.Fisher from Trinity would teach boxing. Nor was it just the physical needs of the labourers that concerned them for the students took the opportunity to preach the gospel to the poor Londoners who they believed had been neglected by the churches in their industrial homes.

Today many of those working in the fields to harvest the crops come not from East London but from Eastern Europe, their working and living conditions have been highlighted by the recent Government report. Perhaps there is scope once more for Cambridge University undergraduates to join them, though given the hardships experienced by modern students it may be as fellow-workers rather than missionaries!

In one of those amazing co-incidences two letters arrived in my tray at the News on the same day. One was from Diane Oswald of 22a Mantell Street, Seatoun, Wellington, New Zealand. She is trying to contact any members of her grandfather’s family, Arthur Charles Wedd who went to Melbourne, Australia on the steamship Lusitania in 1878. His parents were Joseph and Jane Wedd, born in Duxford in the 1830s. It is not a common surname, but the second letter was from another Wedd.

Dennis Wedd from Stapleford remembers the AA Box at Trumpington that I featured in Memories on 27th August. He writes: "I lived with my parents and sister just over the railway bridge which can be seen in the distance. I walked this way from 1927 with my friends on our way to Trumpington Village School. In those days there was so little traffic, we often whipped a top on the road, a thing almost impossible today. The AA box which stood at the junction of Shelford and Hauxton Road, on the point of a triangular island was moved to the back of the island when the roadway was realigned just before the war. Eventually it was moved again to its present site at the side of Hauxton Road. Mr Pipe and Mr Murray with others regularly manned the box, we would stop and chat with them as we passed. The photograph was taken one Wednesday as the van, that can be seen laden with pots and pans was a regular visitor, and was called the Wednesday Man for obvious reasons. I think it was owned by Brown's Petroleum who had a depot in the York Street - Catharine Street area." [SCAN OF AA BOX, TRUMPINGTON 1920S]

Some time ago I featured Andrew Brett's appeal for information on the history of Mitcham's shop on the corner of Chesterton Road and then, in one of those marvellous co-incidences, I met the last of the Mitcham family who came to a presentation about my 'Vanishing Cambridgeshire' book. Now Andrew has got her writing down her memories and is seeking other people who remember the shop as staff or customers. If you have any memories you would like to share as a staff member or customer please contact him on 01223 293713 or e-mail: mitchams.corner@talk21.com - Andrew would be very pleased to hear from you.

Memories 1st October 2003 by Mike Petty

Proposals to convert the Malting House in Barton Road into student accommodation have raised the profile of one of the more interesting houses in this area of Cambridge. It stands on one of the busiest corners yet overlooks a typical rural scene – a backwater of the Cam bordered by a meadow where cattle graze.

In October 1961 Gillian Maltby was given an opportunity to visit the building and described her impressions in the CDN;

It was originally a malthouse, the malting itself being reached by a half-landing between the ground and first floors. It was converted for habitation in 1902 when the Corporation demolished the front of the house to widen the road, the bricks for the new façade came from other old houses being taken down at that time. Two of the three outhouses were taken down but the family wanted the remaining one converted into a room and, despite the architect's protest that it was impossible, this is what they did. The ground floor rooms were flagged with stones and once used as storage space, because its proximity to the river meant that floods were frequent.

In 1912 what remained of the original 'malting' was converted by the removal of part of the upper floor into a small hall with two galleries. A stage was added and in this room countless musical evenings had been held since the early part of the century; here Albert Schweitzer gave a lecture on Bach and since 1955 it had provided a base for rehearsals by the Schools Holiday Orchestra.

The 30 foot long lounge had a large bay window overlooking the river and in other rooms the malthouse beams were exposed, whilst the rooms on the second floor were equally attractive. In 1961 the house, which had formerly formed one domicile, now housed six domestic units.

The thick walls helped make the house cool on hot days, whilst a large gas heater ensured it was warm in winter.

But one aspect of the house's history was overlooked: for here for a few years was held one of Cambridge's experimental schools, the Malting House School

Various readers have come forward with information on the AA patrol man pictured on the corner of Shelford Road, Trumpington.

Judy Whybrow e-mails to say that Frank was her godfather, Mr Frank Pipe, a great character well known through his job and dearly loved by his family. He died at the age of 96 just a few days ago, the notice of his death appearing in the same issue of the News as my Memories article. Enid Newell from Trumpington tells me her husband Stanley remembered when Frank rode an ordinary pedal cycle on his AA round. Living in Pampisford he would cycle to Sawston, and on to Trumpington where he would stand outside the AA box and salute members as they passed. He would then cycle on to Royston before heading back via Trumpington to his home. Stanley made him a fitting for his cycle to take his speedometer and clock and also used to do repairs for him. By co-incidence it is just 50 years today that the News reported a new look for the Automobile Association patrolman. They had fitted a new shield to their motor cycles to help protect them from the winter rain and coal. A plastic apron completed the outfit; hanging from the shield it prevented the wind finding its way around the rider's body and legs. [SCAN OF NEWS ARTICLE FROM 1ST OCT 1953]

Such patrolmen might be able to respond to a query raised by Patrick Mills of Cambridge. In a recent 'Looking Back' article I featured an extract from the News' motoring correspondent back in 1953 in which he reviewed the new Standard Eight:

After a road test by courtesy of Messrs King and Harper I was able to form definite ideas about the new Standard Eight. It has been built at a price of £481 to compete with the Austin A30, Morris Minor and Ford Anglia and has been stripped of every luxury and driver's pet toy. On the standard model there are no wheel discs, the minimum of chrome plating, only one windscreen wiper and no door pockets. Optional extras are air conditioning, radio, oil bath air cleaner and roof rack. Acceleration to 50 mph takes 25 seconds and top speed is 62 mph. It corners well and the brakes are good; I pulled up from a steady 35 mph in only a foot or so more than 30 feet. Petrol consumption is about 45 mpg for the normal touring owner.

It was the bit about air conditioning that caught Frank's eye. He writes: "I believe that genuine air conditioning has only been available in the most expensive British cars for about 25 years and in the cheaper models for perhaps 10. Is it possible that 'air conditioning' in 1953 meant there were vents in the dashboard and perhaps a heater". Did you have one, or have you a picture of this particular model?

Yvonne Hull from Willingham had her memory jogged by a picture of cottages opposite Over church (Memories September 17th). Her parents lived in one of the cottages all their married life, all Yvonne's family were born there, including her eldest son in 1940. Yet more memories of the village are recorded by Eileen Webster and Jean Nelson in the latest volume of their chronicle of the Bicheno family, relating the experiences of numerous members of the clan. One of the most remarkable was the Rev James Bicheno, 1752-1831 who attended services at the dissenting congregation at Stone Yard in Cambridge – now St Andrew's Street Baptist Chapel - and was one of 16 people baptised at Whittlesford mill in 1769. But next year he was banished from church membership, probably for an involvement with a young woman, and went to London to seek his fortune. But he was persuaded instead to see a new life in a new world and boarded a boat for Virginia, North America. On arrival he was sold as a slave but, being an educated man, became tutor to the children of the family. It was two years before he managed to make contact with his family back in Over and the Rev Robert Robinson and members of the Baptist congregation sent money to buy his freedom and repatriation. Even when safely back in Britain his involvement with the sea was not over and a few years later he was shipwrecked on rock off the Isle of Wight. "Bicheno: a family from Over" is available from Eileen Webster, 1 Longstanton Road, Over CB4 5PP for £17.50, including postage.

However a headstone to William Norman, his wife and son in the dissenter's cemetery just down the road at Cottenham marks a much more serious incident. Now Francis Garrett has unearthed a letter dated 28th November 1859 which tells the tale. "No doubt you remember Ann Norman of the Red Lion and her husband going to Australia. Her husband was drowned there, and she was coming home with her two children in the ship called the Royal Charter, which was bound for Liverpool when she was wrecked on the Irish coast with 500 passengers on board, and only 30 yards from shore, but only a few escaped a watery grave. Amongst the lost we are sorry to say is Mrs Norman and her two children, but her body has been found and her brother John is gone after it. Therefore many of the people in Cottenham are enveloped in mourning."

It was a very sombre parish indeed, as the letter continues: "Mortality is very high in Cottenham, people are dying on every hand. Amongst them are London Watts and Francis Watts, and Mrs Luke Pratt and old Mrs Thomas Pratt, and Joseph Carrier jr. and William Hard Graves and old Mrs Pringle and Charles Fromant and John Pearson the crier died in his chair this afternoon, and many more, but these have died very lately, some of these have died of fever, for it is very bad in Cottenham."

One person who is investigating such inscriptions is Ann Rees from Histon Road, Cambridge who has been researching the story of the Histon Road cemetery. She has plodded through the registers at the County Record Office but is particularly seeking a picture of the cemetery chapel that used to stand there but seems to have disappeared without a photograph. If you can help please contact her on Cambridge 361259

The start of a new Academic term at Cambridge University sees the annual arrival of hundreds of new undergraduates, men and women, each excited at the prospect of their great adventure into University education. The streets have been choked with vehicles deliver their bags and baggage, and although this year additional restrictions have added to the problems, this is nothing new as the News reported in October 1953:

Along Sidney Street a young man in a yellow polo-neck sweater trundles a handcart bearing a tin trunk, two leather bags, a violin case, a worn armchair, and a gaily-painted bird-cage. His un-oiled hair slips sideways towards his ears as he pauses at the junction of St John's Street to allow a busload of office workers to hurry by. Gently rumbling towards Magdalene and the furnished rooms of Chesterton Road comes, by courtesy of British Railways, a mechanical horse towing twenty-two identical cabin trunks. From somewhere in Lensfield Road a research student has procured a pony and cart which heads towards Trumpington Road, the pony contemplating, like Aristotle, his place in society, the student reminding himself to find out what is on in the cinemas. [SCAN OF CARTOON SKETCH OF UNDERGRAD 1957]

But what should the undergraduate have packed to wear in this most fashion-conscious of ages? Again they can turn to the News – this time of October 1928:

The advent of the Michaelmas Term finds hundreds of “Freshers” faced with the problem of choosing a suitable wardrobe for University life. Grey flannel “bags” have come to be universally associated with the ‘Varsity man and he would be well advised to include two or three pairs in his outfit. Plus-fours however are nowadays almost as popular as the ‘bags’ for, besides being extremely comfortable to wear, they are particularly adapted to an undergraduate’s activities. It is advisable to choose a really good tweed mixture of a fairly bright pattern, at the same time avoiding anything too conspicuous or “loud”. The success of a plus-four suit depends on the skill of the cutter and for this reason it is just as well to have plus-fours made at one of the excellent Cambridge tailors who know exactly the requirements of their customers.

Lounge suits to wear on more formal occasions, such as calling on tutors, dining in hall, or attending chapel, should also be included in a Fresher’s outfit, and here the pattern and style much be left to the discretion of the individual. But the first-year man would do well to remember that outward appearances count for a great deal, and he should avoid creating a hostile impression by appearing in any extravagant fashion. A dinner-jacket suit is sufficient for practically all occasions during term time for which the undergraduate may have to wear evening dress. “Tails” are rarely seen at Cambridge except at the end of the summer term or May Week.

Hats, like overcoats, are not worn by undergraduates to any great extent during term, but caps and soft felt hats may be worn without fear of unfavourable comment. One could just conjecture the fate of any rash soul who appeared in the streets wearing a “bowler”. Top hats are worn by dons and college porters

The long woollen scarves, so much worn by undergraduates are very useful for keeping out the cold & one or two sweaters are essential to the undergraduate who contemplates taking any form of athletic exercise. These are usually trimmed with school or college colours. But overcoats are not popular, except for travelling purposes or when watching some sporting event.

For this reason the necessity for adequate underclothing cannot be over-emphasised, and those public school boys who have been foolish enough to take to silken fripperies will be wise to exchange them for the woollen underwear which gives an even warmth throughout the rigours of a winter. [SCAN OF UNDERGRADUATES COLLECTING ON RAG DAY 1928].

And what of the life to which the undergraduate can aspire?

In 1969 Miss Louisa Hall recalled undergraduate life 60 years earlier at number 20 Trinity Street where her father had converted two houses into one boarding establishment.

“Nine sets of rooms were provided for nine Trinity undergraduates. Each suite consisted of a sitting room and a bedroom, and each was accorded full service. Nine laden coal scuttles were hauled up to nine rooms each day. Nine baths were run each morning and nine gentlemen were called at predetermined times. Nine suits of clothes, carefully cleaned & pressed the day before were placed at the ready, anything other than suits was seldom worn. Sometimes when hunting was the chosen activity of the day, hunting pinks and boots boned to a gleam were put out in the morning.

“Nine fires would be lit & nine breakfasts served in each man’s own room. A typical breakfast menu would include fish, fruit or a popular mixed grill featuring devilled kidneys. In the kitchen a large wickerwork basket housed each man’s silver cutlery and a large wardrobe contained individual sets of linen brought up from home at the beginning of term while the large cellar contained nine racks for each mans stock of wine or the occasional maturing pheasant.

“Lunch was often served in house but cooked in the college kitchen. An enormous menu was available for undergraduates to choose from. There were no portions, if a man wanted chicken he got the whole chicken and it was his to do with as he wished. If he wanted to eat the entire thing hot he could, but if he wanted to sample it and then keep the remainder cold he could do so. Turtle soup, fish, snipe or saddle of lamb would involve the porters in separate journeys and an average of 18 to 20 such meals left the college kitchens each day. Later tea was served just after four o’clock and crumpets and muffins, still hot from Matthews bakery were consumed in front of blazing fire”. [SCAN OF STUDENTS DINING 1900, SCAN OF STUDENTS DINING IN CHURCHILL COLLEGE 1964]

Perhaps – just perhaps - the new generation of undergraduates may find things have changed somewhat! But do you have memories of your first days at Cambridge – be it at the University of the West Road – Cambridge, or the University of the East Road – Anglia

Readers write:

Val Fishpool e-mails from Shepreth: “In Memories on 1st October you featured a picture of a horse-drawn wagon taking Victoria Plums to Chivers factory in 1948. The driver was my uncle, Gordon (John) Boughen. He and his father, William (Bill) worked for Chivers as horse keepers, working daily with the percherons, also preparing them for agricultural shows during the summer, where Chivers won many prizes. During the cooler months, William walked round the Fens with the stallion to visit the mares but Uncle John was better equipped with a Landrover and small horsebox, my Grandmother thought the stallion would kick the back out, he knew where he was going! Gordon's wife, Ada looked after the poultry, then worked in the Factory (as did most of my family). On Sundays when I went for tea with them, I would first go and feed the chickens, then watch while the horses and foals were fed. Gordon and Ada lived in a tied house until they both retired, Gordon then being very successful with exhibiting Chrysanthemums. Sadly they are no longer with us.” [SCAN OF THE PICTURE FROM LAST WEEK]

Other readers have recalled a man intimately connected with the Malting House at Newnham. Ludovic Stewart, long-time county music adviser, was born in the house to an academic family. His father Hugh Fraser Stewart was Dean of Trinity College and President of the Cambridge University Musical Society, his mother Jessie, who had taken a first-class degree at Newnham College in 1901, was active in the English Folk Dancing Society. Ludovic attended Eton and taught at Harrow before returning to Cambridge in 1946 to take up the music adviser’s post. He was responsible for the development of the Schools Holiday Orchestra, open to everybody who liked to make music, which by 1973 was attracting 400 kids. But the home was open to more than children and provided hospitality to many distinguished composers as well as forming a meeting place for Quakers on Sunday and a kindergarten during the week. Ludovic Stewart, who died in February 1999, seems to have inspired all that met him, be they child or teacher and more memories of him and his musical legacy would be welcome. Memories 15th October 2003, by Mike Petty

What can be more typically English than the quaint thatched cottages that stare at us from countless books and old postcards. But what were they like to live in?

In the Dry Drayton Millennium History “Gallows Piece to Bee Garden”, John Hacker and Sid Martin recalled: Old thatched cottages were small, damp cold and dark. Many large families had only one room upstairs and one room downstairs. Two bedrooms were a luxury and should there be two ground floor rooms, the chances were that one of them would be the best or front room, containing a few precious and treasured pieces of furniture. It was out of bounds for the family except for weddings, funerals and christenings, all of which happened much more frequently than they do today. One often had to step down into the kitchen-living room, but even then the low beams were a hazard. In the poorest homes the ceilings were frequently only the undersides of the floor beams above, and I remember some with sacking nailed to the joists to check the dust from filtering through from the room above. The rooms were usually dark with only one poky little window hidden behind curtains so that the family lived in semi-darkness. Doors and windows did not always fit; draughts were accepted as a part of life, but the worst cracks were stuffed with paper or rag. Brick and tile floors were uneven and worn, stairs were not a routine fitment; sometimes there was simply a ladder up the hatch and even this might be external.

A Cambridgeshire Regional Planning Report produced in 1934 stressed that people needed decent homes where water ran from a tap, and not down the wall. But it also emphasised the importance of preserving old cottages: “It is of great consequence to the future that the old cottages and farm buildings still surviving should be protected and maintained. In many villages the decay of the old cottages is noticeable and many are far gone in a state of disrepair, but demolition should not be considered until the possibilities of restoration and adaptation have been explored”

One organisation that took up the challenge was the Cambridge Preservation Society who in 1938 started work on a line of cottages, Sheepshead Row which dominate the approach to Melbourn from the north. The old properties were fully reconditioned and brought up to a reasonable standard of comfort and convenience. The interiors were put in first class order and redecorated throughout; several staircases were replaced. Each was supplied with a ventilated foodstore and new cooking range where necessary. Outside wash-houses were rebuilt and the coppers put into working order. Then the whole row was thatched.

The Preservationists analysed the building: the centre section appeared to have been an old farmhouse of perhaps the sixteenth century, built round a great central chimney. It had for many years been divided into two cottages, but was now been restored as one dwelling. It is probable that the rest of the cottages were originally constructed out of the old barns and out-buildings.

“There can be no doubt that such schemes of reconditioning are a great help towards the solution of the housing problems in villages. With the sympathetic aid of the Rural District Council cottages can be reconditioned and let at rents within the means not only of the agricultural labourer in work, but of widows & old-age pensioners” the Cambridge Preservation Society claimed in their Annual Report for 1939.

But it did not quite work out as hoped; financial problems during the run-up to the Second World War meant that not all the cottages could be brought up to the sanitary conditions of the day. By 1953 when the cottages won first prize in the village's Coronation decorated houses competition, they were home to several families. Ruby and Percy Harrup lived in the first, at 27 High Street; then came Audrey and Walter Gouldthorp, Mr Jacklin and family at 23, with Miss Florence Woodcock at 19, Lilian and Ronald Smith with their daughters at 15 and Daisy and Alfred Negus at the end. Quite who was at number 21 is uncertain and 17 may have been empty. Some people had lived there continually for many years, others were newer tenants soon to move on as bigger and better council housing became available. By 1963 many of the cottages were considered not suitable for habitation and as families moved out they were left empty.

The Cambridge Preservation Society could no longer afford the required renovation costs and Peter King of Bourn Hall took on responsibility for their upkeep and preservation. But the sums did not add up – it would cost far more to upgrade the property than any rent would bring in. He maintained the essential structure and fought to prevent their demolition and replacement by a modern housing development.

Now once more the builders have moved into Sheepshead Row, thatchers have been at work ensuring the roof is sound, old timbers have been treated, walls replastered and, almost unnoticed, central heating, showers, baths and all the accoutrements of 21st century life have been incorporated. There's even a bike shed & a state-of-the-art washing line area so that the communal landscaped lawns at the back can be enjoyed without having to duck under dirty socks.

Such renovation is not unusual, many villages have large thatched properties, once home to a number of families and their children, which are now providing a spacious lifestyle for one or two people. But this is not what architect has done here. You still squeeze up narrow staircases, ducking under the sloping ceilings as people have done for generations. And although some of the six homes that now share the one long thatched roof are spacious, others provide almost the one-up – one-down layout that John Hacker and Sid Martin recall, though without the draughts or sacking.

Work continues on the conversion but already the homes are being marketed. Before they fill with a new generation of cottagers Liz Kendrick would like to hear from previous residents of the Sheepshead Row so that she can piece more of its story together to add to the impressive record she has already built. Write to her c/o Tyrell's Hall, Fowlmere Road, Shepreth, SG8 6QS or e-mail d.kendrick@btconnect.com.

And if you have your memories of country-cottage life, then write to me, too.

Readers write: Ted Tyndall from Somersham responds to my mention of a road test of the Standard Eight car in 1953.

“I can speak from personal experience here. As a youngster, my dad's friend had one of these cars bought new just after the 1953 Motor Show. Even then, it seemed a poor thing, with no interior door trim, hubcaps, or even worse, no opening boot lid. It was not quiet either, like travelling in a tin can, the doors shut with a "clang". Later, way back in the summer of 1969 when my wife and I moved to Huntingdonshire, I owned a Standard "Eight" and my wife had the very similar, but larger engined "Ten". Travelling back down the A10 at weekends to visit our parents, the "Eight" was certainly "flat out" at about 58 to 60 mph. It was reliable though, and pleasant to drive apart from the long whippy gearshift lever. Our cars were some of the last of these models produced, built 1957 and 1959 and by that time were quite "de-luxe" compared to the original cars, having gained an opening boot lid, full interior trim and even a heater. Several of these cars still exist locally, our "Ten", 199 PNO was sold in about 1979 to a garage at Ramsey Forty Foot. It may still exist, as even at that time they were becoming collectable. He has included an advertisement from 1953 that may jog further memories [SCAN]

Another collectable is concerning Barbara Maurice from Sawston who is trying to find a home for an oak child's cot dating back to the 1950s; it seems a shame to dump it, but she's tried car boot sales without finding any takers, perhaps because of the safety aspect. The cot and horsehair mattress is in very good condition and deserves to be appreciated or displayed somewhere. Phone her on 01223 834822 if you have a use for it.

The Rev. A. By contrast Don Mann of Barrington has send me a picture that may jog the memories of older readers. It shows the 12th Cambridge cub pack about 80 years ago and was taken outside the pack meeting room by the river near the foot of what is now the Fort St George footbridge. The houses in the back are at the top of Aylstone Road. Don recalls the building as being very decrepit and made entirely of wood; it spanned a dock for small boats which could be seen through cracks in the floor of the room where they held their meetings. Most of the boys were at Milton Road School at the time but now Don can only remember a few names. They include from the back Tony Sanderson, whose father was a waterman and patrolled the river in a small motor boat; in the middle are Denis Heath whose father was manager of Eaden Lilley's household goods department & Mr Swallow the cub master, centre. Don is in the front line along with Percy Maltby and his twin brother Fred, Sidney 'Snick' Elsdon who distinguished himself with a professorship at Oxford, Charlie Toates, Arthur Pedley and a lad named Porter [SCAN OF GROUP]

Memories 22nd October 2003, by Mike Petty

Last Thursday's front page of the News broke the story of a proposed massive new township that planning experts say could be needed in the area around Sawston within the next 30 years.

No precise location has been pinpointed, but already people are expressing their concern about the impact of some 6,000 new houses and the loss of cherished landscapes. An adviser for the Council for the Protection of Rural England warns: "It may seem light years away, but the danger is that once an area has been identified for growth, an increase in job predictions can bring these developments forward. If these villages are to be saved we need to take action now."

Future issues of the News will doubtless chart the progress of these plans, just as they have done in the past.

For if you turn up the files of the News for 23rd October 1953 – just 50 years ago - you will find a very similar story. Sawston Parish Councillors had been told of the problems of house shortages in the capital. All London housing land would be used up within four years and they needed to disperse 311,000 people. There were already overspill houses being built at Huntingdon, St Neots and Haverhill and what was needed now was at least one additional new town together with a substantial increase of a number of villages that, like Sawston, already had a nucleus of industries.

The people to be settled on them would be a cross-section of the community and their employment would be arranged in various light industries that would be established. There was certain to be further industrial development in Sawston anyway over the next 20 years and it would be better if the development could be orderly.

Councillors were sceptical: Why pick on Sawston? The London County Council had a housing problem but so had Cambridgeshire.

But this, they were told, was a national problem; no part of England could withdraw from the task of arresting the growth of Greater London and helping to house its excess population. The proposals would be bound to cause some dislocation in village life but if the national interest demanded the growth of Sawston it was the duty of the Parish Council to press for the development of amenities

A week or so later more details emerged – the possibility of a "Morris Oxford Factory" at Sawston as part of the industrial developments that would accompany the expansion of the village from 2,000 people up to a town of 7,500.

But when the matter came before South Cambridgeshire Rural District Council in mid November 1953 planners were back-peddalling: "Too many people were getting too excited over Sawston", the Chairman claimed. There were no plans to turn the village into an overspill town, the London County Council had not even decided they wanted to go there and the whole matter had been greatly confused by a speech by London's Lord Mayor.

Of course Sawston would expand – the Rural District Council had already built over 200 council houses since the war and others were in course of construction. That was probably a record and would provide homes for more local people. But as for coping with London's needs – that was something for the future to decide the planners agree, 50 years ago.

Another area that has seen expansion within the last 50 years has been the Abbey and East Barnwell district of Cambridge, an area scarcely glimpsed by visitors, or indeed many other residents. It is no area of great architectural beauty, but provides services, employment and homes to people proud of their community.

Now both old and new, young and old residents have contributed to a new booklet "Memories of Abbey and East Barnwell". In it Mrs J. Adams remembers back 50 years: "When I was married and lived in Ditton Walk we would collect wild flowers, cornflowers, dog daisies, buttercups, daisies and little yellow flowers we called 'Tom Thumb'. Sometimes there were bee-orchids, petty grasses, feathers, stones and leaves, in fact we would have a box-full in the pram when we came back. There were also many skylarks, which sadly seem to have disappeared now. It was quiet, no traffic; we hated it when all the houses and shops were built. I can remember walking from my mother's house to the Church, and it was just fields, the railway line, cows and horses. Next to Proctors was a farm; now it's the Nursery School, work units and Wadloes Road with many more houses". [SCAN OF CHILDREN TRAIN SPOTTING AT BARNWELL JUNCTION STATION 1964 – PREFER LIBRARY PIX OF DITTON LANE]

Jean Secker & family recall: "In Ditton Walk-there was Posgate's shop, a butcher, a green grocer and a hairdresser in a hut There was a barber who used to enjoying talking and would often get carried away cutting hair too short as he talked. There was a fish and chip shop in a hut. The Corona factory was a busy factory. They made soft drinks. The bottles had little china tops that you had to push down. It closed about 30 years ago. The library that was in the Air Raid Warden's hut was tiny. It was in Ditton Fields on the green - now the recreation ground. Mrs Lilly Harris started it so that the children had books to read. The library then moved to the Barnwell Road site, where the new shops had recently been opened." [SCAN OF CHILDREN LOOKING IN THE WINDOW OF THE LIBRARY ON BARNWELL ROAD, 1958]

Others recall that: "Barnwell Road was a dead-end, but its line continued into an unkempt wilderness as the 'Ring Road', a track marked by some overgrown kerbstones and piles of builder's materials. It just petered out somewhere beyond Rayson Way, and only a footpath and cycle track connected through to Coldham's Lane". [SCAN OF BARNWELL ROAD PETERING OUT INTO A FOOTPATH]

Children from the new Abbey Meadows Primary School have also contributed their impressions of the area: "I like my road because my Grandma only lives two doors away. There are lots of cats in my area and they make a lot of noise when I am asleep". "Most streets are a bit run down, but mine isn't", "I hate my area because there are some naughty people who do around smashing things. But I also like it because all my friends live just around the corner and I can see them after school"

But life has never been all rosy as the Seckers recall: "The groups of children who visited Coldham's Common were very tribal and territorial. I don't ever recall real trouble between the groups, but you made sure you stuck with your own lot and kept out of the way of some of the other gangs. Kids from the Whitehill estate were different to those from the Peverell Estate – and if you went too far across the common then you needed to be very careful you didn't meet 'than lot from Coldham's Lane or Ross Street' ..."

But on Friday evening from 7.30 to 8.30 pm 'that lot from Coldham's Lane' may be mixing with the residents of Ditton Fields and the Whitehill Estate at the Holy Cross Church on Newmarket Road where the booklet will be launched. If you have memories to share they would be delighted to hear from you – contact Keith Jordan at Abbey Action on Cambridge 517259.

Now the future of the Abbey area is once more in the melting pot, with speculation that Marshall's Airport might be relocated, proving room for more lots homes and more people – as it has already done once before. Young Tom O'Connor has an alternative vision: "It might be different in the future, because it will definitely be different because it will have fewer houses because some will be knocked down because no one will live in them because they are old or ruined. Some people may think that the houses are spooky and haunted. Some houses have holes in the walls and cracks in the ceiling with bad water-pipes”.

But Declan Kenney sees a future he will influence: “I predict there will be more houses in the community because I would like to be an architect when I am older. When I am older I want to design new buildings for people to enjoy and live in plus some new shops. I really want to design play areas for little kids and parks for the adults. I want some nice houses and cottages on parts of land. Well we will see what happens in the future. Goodbye”.

“Memories of Abbey and East Barnwell”, edited by Caroline Biggs has been published by Cambridge City Council at £2.00 & is available at the East Barnwell Community Centre and the community wing of the Abbey Meadows School.

Madge Close from Fen Drayton writes: “It was nice to read of 20 Trinity Street Cambridge. I lived and worked there in the early 1930s, Mr & Mrs Wade had the house at that time. Two Haddenham girls were living there. I was working at Newnham College and knew both well, & their pay was 10s more than I was earning. I applied and had a job there for about four years. Mr P. Seeby from Trumpington remembers the first Standard 8 car when it came out in 1938/9. He had just started work for King and Harpers in their depot in Milton Road, Cambridge, who were agents for this car, one of the first to feature independent suspension on its front wheels. All the mechanics regarded it as superior to its Morris equivalent which was one of the first English-made cars to have its headlights faired into the front wings “Shut up, dad, we’ve heard that tale a hundred times already” is a sentiment that most of us have expressed, at least secretly, at some time or other. But as we get older it can be comforting to retreat into memories of earlier and happier days. Roger Human from Burwell encouraged his dad, Sid, to set down something of his life’s story. And a fascinating record it is.

Sid Human had been born in a two-bedroomed cottage at Isleham on 22nd June 1906. When other lads collected birds eggs, he preferred the bird itself: “One boy would walk along one side of a hedge and beat it while two others, who had a folding net fixed to two poles, walked along the other side. As the birds flew out we caught them in the net and took them home - especially blackbirds - for our mothers would pluck them and make a blackbird pie. I expect in those days some families needed them for extra food when they had a chance”

The adults were more commercial in their approach: “Five or six men in the village made their living by catching song birds. They made their nets and tackle and had two folding nets made with pole frames about 10 feet long by five feet wide swivelled at one side. Two small stakes were laid apart and attached to a long cord well away from the nets. The catcher would sprinkle a lot of seed to attract birds between the nets and when they were busy feeding he would pull the cords and the nets would fold over and trap the birds. He would then go and retrieve them from under the nets and put them in cages. To also attract the birds they had 'decoy' birds on small stakes with string fixed to them so that the men could just make these decoys fly up enough to attract other birds. The catcher would then go home and put each small bird into a cage with a wire front that he had made with light packing case wood purchased from the shop. The birds were taken to Isleham Station for shipment by train to Covent Garden Market at 5 pm. The song birds caught were Linnets, Chaffinches, Bullfinches, Larks and Greenfinches and this business continued until they were stopped by the Government making a law to protect birds.”

All too soon play gave way to work: “I left school at the age of thirteen and a half and started to work with Father in the workshop. We made farm carts including the wheels, bodies, ladders and shafts complete with iron work and painting. We also made coffins which was not too bad but I didn't like taking them to the houses and placing the dead bodies in them. Sometimes we had to make a coffin and fetch the body from Addenbrooke's Hospital in Cambridge and this was practically a whole days work with our pony and cart. In cold weather it was not very pleasant. One particular funeral my father had to deal with was rather embarrassing. He always checked to see that the old gravedigger, Pip Brown, had dug the grave large enough for the coffin to go down. But this time he did not check and, on lowering the coffin it was so tight that it loosened some chalk stones, and the coffin only went part way down the grave and just hung there by the lid. As you might guess my father was so afraid that the screws in the lid would give way and let the coffin drop down without the lid. Fortunately it held until the service was over and after the mourners had gone they had to lift the coffin out and enlarge the grave. This never happened again because the grave was in future always checked before the day.” [SCAN OF FEN FUNERAL]

Sid Human's recollections go on to record his war-time experiences as a part-time fireman: “We were supposed to be on call for local fires and when war broke out we had to form a rota, being on duty every third night. Although we had some dangerous times in the Brigade we also had some amusing ones, especially when on duty at the station. We all had our own single beds and blankets for sleeping. My shift was made up with six members and one, John Gordon, would take out his false teeth and put them in his wellington boots before getting into bed! Herbert Griggs always made the tea before getting into bed and would boil the kettle and warm the pot before making the tea. Joe Housden would always tuck his bed up so tight that we used to say that he needed a shoe horn to slide into bed. Ernie Crack turned up when the pubs closed at 10.30 pm, even though he should have reported for duty at 7.00 pm, and would then sit up talking and cracking jokes until midnight! It did not matter to him as he worked on his own and did not need to get up as early as the rest of us who had to wash, shave and have breakfast before starting work. Sid's memories, produced just for the family, are full of interest and will be handed down for generations as a proud record of one man and his life. If you have similar items I should be pleased to see them

Wilf Free from Cottenham found his memory jogged by a tv programme about a catastrophe at Bethnal Green underground station during the war, when 198 people were crushed in a panic caused by the firing of a rocket salvo, rather than an actual air raid. These were rockets fired from projectors spaced out over about an acre of ground and Wilf remembers that there was one such site in Newmarket Road, Cambridge where Peverel Road now stands. It was manned at night by members of the Home Guard. Wilf was only a youngster and never got to operate the site though he dug quite a few holes for the mounting of the projectors. He can remember the names of three who were based there, all of whom are now dead. There was Mr Leader., a watchmaker from Burleigh Street, Mr Hazel (who had a lovely daughter) and Ray Woodman, a carpenter with a business off East Road. Can you recall others [LIBRARY PIC OF PEVEREL ROAD?]

Dr Colin Forbes has a question that you can perhaps answer from personal experience. He writes: “If you go to the East end of Lower Park Street and start walking along the path with Jesus Ditch on your right, you will see on your left the outlines of two buildings showing brown in the otherwise green grass. These were communal Air Raid Shelters; I remember their demolition - I think it was in the summer of 1948; yet they still show each dry autumn. Were they ever used for real? The nearest bomb would I think have been the one which fell at the junction of Jesus Lane and Sydney Street - scars can still be seen on the stonework of Whewell's Court (Trinity College)". Did you shelter there, if so let me know.

Mr D.J. Evans from Sutton had an interesting discovery in the attic of his home, which was once the police house. He has unearthed a file of Isle of Ely Constabulary Crime Sheets for 1942 that were circulated to each police station. The most common war-time crime involved the theft of bicycles, though the person who left his bike unattended at Ely for just two minutes on the afternoon of 19th December that year had a particularly bad Christmas. The thief left the bike but took a brown paper parcel containing tins of Tom Long and Royal Seal tobacco together with 500 Craven A cigarettes, 200 Senior Service, 400 Park Drive and 10 packets of Rizla blue cigarette papers. Other readers are also seeking to put names to faces; each day Peter Allinson, butler at Clare College, finds himself looking at a framed photograph of Clare college servants who worked in Old Court in 1924. Linda Fixter seeks your help in putting together some memories of Orchard, House on Huntingdon Road, now part of New Hall. She writes:

"My Grandfather Frank Deaney went to work for Horace and Ida Darwin at their home, the Orchard in Huntingdon Road in 1925. He was employed as their Head Gardener. Sir Horace died in 1928 and my Grandfather continued to work for Lady Ida until her death in 1946. They were buried in the old St Giles Cemetery in Huntingdon Road and my Grandfather continued to tend their graves until he became too infirm to do so. He and my Grandmother, who also worked for the family are buried in the same Cemetery"

Linda has a photograph of a staff tea party perhaps to celebrate the Silver Jubilee of George V in 1935. Memories 5th November 2003, by Mike Petty

Last Thursday evening Haddenham Methodist Chapel was packed with people who'd come to remember an event that local historian Lorna Delanoy described as probably the greatest in that village's history.

The lights were dimmed and images were projected of a familiar landscape that was unrecognisable, of waves where there should be fields, of bungalows with their roofs awash. A few in the congregation saw people they had known, members of their family, friends or relations. But for many others it was a new experience and the incredulous look on their faces to see how the work of centuries of drainage could be swept away almost overnight echoed that etched in the faces of the people captured on film back in March 1947.

The story of that black winter was one of long hard frosts and seemingly incessant snow that melted overnight and was washed away in torrential rain. The unstoppable flow of water filled the fenland drains and rivers to the very brim, then came the savagery of a gale that whipped the water into waves and the inevitable collapse of banks deep in the blackness of a fenland night that sent people fleeing from their homes.

It was a national disaster, soldiers were brought in to supplement local labour and prisoners-of-war but more acres of fertile land were to be lost to the flood before sheer manpower & military hardware were finally assisted by nature herself as the tide literally turned and the waters subsided.

It was a struggle reported in the press, broadcast on radio news & pictured on cinema newsreels. Then the journalists went away and the ordinary people were left to rebuild their lives and homes unseen and forgotten, like the flood itself.

But one man, Walter Martin Lane, had made his way to the heart of the action, journeying on army amphibious craft and rowing with farmers returning to the shattered remnants of their houses. His remarkable photographic record was donated to the Cambridgeshire Collection more than 30 years ago and has since been shown almost weekly to audiences throughout the region.

Yet Martin Lane could not get everywhere, while he snapped the scene at Haddenham others were experiencing similar problems at Swavesey; Lane watched part of the battle to hold back the flood at Southery but could not get across to Hockwold or Hilgay. His remarkable record is just part of the story.

Now thanks to the dedication of another fenman much more of that story can be told. For more than a year Tony Buckingham from Littleport has been seeking out people whose experiences have never been recounted, they have opened up their memories & their scrapbooks to him in a series of remarkable interviews that he has captured on video. Tony has also delved deep into film archives to unearth newsreel footage unseen for more than 50 years and tracked down contemporary radio programmes which recounted the personal experiences of people who themselves have now become history.

All this has been combined with modern filming, historical reconstruction and the latest technical wizardry to produce a two-hour video dedicated to the story of the 1947 fen floods.

The expertise of river board engineers is recognised along with the professional skill of the men who drove tugs towing lines of barges and the long cold hours and sheer hard work of the men who patrolled river banks and laboured to prevent yet more breaches and more devastation. But there is also the human story of distress at seeing a lifetime's work washed away and the generosity of the insurance agent who had himself paid the premiums for farmers who thought they had lost everything. Many of those who played their part in those dark days of flood have themselves passed away, including several who Tony managed to interview just in time. His film is a tribute their memory and their courage.

As one man amongst the crowds in the Methodist Chapel remarked, it is a video that should be compulsory viewing for every Environmental Agency manager, planner and everybody who looks at the fenland landscape and sees it as flat, black, fertile and dull.

Lorna Delanoy herself has been active in compiling a third in the series of 'Village Voices' featuring interviews with Haddenham residents between 1975 and 1995. In one of these George Amory recalls his memories of poaching

"There weren't so much shooting of pheasants and woodpigeons, but I'll tell you what used to be a nice bird, a peewit, some people call them lapwings or plovers. I remember a farmer I were working for once, He had taters in a field and some fallow beside it with cows in it. The peewits were making nests there, and he were scuffling them. When they got up, it were like a cloud was getting up, thousands of them. So he went and got his gun, and I carried it down to where he reckoned they were. I give him his gun, he loaded it up and he crept through the wheat, you see, to where he thought they were. When he got through to within about a yard or two, he just put his head out and they went straight for him. He went, 'Bang!' and they got up, like a cloud; 'Bang!' and he cut a tunnel through them, a tunnel. I've never seen a man do that; sixty he picked out in one go! That's as true as I'm here. We had some string and we tied them in bunches, ten in a bunch. He had a bunch in each hand, and he put a bunch on his haywain and gave me two bunches to hang over me shoulder. We picked up sixty, and God knows how many we couldn't find. I've never seen a man shoot so many peewits in me life! He told me to take two, so I went home with twenty birds, and Mother and one or two of the girls were plucking 'em and burning the feathers, then Mother drawed and done 'em, and we had three or four dinners. They were beautiful, yeah, one of the richest birds you can eat. But you can't now; they're on the preserve list. You know, people are still talking about them sixty birds, even people who weren't born then."

Yvonne Hull from Willingham had her memory jogged by a picture of cottages opposite Over church (Memories September 17th). [SCAN OF OVER (NOT HER COTTAGE)] Yet more memories of Over are recorded by Eileen Webster and Jean Nelson in the latest volume of their chronicle of the Bicheno family. One of the most remarkable was the Rev James Bicheno, 1752-1831 who attended services at the dissenting congregation at Stone Yard in Cambridge – now St Andrew's Street Baptist Chapel - and was one of 16 people baptised at Whittlesford mill in 1769. But next year he was banished from church membership, probably for an involvement with a young woman, and went to London to seek his fortune. He was persuaded instead to seek a new life in a new world and boarded a boat for Virginia, North America. On arrival he was sold as a slave but, being an educated man, became tutor to the children of the family. It was two years before he managed to make contact with his family back in Over and the Rev Robert Robinson and members of the Baptist congregation sent money to buy his freedom and repatriation. Even when safely back in Britain his involvement with the sea was not over and a few years later he was shipwrecked on rock off the Isle of Wight. Memories 12th November 2003, by Mike Petty

WE SEEM TO HAVE LOST MY BYE-LINE PHOTO OVER THE LAST FEW WEEKS – IS IT STILL AROUND?

I'LL CALL IN ON TUESDAY MORNING

The progress in the work to place a new cycle and footbridge at Milton has been attracting attention, culminating last weekend with numerous people making the trip to see it slid into position across the A14.

But a similar event attracted even greater crowds in 1930 when it was not a road but a river that was spanned and the bridge was to carry not cycles but trains. The original railway bridge at Chesterton had been a trestle bridge, pictured by John Roget, the son of the compiler of the famous Thesaurus, in the 1850s. This had been replaced by a low girder bridge that in April 1930 was succeeded by a much larger and stronger structure which, like the Milton bridge, was constructed alongside and then slid into position over a weekend. [SCAN OF THE ORIGINAL RAILWAY BRIDGE AND WORK TO REPLACE ITS SUCCESSOR WITH THE PRESENT BRIDGE IN 1930][PERHAPS MODERN PIC OF THE NEW MILTON CYCLE BRIDGE]

The erection of this new railway bridge over the Cam at Chesterton was photographed by Ted Mott and is included on a new CD-Rom issued by Hugo Brown in association with the Cambridgeshire Collection. Called "Interactive Cambridge" it includes five tours, featuring new and old photographs of the city centre, colleges, churches and pubs together with three maps & over a thousand photographs, old and new. It offers tourists a unique guide and residents a fascinating glimpse of their city.

However Cambridge researchers have other such places where they can locate pictures of Cambridge. The indexes to the Cambridgeshire Collection record over 400,000 such images, then there are numerous books of old photographs and of course the News' own files hold many thousand pictures of the last 50 years or so.

But where does one go for similar pictures of 'the other place', Oxford? For historians anxious to compare and contrast college buildings, streets or indeed railway stations there has been little option but a journey across to the Midlands.

Now Hugo has extended the techniques pioneered in Cambridge with a new CD-Rom exploring Oxford. Once more he has located and scanned over 1,000 photographs but this time of High Street rather than Kings Parade, Magdalen Bridge rather than Magdalene, All Saints church Turl Street rather than Jesus Lane, the University Arms pub rather than Hotel. He has also included an interactive tour, just as with Cambridge you can click on a map to find your way round with pictures depicting what you are seeing and what it looked like in the past.

Nor has he stopped there for there are pictures of 34 Oxfordshire villages with exotic names like Duns Tew, Kingston Bagpuize and Woodstock. If you wish to discover something of their history then this is supplied in pages of the 1895 Kelly's Directory of Oxfordshire, together with indexed lists of surnames & tradespeople.

By combining the Oxford Explorer and Interactive Cambridge one can compare and contrast some of the sights of the two University cities without leaving your computer.

The Oxford Explorer costs £20, the Cambridge Interactive guide £10; Both CD-Roms are published in Queen Adelaide, near Ely, by 'The Cambridge Explorer'; for copies or a list of stockists contact Hugo Brown at www.cambridge-explorer.org.uk or phone 01353 665493

Fred Nunn from south Arbury writes to say that like Wilf Free (Memories 29th October) he too was at the Ack Ack site on Newmarket Road during the war; "I joined the Home Guard when I was 16 years old, with my friend Roy Cox. We started on the 'twins' as they were called and later the big boys arrived, they fired nine rockets at a time. We enjoyed our trip to Heacham training range on some Sundays and got three shillings expenses". I'm told there was another such site near Cherry Hinton – can anybody else remember it or add further details?

Ann Barton from Cambridge spotted he uncle, Phil Smith on the picture of Clare College servants (Memories 29th October). He is on the back row, third from the right; Phil started at college working on D Staircase in 1924, and so would have been a new boy when the picture was taken. He continued working there until 1962 and died five years later.

Cambridge historian & street-sweeper Alan Brigham has sent this tribute to a real old Cambridge man: "I've just been to the funeral of Gerald Littlechild (1912-2003). It was a lovely day, and a lovely funeral at Barton Church followed by a woodland burial. I used to sweep in front of his Health Food Shop in Rose Crescent. He refused to retire until he was well into his 70s, when it became probably the first Cambridge Take-Away Sandwich Shop, Peppercorns. After that every retail unit that became vacant became a food or drink outlet, cinemas included. Gerald was born in Cambridge & died in Cambridge hoeing his garden, alert until the end. He loved the city, took great pride in living here, knew an awful about it and was stopping me in the street until the end to tell me something he thought might interest me. He'd just rung me up the week before he died to tell me something about Hobson's Conduit! I always meant to tape him, but never got around to it because it felt like he would always be around. He left school at 14 to do a proper grocer's apprenticeship at the old International Stores. I never found out what took him into Health Foods, but that must have been quite a brave and novel venture in the 1930s. Another part of Cambridge passes away. And I start to feel old!" Memories 19th November 2003, by Mike Petty

Cyclists and bridges have been in the news again last week, with the closure of the footbridge over the Cam at Cutter Ferry Path, alongside Elizabeth Bridge, after an inspection revealed it to be structurally unsafe. [CUTTING OR MODERN PIC]

The bridge was one of two built just over 75 years ago replacing ferries that had plied across the river, the ferrymen making a useful living from the tolls they charged and the residents not being too inconvenienced by the delay in crossing. Sometimes when the ferryman had finished for the night people took themselves across, turning the handle that engaged the chain that ran across the bed of the river. Although when the ferry was on the other side of the river – as it always seemed to be - it had to be pulled over by tugging on the chain itself, slimy - and worse - from the depths of the river.

Whilst the old residents of Chesterton were content to cross the river in the traditional way occupants of new houses on the De Freville Estate were soon campaigning for something better - a footbridge. In 1913 the Borough council decided that a bridge was necessary at Ferry Path [NOT CUTTER FERRY PATH], though it was another 14 years before it actually opened. William Pauley had operated a ferry there since 1887 and carried an estimated one-and-a-quarter-million passengers. Those waiting to make a last nostalgic crossing were disappointed when the ferry sank just before the new bridge opened. [SCAN OF PAULEY'S FERRY WITH CYCLIST]

Chesterton folk were very happy at the opening of the new footbridge and there was a fairly large crowd on both sides of the river to watch its inauguration. The Mayor reminded them that the bridge had been a very long time coming. But there was an old proverb: "Bridges were made for wise men to walk over, and fools to ride over" & cyclists should remember this and the warning of the penalties awaiting those who did not dismount when crossing the bridge.

Further downstream the Cutter ferry, worked for years by the Dant family, had also been superseded by a footbridge opened a few weeks earlier. But there were soon problems as the News reported in July 1927: "There was a good deal of grouching before the inhabitants of Chesterton had a footbridge over the Cam at Dant's Ferry. Now they have got one they have found something else to grouse about". A correspondent complained: "At five minutes to eight every morning the instrument workers at Pye's are hurrying to work from the other side of the river. They curse and groan, trip and stagger under the burden of carrying their bicycles up and down a steep double flight of steps. Sooner or later some panting person carrying a bicycle will fall backwards or pitch into the river. The bridge was not made for cyclists who should get up earlier and ride up Victoria Avenue. But it is quite as much a death trap for pedestrians: the steps are much too steep". In 1932 the bridge had to be closed while the approaches were being reconstructed and the ferry was brought back into use once more.

[SCAN OF CUTTER FERRY BRIDGE WITH THE OLD FERRY VISIBLE ON THE RIGHT]

Could this be the solution to the present problems for cyclists: does anybody have an old ferry they could offer?

Many Sawstonians were puzzled by the picture of their High Street that I used to illustrate Memories on 22nd October

Several people went out into the street to try and identify the scene and even Keith Westley who has known the village all his life e-mailed to say something was wrong. But it really was their village, though the News photographer had used a telephoto lens when he took the picture IN [SEE PRINT-OUT] , giving a different perspective on the scene that was also selected as a postcard view in about 1910. [REPRISE PHOTO, SCAN OF SAME AREA OF HIGH STREET 1910].

George Challis was one man who knew the village in those days and had the foresight to set down his memories in a booklet he published about 70 years ago. Long unobtainable it has now been reprinted with an up-to-date commentary by Bryan Howe.

George recalled how in his early days Sawston was a manufacturing village with no claim to beauty and as such did not attract independent, retired people. Tradespeople looking down upon factory hands, and factory hands upon the farm labourer who occupied the lowest step.

"The Yard" and "the Mill" were responsible for the employment of the majority of the working population of the parish. At the Yard, owned by Thomas Evans, tradesmen abounded - tanners, fleshers, frisers, splitters, grounders and glove cutters. In addition nearly a hundred parchment makers were employed. Boys were drafted into the works from Linton Workhouse. The tramp of men in their clogs going to and returning from work was a well-known sound. At the back of the 'Woolpack' was a huge barn in which a horse walking in a circle turned a mill which crushed the bark used for tanning. Women made up gloves and also with yellow cotton stitched up the holes in the chamois leathers. But to maximise his profits Evans paid the men at his own public houses where they were expected to spend at least 4d. for the good of the house - which sum they often greatly exceeded Sawston was also famous for its paper; George remembered when the Mill was owned by Captain Towgood and their blue foolscap was to be found in almost every lawyer's office in the country. Various tradesmen were employed - millwrights, fitters, turners, papermakers and specialists who were responsible for the paper being absolutely up to standard with the unpleasant task of sorting and cutting up rags was done by women.

But during the second world war paper from Sawston's Spicer's factory played a largely unrecorded part in the aviation industry. The constructed long-range fuel tanks, made from paper, animal glue and gelatine to give Typhoons and other fighter aircraft the extra flying time needed to escort bombers to their targets. They were cigar-shaped and made in three sections bonded together to become perfectly petrol-proof. And this is where Keith Westley would like your help; he knows most of the technical details but not how the front and tail were fixed to the main body of the tank. If you can put him out of his memory please e-mail g4wez@waitrose.com or write to me and I'd forward it on. "Sawston 150 years ago" is available from Bryan Howe at 16 Henry Morris Road, Sawston CB2 4JW (01223 833963) for £6.50

It has taken Mr B. Gill some time to respond to a Memories article on Melbourn– but then he is writing from Melbourne, Australia! “My wife and I were sent a copy of the CEN 15th October relating to the Sheepshead Row Cottages before restoration in 1938. The one with the little girl at the end one was of my wife when she was 6 years old. She lived with her grandparents Mr and Mrs Negus and her Uncle Alfred until about 1946. She is seen with her favourite Teddy Bear which she carried about everywhere. Also she is wearing black boots which she hated. Her name is Sheila Gill nee Winter, and her mother Emma Maling nee Negus is still alive aged 90 and lives in Litlington. [SCAN OF THE COTTAGE TAKEN 1938 TOGETHER WITH A DETAIL SHOWING SHEILA GILL]

Hildersham & Balsham residents could also be excused if they failed to recognise their own villages as seen on two calendars issued to raise money for church restoration funds. For Andrew Westwood-Bate has delved back into the past for a selection of old photographs, one of which shows the Post Office at Hildersham over 100 years ago, when most villages actually had post offices. Supplies of the calendar are limited so contact Andrew on Cambridge 892430 [SCAN OF HILDERSHAM POST OFFICE AND BALSHAM HIGH STREET c1900, PERHAPS CEN PHOTOS FROM LIBRARY]

If your interest is centred further south then you may find something of relevance in the latest (autumn) issue of the Saffron Walden Historical Journal. It covers Walden and north-west Essex generally and there are items relating to Newport, Hadstock, Radwinter, the Chesterfords and Ashdon. Articles include one on the fascinating history and architecture of the beautiful timber-framed house known as Saffron Walden Youth Hostel, the town's First World War V.A.D. Hospital and Newport church bells maker Miles Graye. Copies are available at £2 from Harts bookshop, the Tourist Information Centre, Lankester Antiques or by mail from 9 High Street, Saffron Walden - postage is 50p extra.

Memories 26th November 2003

When Wilf Free from Cottenham wrote to recall his memories of a Home Guard rocket battery on Newmarket Road Cambridge (Memories 29th October) he touched upon an aspect of Cambridge's wartime experience that had not been raised before.

Now Michael Bowyer, the aviation expert and author of numerous books including ‘Air Raid: the enemy air offensive against East Anglia 1939-45’ (Patrick Stephens, 1986) has been delving into his files to fill this gap.

As the country prepared for air attack in 1941 300,000 Army personnel were scheduled to man anti-aircraft gun defences. Having so many troops tied up and rarely engaging the foe was clearly pointless so ATS women and the Home Guard were trained to man heavy and light anti-aircraft guns. Thirteen British heritage cities became Gun Defended Areas and on 29 April 1942 eight 3.7 in. mobile Anti-Aircraft guns arrived at Cambridge. Four guns moved onto a site near where Priory School stands, with others at Grantchester. Following the so-called ‘Baedeker Raids’ the enemy switched to extremely low-level night operations and the heavy 3.7-inch guns were of little use against them. So 40-mm Bofors light anti-aircraft guns and machine-guns at searchlight posts were used. One such gun positioned on Midsummer Common early on 28th July 1942 briefly engaged the low attack Ju 88 which unloaded ten high explosive bombs and large incendiary weapons close to the ‘Round Church’ killing three and injuring 19 people. The guns opened up again on 29/30 July and 6th August when eight Dornier 217s attempted to bomb the Arbury Road instrument factory and shrapnel fell widely in the eastern parts of Cambridge. The ‘crack’ and ‘flash’ of anti-aircraft fire became usual around Cambridge. [SCAN OF 3.7" ACK-ACK GUN (NOT CAMBRIDGE) and GUNS AND OPERATORS POSED ON PARKERS PIECE]

In April 1943 Home Guard recruitment for rocket batteries began. Within a month sufficient Cambridge Home Guards had volunteered or been directed to fully man the Cam 101 'Z' Battery, their twin-rocket launchers easy to see from Newmarket Road alongside four Regular soldier manned 3.7- inch guns and sometimes their Bofors.

Electrically fired, the rockets were intended to burst as one in the form of a box with the enemy raider caught in the centre and too seriously damaged to survive. Fusing, simultaneous launch and correct trajectory were essential, and not easy to achieve. Each 3-inch diameter rocket 'shell' consisted of a metal tube about six four feet long with a sharply pointed black or bronze lacquered warhead and four tail triangular shaped vanes. It needed to be fused then carefully lifted on to launch rails which were then aimed appropriately. Training was given at weekends at Heacham Beach Practice camp

Their expertise was tested early on the morning of 26 July 1943. At 00.25 hours the alert sounded. A Dornier 217 was about and at 00.38 from an arc of bright light in the eastern sky came a giant 'whoosh'. Cam 101 was firing for the first time. Fiery trails spewed from the rocket tails as they whistled away easterly. Purple and red flashes followed, at a surprisingly low altitude. It was not a text book launch as only half the battery had managed to fire, their rockets exploding spasmodically over a wide area of sky. The enemy aircraft continued over central Cambridge and had turned about when almost at once Cam 101 fired again, this time in the direction of Milton, with 32 rockets racing off in close formation and producing surely the most spectacular firework display Cambridge has even seen. The warheads exploded almost simultaneously producing a curious echo, which seemed to bounce around the sky. A third salvo was then fired while out west the heavy crackle of Grantchester's guns came as they tackled a higher flying raider. Very abruptly an eerie silence followed and the all-clear wailed at 01.15 hrs. [SCAN – GRAINY – OF ROCKETS IN ACTION – NOT CAMBS.]

That silence was broken next morning. Hot chunks of rocket had cascaded onto Swaffham Bulbeck, Swaffham Prior and Quy & strong complaints flowed from those upon whom the rocket remnants fell. Clearly, these novel weapons needed to burst over unoccupied areas whenever possible. That would not be easy to achieve, but Cam 101 fired several times that late summer and complaints were fewer. [SCAN OF UNION SOCIETY DAMAGE 1942 – BUT FALLING ROCKETS DAMAGED VILLAGES]

By autumn Cam 101 was training to use 'niners', 13 of which were to equip the battery. More space being needed, a new operating site was chosen, a field at the eastern end of Walpole Road. From there they and Grantchester's guns opened fire on 21 January 1944 at enemy aircraft heading for London. On a later occasion a Dornier 217 was caught in the middle of a box of bursting rockets but still proceeded and on 22nd February 101 fired a full salvo at four raiders passing by the city.

Operating the Z projectors had taken the Home Guard into the front line, destroying notions that Dad's Army was just a comedy show. Just how successful the anti-aircraft gunners were it is impossible to say; they were certainly effective in driving away attackers, but less successful in causing their demise. [SCAN OF 5TH CAMBS A COMPANY AA BATTERY 1944, SHOULDER FLASH OF CAM 101 Z BATTERY]

Other readers have also recalled the batteries

One man who actually worked on them was James Langford who still lives in Cambridge. He recalls: "I joined the 'twins' battery from the Pye Home Guard & from there I move up to the 'nines' battery where Wimpole Road is today". He remembers training at Heacham as "fun but serious stuff. A regular officer was posted on top of a pillbox to warn of approaching aircraft. Alas he did not see a Wellington bomber, gave the order to fire and we nearly shot it down". Francis Gilbey from Soham recalls that his father, Bob Gilbey used to man the Walpole Road rockets. He worked on the land at Pemberton's Trumpington during the day and served in the Home guard at other times.

Dr Richard Eden, Emeritus Professor of Energy Studies has other experiences of anti-aircraft activity:

"During the war Cambridge undergraduates reading mathematics, science, or engineering, were interviewed by a group led by C.P. Snow. I expressed a preference for working on radar, and this led to my attending lectures at Imperial College followed by a ten-week course at the Radar School in Petersham, Surrey in 1942. After this I was commissioned as a 2nd Lieutenant in the Royal Electrical and Mechanical Engineers (REME), and was posted initially to the HQ of the searchlight regiment based in Ely. After three weeks there, I was attached to the searchlight battery with its HQ in Royston. This battery was responsible for 24 searchlights in the area to the west of the line from Royston through Thriplow to Cambridge. Each searchlight was linked to a radar system, SLC, (searchlight control), and it was my job to supervise the maintenance of the radar sets.

"Typically, each week there would be several breakdowns amongst the 24 radar sets in the searchlight battery. Sometimes the troop radar mechanic could fix the problem, but more commonly I would be called in, so after a few weeks I had encountered most of the commonest faults and diagnosis was relatively easy. In the more difficult cases, or where spares were required which we did not stock, it was necessary to take a unit from the radar set to the REME workshop in Northampton, usually collecting a working unit in exchange.

"My other job was to improve the efficiency of the radar sets, by relocating them if necessary to avoid 'clutter' arising from reflections from the surrounding hills. Since most of the region is fairly flat, this problem was rare, though in the case of Thriplow, we had great difficulty in finding a satisfactory site. From the viewpoint of radar alone, the best site was the village green, but the major commanding the battery thought the crew would prefer more privacy, since their quarters were always immediately adjacent to the searchlight and its radar.

"Two of my searchlight sites were near Cambridge, one at Trumpington on the Clay Farm site just off Long Road and another at Dry Drayton. In the Spring of 1943, it was decided that there should be a fitness exercise and for this occasion most of the 300 or so men in the Royston-based battery assembled in Grantchester one Sunday morning, and were required to run to the Dry Drayton site. The starting point was in Grantchester near the site of an anti-aircraft battery on the Cambridge road. The considerable complexity of guns' radar meant that there was one REME officer responsible for maintaining each GL2c radar set, and coincidentally, the radar officer in Grantchester was a Mr Cadwell, who had formerly been my mathematics master at Hertford Grammar School from 1937-39.

"There was very little enemy activity in the skies over the Cambridge area during the period when I was looking after the searchlight radar. Sometimes, there were three or four alerts each week, but there were fewer actual incursions into our area. From time to time there were practice alerts when RAF planes provided practice to the searchlight and radar teams."

Memories 3rd December 2003, by Mike Petty

Rural post offices have been part of community life for generations, but like various other village institutions they are declining. Without them people are faced with longer journeys to collect pensions or benefits and rural life becomes the poorer.

In their heyday the village post office and general stores supplied most of the villagers' needs, as Beatrice Stevens recalled in her book: "Stretham: a feast of memories"

"Swan's was a general store and housed the village Post Office. This was a small box-like office at the left of the entrance, and had a fascinating aperture through which you voiced your requests and received the stamps and Postal Order that you might want. Occasionally one needed to send a telegram, but only when sad news was to be transmitted. Someone was ill and the daughter in service in London must be sent for. Or, perhaps even worse, one of the family had died or had had a farm accident, and other relatives must be informed."

But the post office side of the shop was eclipsed by the other things it sold.

"You could buy almost anything at Swan's. Most of the left side of the shop was given over to drapery, and numerous small compartments, about fifteen inches square, contained an abundance of goods. Each compartment was labelled: socks, vests, pants, cottons, and larger compartments held the more bulky goods: men's and boy's trousers, women's combinations, warm knickers or drawers, thick lisle stockings, long-sleeved vests.

Open shelves held parcels, some with brown paper wrapping and others packed in white cloth to keep the contents clean: unbleached calico for sheets and underwear, towelling for the roller towels which hung on the back door of every house. At the very top were less-neatly wrapped bundles, holding speckled wool for home-knitted socks and gloves, and later, as jumpers became fashionable, you could buy gaily-coloured wool in brilliant shades of green, blue and red. Swans stocked boots and shoes, mainly of the heavy kind for work on the land, but, as this was a higher-class shop, you might, also, see on display a few pairs of lighter shoes with patent toes, black, of course. Brown shoes were for the unconventional, and Mr. Swan even stocked a few pairs of these.

One could also buy slippers there, and, at Christmas, there was always a large assortment of tablecloths: damask and linen for use at teatime on Sundays and special occasions, and chenille for afternoons when the living-room put on a more leisured look after the mid-day dinner. Duchesse sets for the dressing-table, fancy embroidered mats, sensible overalls, which really were overalls, and, later, small printed aprons, provided a display that tempted many a mother to spend more than she could afford. And Mr. Swan, knowing the problem, never pressed anyone to buy, but, when they did, he wrapped the purchase up as if it was of the utmost value, and, always, with the greatest courtesy.

The same courtesy was shown when small items for the children's stockings were asked for, maybe, a handkerchief with a nursery rhyme to decorate it, an embroidered white pinafore, warm, black stockings and, for pure luxury, a pink, sugar mouse. The boy of the family was something more of a problem, but Mr. Swan was sure to point out the caps and socks, and maybe, a chocolate watch, with its hands painted in red on silver paper.

The shop was a veritable Treasure House, a large counter at the right, holding jars of sweets, brass scales and a bacon-slicing machine, this last being an object of wonder. Stacked on the floor, in front of the counter, were open biscuit tins containing mouth-watering jam puffs, ginger biscuits, fig slices and Garibaldi's, all for a few pence a pound, and for tuppence you could buy a big bag of broken biscuits. These were the best of all, to my mind. You never knew what you might find. There might be tiny pieces of ginger biscuit gone soft or crumbs of a plain kind, but there might also be a whole cream biscuit, or one with chocolate covering. Ready-made bags, with almost a blotting-paper texture in a darkish blue were used for white sugar, with a rose-red coloured one for brown sugar, an unintentional but attractive combination of colour.

Mr. Walter, the younger of the two Swans, was mainly in charge of the drapery department, and, although unmarried, would serve the most intimate garments of women's wear in such a natural and factual way that there was no embarrassment on either side. Mr. Ernest looked after the grocery side of the business. He was just as courteous as his brother, giving as much consideration in supplying a small item as making up a large order, which might be for delivery in the village itself, or in the fen. They even went to neighbouring villages, and everywhere they called there would be a warm, personal welcome for the Swan brothers, who were honoured for their integrity."

In the 1920's Swan's gave up the postal side of their business which transferred to another village shop – now the last in Stretham. But it has not always been easy to find a new site for the post office, as the villagers at Ashley found back in October 1926. The News reported: "At the Newmarket Police Court a solicitor on behalf of Greene, King & Sons, brewers, said there was a real difficulty in Ashley in obtaining premises for the sub Post Office and he proposed that it should be attached to the Crown Public House. In order to do this it would be necessary to carry out structural alterations. Nobody could enter the public house through the Post Office, or the Post Office through the public house. If it were possible to get another property it would be desirable to do so as the language at a public house was not always of the best". Now such proposals are being made once more.

Back in April 1973 the British Tourist Authority pronounced that the village shop was alive and well and to prove it they picked out the village shop and post office at Gt Abington. The shop, run by retired R.A.F. squadron leader Jack Armitage, was highlighted in an article in the magazine "In Britain". Since he and his wife took over the shop they had modernised the inside but left the old front as it was to blend in with the rest of the village. Since they took over three years ago before turnover had almost doubled. "I am sure there will always be a place for the village shop", she said. That shop continues but other communities have seen the closure of even this once-basic facility. Margaret Wilsher has written from Frinton-on-Sea with her memories of Balsham where her mother ran Cartwright's Stores in the 1940s and 1950s. Next door to the shop was an old cottage, since pulled down to make way for Trinity Close, where Bert Smith was a harness maker and once made a boot for a cow. Such details are most interesting to local historians like Anthea Robinson, a relative newcomer to Balsham, who has been compiling a village history, a few copies of which may still be available from her at 11 West Wickham Road, Balsham CB1 6DZ. It includes a list of village amenities which in 2001 included new trades never envisaged before such as computer repairer and carpet fitter, industrial development site – as well as that essential post office.

Two correspondents have sent photographs of St Paul's school in Russell Street, Cambridge though at different periods. Gladys Allen (nee Rudd) knew it first: "My twin sister Oliver and I went there in the mid 1920s, although we moved out to Girton. My mother wanted us to stay at the school so we had to walk from Girton Road to Oxford Road to catch a bus". Oliver is the girl in a drill-slip and Gladys is second on her left. Anne Ramsey (nee Froste) from Cambridge was there about 20 years later and has sent a picture of a PT session in 1947 or 1948, with Norwich Street in the background. She and her sister, now Diane Lever (arrowed) were pupils there at the time and she Anne has fond memories of the old, cold building and the teachers, Miss Chestnut, Mrs Honeyman and the excellent headmistress, Miss Grey. Does anybody recognise themselves on either snap? [TWO SCANS OF ST PAULS SCHOOL- THE GROUP c1925, THE PT GIRLS c1947]

A number of people have written asking for information on old Cambridge photographers Linda Gooch would like to know about T. Whiffin whose name appears on the back of some pictures that belong to her mother Mrs Eileen Mansfield. [SCAN OF WHIFFIN PICTURE OF GROUP OF MEN NEAR HOBSON'S CONDUIT]

David Tooke is interested in Edward Johnson, a very early photographer in Wisbech who took a photograph of his ancestor Thomas Tooke. Johnson won a prize in an exhibition in 1866, some of his fine photographs of appear in a series of books on Fen and Marshland Churches. Lorna Perry is after Clarence Hailey, a Newmarket photographer of racehorses; she has one of his pictures dated 1921 and would appreciate more information

Tim Sergeant from Kent is researching the Basebe family, one of who was a photographer in Cambridge before the First World War

Memories 11th December 2004, by Mike Petty

Last week's tributes to Sir Arthur Marshall on his 100th birthday recalled that he was born just 13 days before Orville Wright made what has gone down in history as the world's first manned, powered, controlled and sustained flight in a heavier-than-air machine. It took place near Kitty Hawk, Carolina but that distinction was nearly claimed by a Cambridgeshire man, E.P. Frost of West Wrattling Hall whose story was told by the Cambridge Daily News in December 1953. His nephew, Ald E. Gordon Frost recalled that it was back in 1870, more than 30 years before the Americans that Frost built his first machine. A keen naturalist he based his design on the wings of birds, a creation of willow, feathers and silk described as 'a wonderful piece of work' by A.J. Winship, a well-known Cambridge engineer, who helped Frost and his colleague Dr H.. Hutchinson in their experiment.

This was before the days of the internal combustion engine and they planned that the machine would be driven by a specially-built steam engine with a vertical boiler. But the engine did not develop the required power and although the wings flapped up and down it could not lift the heavy craft into the air. The machine was left under the trees in the park and by the time a petrol engine was available, 30 years later, the weather had left it a wreck. But Frost kept one of the wings in his house and would invite people to sit on a music school and flap it up and down, finding themselves being whirled around the room. [SCAN OF FROST'S STEAM PLANE]

Many of the outstanding pioneers in aviation, with famous names like Handley Page, Inglis, Maxim and Hargrave, visited the Hall or were associated with Frost. As a tribute to his foresight he was made President of the Aeronautical Society in 1909 when the Wright

Brothers were awarded the Society's Gold Medal for their historic exploit. This body, now the Royal Aeronautical Society, now stage an annual lecture in Sir Arthur's name; and even at 100 he is still active, being thanked warmly for his help in the latest history of his company "Marshall of Cambridge" by Stephen Skinner (Tempus £12.99)

It was in 1909 too that a newspaper correspondent journeyed out to Oakington and asked an old roadman if he could direct him to the aircraft works of Messrs Grose and Feary. Eventually he found his way to a barn at the end of a farmyard where two men were working on a cigar-shaped machine – an all-British monoplane with an air-cooled engine that would carry a passenger as well as the pilot. As the day of the first flight neared there was a heated debate between the two designers as to who should not be the pilot – one claimed he had a family, the other that he had a widowed mother to support. Eventually they resolved the issue and the plane careered across a field; but it did not become airborne, except when it struck a bump. [SCAN OF OAKINGTON C1914]

Elsewhere in Cambridgeshire other aviation work was progressing. At Elm, near Wisbech, Ernest Pruden was building a cycloplane, though it was destroyed when the barn it was housed in caught fire. And in St Barnabas Road Cambridge a group of men, inspired by the Oakington incident, were busy on a design of their own. In May 1910 flight trials were held near Fleam Dyke; the plane rose a few feet from the ground and sailed along for three or four yards before coming down nose first and turning a somersault. Fortunately the pilot, Mr Wallis, was not injured. [SCAN OF ELM c1900]

Aeroplanes with flapping wings seem totally illogical today, but so does the idea of an autogyro – a machine like a mini-helicopter that featured in one of the James Bond films. Yet that did fly and was developed by Ken Wallis, from a company registered in Chesterton Road, Cambridge, who in 1981 rebuilt the original Wallbro Plane, using as guidance the description given by the original newspaper reporter. [AUTOGYRO PHOTO FROM NEWS FILES]

Spitfires, Wellingtons and Heinkels took off and landed in the Park beside the cathedral at Ely in 1942, their progress studied by dozens of young Jewish faces. They were members of the Jews Free Boys School modelling club who had been removed from the very real danger of aerial combat over their London homes to find safety and some degree of normality in the fenland city. As they arrived so Tommy Whewell, one of the School's teachers made the journey the other way, back to his wife in London, only to be killed in an air raid. The Jewish schoolboys were based in the King's School's Hereward Hall just across the road from The Porta, which had been built in 1881 to provide dormitories, library and studies in response to their growing number of boarders and the extra masters needed to teach an expanding curriculum. [SCAN OF KING'S SCHOOL PUPILS TAKING LESSON IN PARK]

This episode in the King's School's story is recorded in a new book by Lynne Turner that gives a unique insight into life 'In the shadow of the cathedral' from the time of old-boy King Edward the Confessor to the present day. She charts the growth of the buildings and curriculum, but also concentrates on the personalities involved, not only of teachers but also other members of staff, including Miss Canham, matron from 1906-1958. Her discipline was strict but fair and she was remembered by hundreds of pupils each Christmas time. Former Ely Mayor, Mike Rouse recalls: "In my years she presided over the line in her undercroft surrounded by piles of laundry and the sweet soapy smell of it all, dispensing small bottles of milk to us at break"

Nor is the sporting side of school life overlooked; swimming sports were introduced in 1905, though they had no pool. So it was off to the Roswell Pits for a variety of races, including one on planks which had to be launched and mounted by a pair of boys who, using their arms like oars, swam across the pit and back again. Next year was less successful; they had just gathered when the heavens opened and the banks of clay turned very slippery and sticky; it was a sad procession back to school in the rain. They were delighted when Ely obtained its own open-air pool, a more hygienic alternative to the rat-infested pits. [SCAN OF ROSWELL PITS 1920S & ELY OPEN-AIR SWIMMING POOL 1968 – NOT WITH KING’S SCHOOL PUPILS]

In 1970 the King’s School celebrated its millennium year with a pageant, opened a new purpose-built Junior School and admitted its first girl pupils, becoming one of the first Public Schools to go co-educational. This was a brave move by the School, especially given their earlier experience with girls. For in 1604 the headmaster’s somewhat unruly daughter had been accommodated at one end of the school with some of the boarders. The Dean recorded she “suspected of very loose behaviour ... for she would not stick to put on the boys apparel and lett boys putt on hers and come into the school in his absence and daunce amongst the boys”. But one of the first new arrivals in 1970, Jocelyn Howell, recalled: “I remember arriving on the first day at Queen Emma House, (situated in the old Hereward building) to see a sign that said ‘Girls Only’ being nailed to the door. Very soon we realised that girls were to be treated, quite fairly, in the same way as boys”. And this included sport – for in that first year they were coached in cricket and rugby. Grace Hughes FROM ROYSTON also says that during the period 1934-1936 she belonged to The Robins, a young people’s group organised though the Robin Goodfellow column of the CDN, that maintained a cot at Addenbrooke’s Hospital. Every year a concert was given for the Robins which was held in the Guildhall and every child on leaving was given a bar of Cadbury’s milk chocolate. Are there any other Robins who remember this, she asks.

Memories 17th December 2003, by Mike Petty

At this time of year we are encouraged to ‘eat, drink and be merry’. In the past this was somewhat easier than today for many villages had many pubs, as at Sutton where Peter Smith has been researching the story of its former inns. He has identified about 40 drinking establishments in the village over the years

Harold Painter, who served the village as shopkeeper, postman, newspaper correspondent and parish councillor, compiled a mass of notes on history of Sutton some of which were published a year after his death in 1989. He recalled:

“Many of the old-time public houses of the village were no more than gambling houses. One of the pubs in The Row was known as the Jim Crow. It was a house with a reputation, for here dice, dominoes and cards gave way to wagers on foot racing, the carrying of sacks of corn, the hurling of weights and the like. Anything from a penny to a pig, or even a house or land were won and lost in this way at some time or other. [SCAN OF HAROLD PAINTER SKETCH AND POEM]

“It was in such circumstances and at such times that the inscription on a beam ‘Pay today, Trust Tomorrow’ had particular relevance. People were not encouraged to call for a round if they could not pay there and then! Most though, had their name up on the slate until the end of the week. Such signs gave the drinker a clear indication as to where he stood. Only regulars could get any credit!

“They had days when they drank themselves into a state beyond reason and then would follow a great uproar as fists began to fly, though rarely was anybody really hurt as so many missed their target. Many were felled with a push and trundled home in a stupor in a barrow to be dumped on the doorstep, from which it was up to their poor wives or family to get them into bed.

“Obviously not all drank hard and played dice, but came to enjoy a good song or two. Some were known to have a favourite one and were easily persuaded to sing. Charles might start up with ‘Love is Like a Red, Red Rose’ to be followed by ‘Old English Gentlemen’ from Bill and then ‘Little Brown Jug’ as an encore.

“With so many pubs and beerhouses, there was some competition between landlords to get custom, and there was a time when the following jingle was displayed outside the ‘Black Horse’

My ‘Black Horse’ will stand its ground
Pull the ‘Windmill up the lane
And see the ‘Royal Standard’ drowned. ”

The years that followed saw the ‘Royal Standard’ burn to the ground and the ‘Windmill’ closed its doors in the 1930s. The ‘Black Horse’ stood for a few years more. Now all have gone leaving just The ‘Chequers’ in the village and ‘The Anchor’ at Sutton Gault to supply the needs of local drinkers.

‘Time, Gentlemen Please’ by Peter Smith is one of three booklets just issued by the Sutton Feast Committee together with ‘A walk down Memory Lane’ which comprises a chronological record of village events and Harold Painter’s reissued history. Each costs £2.50 from Peter Smith, The Homestead, 32 New Road, Mepal, CB6 2AP and money goes to the feast celebrations. [PHOTOS OF SUTTON SHOWING PUBS ARE WITH CHRIS ELLIOTT. SCAN OF INTERIOR OF BROOK PUB AT SUTTON 1964 – IT CLOSED 1967, SERVING BEER AT ROYAL OAK WILBURTON 1964]

Feasts were an important part of village life. At Madingley men from other villages visited, as C. Barlow recalled in 1957: “Sometimes there was a ‘Dancing Booth’, a large tent where one could dance all the evening for one shilling – one dance cost twopence – and music was provided by a concertina and ‘fiddle’. Until about 15 years ago there were still coconut shies, a few stalls and swingboats. Lolworth men usually came over for a cricket match in the afternoon and in the evening the men of Girton visited the Three Horseshoes. This was the time when all the children were chased indoors and the door locked. The curious went upstairs and watched from their bedroom windows while the gentlemen of Madingley and Girton enjoyed their annual battle after the Inn had closed – the men of Girton were great fighters in those days.” [SCAN OF THREE HORSESHOES MADINGLEY 1929]

A similar scene at West Wickham was described by John De Fraine in 1865: “The village fair commenced on Saturday. In a little paddock, adjoining the White Hart, the stalls are built, and the great booth pitched, and the fun, and din, and roar goes on as in a town. There is a collection of waxwork figures, a wonderful pony dancing ‘Pop goes the Weasel’ & a faded and tattered show, from the stage of which a wheezy clown announced a variety of ‘comic and sentimental’ performances within & ballad singers warning the young men not to ‘kiss the girls at Wickham Fair’. Photographic ‘artists’ guaranteeing a perfect likeness in five minutes for sixpence; skittle players, full of noise and drink; the great dancing booth crowded. It was a glad sight to see the young merry and joyous; made happy with a few pence - running here and there, full of life and glee - buying a doll, or a whistle, or a penny trumpet”.

But he did not approve of all his fellow villagers: “Men whose mouths are foul with low language, who cannot see beyond a quart pot, and whose lives seem so often given up to drink, and their own degradation. They will spend pounds, and not enjoy themselves in the end like those who don't spend a penny. We could scarcely see one face that indicated refinement or intelligence. There was hardly a man with any inner sources of enjoyment. Will it always be so? Will the day never come when they shall have better amusements presented to them. Will they never be lifted above the slavery of beer, and the companionship of the tap-room?”

Janet Morris from the village adds an extra insight into John De Fraine and his connection with the village: “The publican of the White Hart at the time he wrote the piece was his father-in-law, James Cooper Traylen. John de Fraine never says how he met the publican's daughter Ursula but the couple lived in London for a couple of years after their marriage and then moved to the village, presumably so that she could be near her family. John seems to have got on with his father-in-law as he was among the guests at the opening of the Mission Hall in West Wickham in 1871 which John sponsored to provide an alternative to the pub for the young men of the village. Interestingly, the only mention of James that John makes in his books is to him as a ‘farmer’!” [SCAN OF WEST WICKHAM GREEN AND PUB 1926

Miss Daphne Foreman from Sturton Street writes:

“I saw an articles in the News commemorating the first broadcast of a Royal Wedding, that of the Duke of Kent in 1934. I heard that broadcast. I remember listening with my mother and the thrill of hearing the Princess say ‘I will’. This was through our faint ‘wireless’ which my father had made from tongue-and-groove wood left over from the hen house, with bright green silk at the opening in the front, made from a cast-off item of my mother's underwear – as I delighted to tell visitors, to her annoyance. The cabinet stood about three feet high and was clear-varnished. A knob changed a pointer on a dial to National, Regional or Midland, the three wireless stations of that time.

“It came on with a simple switch, so that it often started in the middle of a word and cut off likewise. No waiting to warm up. There was a large battery in the back of the cabinet which lasted about a year and a space for two accumulators which I had to take frequently down the to the village garage to be recharged with distilled water. “

Therese May has e-mailed for help: “I work at Waterbeach Lodge and am doing research on the place from the time it was built in 1818 to the present day. I have a list of the people who have lived there throughout the years and been in contact with a Professor Debenham's daughters who lived there in the 1920s and 1930s. I have spoken to a man who was the painter and decorator when it was used by the Carmelite nuns from 1937 to 1973 and been in contact with one nun who now lives in a monastery in America". Greta Wakefield writes from Impington with her memories of the Robin Fellowship run by the Cambridgeshire Independent Press in the 1920s and 30s. She says: "I still have my membership badge – an enamelled picture of a robin with an outer circle of Cambridge blue. I wonder how many other still recall our annual party and concert in the New Theatre. We all used to sing our special song – 'Let's all sign like the birdies sing', nearly raising the roof. There were various entertainments and we were all given a 'goody bag' containing a small bar of chocolate, an apple and an orange. I know we went home happy. We had 'our page' in the newspaper with puzzles and competitions and birthdays were mentioned. There was a 'Robin' cot in Addenbrooke's Hospital for any small child and we collected donations for its upkeep. I wonder if there are enough 'Old Robins' for a re-union. I fear we wouldn't sing 'Tweet, tweet, tweet' but 'Croak, croak, croak'."

Memories 24th December 2003, by Mike Petty

Christmas is traditionally a time for Peace on Earth and Goodwill to All Men. But this year there will be many families who are separated, making the most of the celebrations hoping for better things next year.

Sixty years ago Frank Dobie from Austin, Texas, was one of those far away from his own home, having accepted a post as Professor of American History at Cambridge University. From his base at Emmanuel College, he set down his memories of Cambridge at Christmas 1943. [SCAN OF FRANK DOBIE AND AMERICAN SERVICEMEN, KING'S COLLEGE BRIDGE]

It is three days after Christmas and the church bells are still ringing in my ears and in my heart. Not that there was much literal ringing of church bells - except for the beautiful ones selected for broadcasting. For four Christmases now they have not rung out all over the land on Christmas morning as they are wont to ring out in normal times. They have not rung because it was agreed early in the war that the ringing of the church bells would be an alarm against the enemy.

Five days before Christmas General Pleas B. Rogers, now in command of all the vast and diversified American operations over the 750 square miles of the 'Central Base Section' called London, was showing me some of the activities of his area. It was late night when his car drove up to the terminus of one branch of the city's wonderful underground railway system. The subways are bored through clay more than one hundred and thirty feet under the street surface, and bombs have never penetrated to them. In certain places they have been turned into shelters against air raids and are fitted up with beds and other necessary appointments. The tube shelter where General Rogers took me had eight hundred beds reserved for American service men on leave. The service men are taken there on nights when too many of them have crowded into London for the Red Cross hostels, the always-crowded hotels and other sleeping places to accommodate. There they are given clean sheets and blankets and, one hundred and thirty feet underground, sleep in air as pure as that on top of Pike's Peak.

After we had inspected the cathedral-like corridors of beds, the store rooms, the plumbing and the machinery, the manager of this subterranean refuge led us into a side room where we were surprised to find upwards of twenty volunteer workers. More than half of them were women; the men were all beyond the age of military service. Both men and women were of what is generally called 'the working class,' though that class now includes virtually everybody in the United Kingdom. These people are up at daylight to work; they work long hours; and at night they serve as air wardens and attendants in the underground hostel. It is often nearer daylight than midnight before the last soldier has been bedded down. When we were leaving two very plain women sitting knitting while they waited for a call, near the door, said, almost together, "Happy Christmas to you both." I cannot tell why or how, so deep down there in the caverns of refuge, those words came home to me. I suppose it was because they were so sincerely meant. Like a quiet bell, away off on a Sunday morning, I keep hearing the 'Happy Christmas' of those two kindly featured, plainly dressed working women down in the caverns so deep under the streets of London.

In the college hall where I have rooms in Cambridge, two other plain women, designated as 'bed-makers,' bring in coal, make the coal fires, scrub the hearths, draw the water, draw back the black blackout curtains, make the beds, change the linen and otherwise administer to us gentlemen. Two weeks ago, they both took at the same time the mild but devastating form of influenza that has been sweeping the country. Neither one quit work, however. "You see, sir," one of them explained to me, "we could not let each other down." One of them has three children at home and a husband in the army. The other one has a boy in the R.A.F. and other children, and for years now she has had two soldiers quartered in her house. She gets up a long while before daylight and gives those two soldiers and her family breakfast and gets to college in time to wake some of her charges up for breakfast there. They both do their own washing, cooking and other housework. [SCAN OF COLLEGE BEDDER]

"And how are you going to spend Christmas?" I asked a waiter of the dining hall. "It will be mostly memories this year," he replied with a certain dignity; "but that should sustain us until victory. A Happy Christmas to you, sir!"

I had several invitations to Christmas dinner - and nobody who invited me had anything to spare. In the afternoon about teatime I called at a home that has been open to me on several occasions. These people had been unable to get 'a bird' for Christmas, but they and their neighbours were combining on a rooster that the neighbours procured weeks back and began feeding in a way supposed to tenderise the meat.

My host for Christmas dinner is the manager of a seven-hundred-acre farm owned by Cambridge University. A practical scientist, he is one of the best-known agriculturists in England, W. S. Mansfield. We had a turkey. There were eight of us, including a doctor and his wife, who is a Hollander; they both escaped from Holland a little ahead of the Germans. Mansfield poured wine in wine-glasses on the table. Good wine has become as scarce as 'birds' and razor blades. After the plum pudding, than which nothing is more English or more satisfying to my mind, taste and stomach, Mansfield arose and we did likewise. "We are going to have some toasts," he said. "Ladies and gentlemen - His Majesty the King!" We raised our glasses, repeated the words and sat down. Then we had one more toast that, according to tradition, must have been drunk in thousands of places on this Day of Remembrance by these island people: "Ladies and gentlemen, here's to our wives and sweethearts, to absent friends and to ships upon the sea"

The English people do not exchange so many Christmas cards so promiscuously as we in America do. Their exchanges are largely between friends and do not generally include mere acquaintances. Their Christmas cards do not seem to be used much as political and commercial reminders. The cards have Christmas tones, the jazz quality being almost altogether absent. Every home puts its Christmas cards up on mantelpieces, book-cases, tables, shelves, so that they make a bright and varied display.

On the afternoon of Christmas Eve I went to hear the carols in King's College Chapel, the singing of them by the Chapel choir-boys being famous, through the radio, all over the British Commonwealth, of Nations. After I came back, the porter at the gate of my college asked me how I enjoyed them. "I always used to go and sit away back so that the singing would come to me through the long spaces", he said. Always, day and night, a man is on duty in the porter's lodge. Everybody must pass it going in or out of the college. I like to step in and pass words with the porters. They have a radio, and sometimes I pause to listen with them to the news and to beautiful music. They read as many newspapers as the dons and are as well-informed on public affairs. Frequently I see one reading a book between calls. However humble their work, they are as intelligent and informed as they are civil and kind-hearted.

One of them was telling me Christmas morning about the church bells in his native village of Grantchester. That afternoon I walked to it, two miles through fields and meadows along a macadamised walk that threads through half a dozen turnstiles. A Christmas will come when the bells of Grantchester church and the bells of all the churches in England will be ringing out peace. I am absolutely certain that for every part of the world, America included, the perpetuation of that peace depends on an Anglo-American alliance with other countries. What a decent world it could so easily be if public spokesmen, instead of stirring up the people to distrust and to shortsighted grasping, would allow the natural goodness in human hearts on both sides of the Atlantic to operate.

J. Frank Dobie's memoirs, 'A Texan In England' were published at the end of the war, when censorship had been lifted. He did not mention that the Christmas Eve carol service at King's College chapel had lacked the warmth and sparkle normally associated with it, for the stained glass had been removed from the windows for fear of bombing – but then he had never known what it had been like. [SCAN OF KINGS ACROSS ROOF TOPS SHOWING BOARDED-UP WINDOW]

Christmas 1943 had topped all others in the difficulties which had to be surmounted to make it 'merry'. The search for the Christmas dinner in the first place had been like the pursuit of a will-o-the-wisp, for never had the turkey - or even the humble goose, duck or chicken - been such a rare bird. Many householders sat down to an ordinary joint of beef or mutton, or possibly even a tin of Spam. Meanwhile nuts, crystallised fruits, tangerines, dates, figs and all the other tempting extras remained merely a tender memory. Shopping had been little short of a nightmare, what with an acute shortages of supplies, depleted staffs (still further attenuated by the ravages of flu) and the problems of smuggling presents home when no wrapping paper was allowed. It had indeed been a case of 'he who hesitates is lost' for unless one gabbled a likely gift at first sight it was ten to one it would have vanished a second or so later! Memories 31st December 2003, by Mike Petty Eileen Bourne from Coveney writes to say that her father, Frank Cook, having finally been banned from the potato harvester at the age of 84 by his wife, has spent this autumn making jottings of his early farming life in Over. She has sent an extract relating to his earliest experiences of agriculture.

Frank recalls:

I was born in Over on the 25th July 1919. On one occasion I had been with my father to the evening service at the Methodist Chapel and as we came out Mr Oliver Dring, a local farmer, joined us and we walked together slowly, as village people do after an evening service. For a while they discussed the service and then 'Ollie' asked my father 'How old is your boy now, Charlie?' Father replied 'He's just had his seventh birthday'. 'What I was thinking', said Ollie, 'whether he'd be man enough to bring my cows home in the afternoon; it would save me a lot of time while we are at harvest work. They wouldn't be any trouble, all he had to do was open the field gate; the cows will be waiting to come home for milking and then walk behind them until they get to our yard and close the gate behind them. I'll come round tomorrow at four o'clock to show him what to do'

Our cottage where we lived was built in the corner of the fields where the cows grazed & so it seemed a very simple task. I had been about with my father since I was three years old; he was a stockman and I was not at all frightened of the animals and so it was agreed.

So at four o'clock on the Monday afternoon I went to the gate and Ollie was there and we did the job together; Ollie said there was no problem, the cows knew where they were going, and that they did. For the rest of the week – six days (strictly no harvesting on Sunday in those days) – I did the job alone and got on well. On Saturday afternoon Lucy, Ollie's sister, met me at the farm gate with my wages, a silver threepenny bit. I felt like a millionaire, I'd never seen so much money.

But nothing in farming is quite so simple as it at first seems. All was going well until we got to the middle of the second week. I'd got the cattle along as far as Chapman's Allotment when I heard this strange noise coming away from the church and up the hill behind me. It was a motor car, something we rarely saw in our villages in those days.

I was immediately frightened, wondering if the noise would make the cows bolt and where they would run to. (I did not know that cows, unlike horses, are not afraid of noise). Anyway as the car approached the cattle seemed quite unaffected, walking in their usual manner along the verge on the left-hand side of the road in single file, as they did every day. But then when the car got about 20 yards away from us the youngest cow of the bunch decided to cross the road to the other side.

Now we were in real trouble. The driver of the open-topped car stood upright and, leaning back pulled hard with both hands on the steering wheel, shouted 'Whoa! Whoa! Whoa!' Well no doubt he had been used to a different form of transport. But whether or not the cow knew the language she certainly obeyed and stopped plumb across the middle of the road. The next thing was this huge bang, glass flew everywhere and the cow ended up straddled across the bonnet with all its four legs flailing the air, trying to get something solid to step on to help her off.

Well the driver got out and he was very cross. I thought he was going to hit me; he was shouting 'Look at my new motor; I only got it yesterday'. Fortunately a man from the village came by on his bicycle and stopped and helped the driver push the cow off the car. He explained to him about the owner of the cows and where he lived.

I cannot remember what happened after that; whether I took the cows the rest of the way home that day or not; I can only remember being very worried on thinking about what Ollie would say and what my father would say. I felt that I had let them both down and it was my entire fault. I have no idea who it was settled between the car owner and the farmer.

Both father and Ollie, being two kindly souls, told me that I was not to blame, but they thought it best if I did not continue with the job until I got a bit older. And so for the first time in my 75 years of farming I got the sack. I never got another job then until my ninth birthday – but that's a different story. Another fen countryman, Cyril Heaps from Pymoor, near Little Downham, has also been setting down his memories, this time in booklet form. He too recalls the Methodist church, his schooldays & his life in agriculture. He gives a most valuable description in a fenland style of speech of the various processes such as preparing seedbeds, planting and picking potatoes and hoeing sugar beet as seen by someone used to doing the job.

“Potato harvest is drawing near; when that did arrive the small-holders would have two or three women come along to help with the picking of the potatoes. As they picked the potatoes they would have to put them into Hessian sacks, which would have to be carted up after the women left off at half past two. The potatoes would be carted to the end of the field and put into a clamp which would be about nine foot wide and about four foot high, this would then have to be strawed down. In those days the straw would be loose, no bunches so the men would Yelm out the straw with a fork, patting the straw against their legs until it was big enough to pick up and put on the clamp. After that was done the clamp would have to be dotted, that is a spade full of earth would be thrown on the clamp to stop the wind from blowing the straw off. This had to be done before you could go home, and believe me it was very hard work.” [SCAN OF POTATO PICKING AT DODDINGTON]

Cyril also recalls several of the old fen characters like Neal Thompson of Oxloade

“This tale that I am about to tell is true because I saw it with my own eyes: Neal kept chickens, as did everyone in those days. They were free-range and his hens would scratch his peas and seeds up. So he came up with an idea to stop them: what did he do? He tied old bits of sacking and old socks around their feet which was OK while it was dry, but you should have seen his chickens when it was wet their feet were bunged up with mud they could hardly walk.

“One day I needed a lift home from Ely on market day so I cadged a lift home with Neal. Now you have got to realise this would be in the middle forties, not much traffic and of course no MOTs. His old box type Ford would not turn a sharp turn to the right so when we got to the end of Egremont Street and Downham Road he stopped and asked me to get out and kick the front wheels to the right. And again at the top of Mill Hill to turn to Pymoor we had to get out and kick the wheels again. It's a wonder that I am here to tell you all these tales.” [SCAN OF PYMOOR WINDMILL 1930S]

Cyril Heaps' account of 'Fifty years of the Methodist Chapel and My life in the fens' costs £4 from 01353 699624.

Another man who understands the hard life in that part of the fen is John Casbon from Ely who has send me some photographs of excavating one of the giant 'bog oaks' found buried in the black peat on Mr R.C. 'From punt to plough'. In this he details the history of drainage from wind to the latest electric pumps, including the story of the proposed Wash barrage and examines the modern problems facing agriculture in an area where the once-rich topsoil is disappearing at an alarming rate. Wildlife, fishing and fowling are an important part of the story of the area though he warns that the eels that gave the Isle of Ely its name may soon become an endangered species, perhaps because of the restrictions by pumps and sluices of their passage up the fenland drains. Rex devotes several pages to the Shire Horses which were once so much a part of the fenland agricultural scene, benefiting from the rich grazing along river banks. Memories 2004 in one sequence

Eileen Bourne from Coveney writes to say that her father, Frank Cook, having finally been banned from the potato harvester at the age of 84 by his wife, has spent this autumn making jottings of his early farming life in Over. She has sent an extract relating to his earliest experiences of agriculture.

Frank recalls: "I was born in Over on the July 25, 1919. On one occasion I had been with my father to the evening service at the Methodist Chapel and as we came out Mr Oliver Dring, a local farmer, joined us and we walked together slowly, as village people do after an evening service. For a while they discussed the service and then "Ollie" asked my father: 'How old is your boy now, Charlie?' Father replied: 'He's just had his seventh birthday' 'What I was thinking,' said Ollie, 'Was whether he'd be man enough to bring my cows home in the afternoon; it would save me a lot of time while we are at harvest work. They wouldn't be any trouble, all he had to do was open the field gate; the cows will be waiting to come home for milking and then walk behind them until they get to our yard and close the gate behind them. I'll come round tomorrow at four o'clock to show him what to do.'

"Our cottage where we lived was built in the corner of the fields where the cows grazed and so it seemed a very simple task. I had been about with my father since I was three years old; he was a stockman and I was not at all frightened of the animals and so it was agreed.

"So at four o'clock on the Monday afternoon I went to the gate and Ollie was there and we did the job together; Ollie said there was no problem, the cows knew where they were going, and that they did. For the rest of the week - six days (strictly no harvesting on Sunday in those days) - I did the job alone and got on well. On Saturday afternoon Lucy, Ollie's sister, met me at the farm gate with my wages, a silver threepenny bit. I felt like a millionaire, I'd never seen so much money.

"But nothing in farming is quite so simple as it at first seems. All was going well until we got to the middle of the second week. I'd got the cattle along as far as Chapman's Allotment when I heard this strange noise coming away from the church and up the hill behind me. It was a motor car, something we rarely saw in our villages in those days.

"I was immediately frightened, wondering if the noise would make the cows bolt and where they would run to. (I did not know that cows, unlike horses, are not afraid of noise.) Anyway, as the car approached, the cattle seemed quite unaffected, walking in their usual manner along the verge on the left-hand side of the road in single file, as they did every day. But then when the car got about 20 yards away from us the youngest cow of the bunch decided to cross the road to the other side.

"Now we were in real trouble. The driver of the open-topped car stood upright and, leaning back pulled hard with both hands on the steering wheel, shouted: 'Whoa! Whoa! Whoa!' Well no doubt he had been used to a different form of transport.

"But whether or not the cow knew the language she certainly obeyed and stopped plumb across the middle of the road. The next thing was this huge bang, glass flew everywhere and the cow ended up straddled across the bonnet with all its four legs flailing the air, trying to get something solid to step on to help her off.

"Well the driver got out and he was very cross. I thought he was going to hit me; he was shouting: 'Look at my new motor; I only got it yesterday'

"Fortunately a man from the village came by on his bicycle and stopped and helped the driver push the cow off the car. He explained to him about the owner of the cows and where he lived.

"I cannot remember what happened after that; whether I took the cows the rest of the way home that day or not; I can only remember being very worried on thinking about what Ollie would say and what my father would say.

"I felt that I had let them both down and it was my entire fault. I have no idea how it was settled between the car owner and the farmer

"Both father and Ollie, being two kindly souls, told me that I was not to blame but thought it best if I did not continue with the job until I got a bit older. And so for the first time in my 75 years of farming I got the sack. I never got another job then until my ninth birthday – but that that's a different story."

Another fen countryman, Cyril Heaps from Pymoor, near Little Downham, has also been setting down his memories, this time in booklet form. He too recalls the Methodist church, his schooldays and his life in agriculture. He gives a most valuable description in a fenland style of speech of the various processes such as preparing seedbeds, planting and picking potatoes and hoeing sugar beet as seen by someone used to doing the job.

"Potato harvest is drawing near; when that did arrive the small-holders would have two or three women come along to help with the picking of the potatoes. As they picked the potatoes they would have to put them into hessian sacks, which would have to be carted up after the women left off at half past two. The potatoes would be carted to the end of the field and put into a clamp which would be about nine foot wide and about four foot high, this would then have to be strawed down.

"In those days the straw would be loose, no bunches, so the men would yelm out the straw with a fork, patting the straw against their legs until it was big enough to pick up and put on the clamp. After that was done the clamp would have to be dotted, that is a spade full of earth would be thrown on the clamp to stop the wind from blowing the straw off. This had to be done before you could go home, and believe me it was very hard work."

Cyril also recalls several of the old fen characters, such as Neal Thompson of Oxloode.

"This tale that I am about to tell is true because I saw it with my own eyes: Neal kept chickens, as did everyone in those days. They were free-range and his hens would scratch his peas and seeds up. So he came up with an idea to stop them: what did he do? He tied old bits of sacking and old socks around their feet which was OK while it was dry, but you should have seen his chickens when it was wet. Their feet were bunged up with mud, they could hardly walk.

"One day I needed a lift home from Ely on market day so I cadged a lift home with Neal. Now you have got to realise this would be in the middle forties, not much traffic and of course no MoTs. His old box type Ford would not turn a sharp turn to the right so when we got to the end of Egremont Street and Downham Road he stopped and asked me to get out and kick the front wheels to the right. And again at the top of Mill Hill to turn to Pymoor we had to get out and kick the wheels again. It's a wonder that I am here to tell you all these tales."

Memories 14th January 2004, by Mike Petty

Twenty-five years ago Cambridge's traffic problems were eased with the completion of a major new road. Discussions had started back in 1961 but progressed slowly with a 72-day inquiry into the route in 1972, the longest & most involved inquiry ever then seen into a road scheme. It had been approved in 1973 and work started in July 1976. Giant machines had cut swathes through the countryside as for 28 months Bovis Civil Engineers constructed 24 new bridges, including one over the River Cam that had utilised a giant crane, the largest in Europe. [SCAN OF NEW ROAD BEING CUT AT GIRTON]

Finally the Northern Bypass, described as a 'Christmas present to Cambridge' was officially opened at noon on 21st December 1978. But after the opening celebrities, including an Under-Secretary from the Department of the Environment, had made their initial procession along the nine-mile route it was immediately closed again.

Police had reservations about the state of the road: white lines were still being painted, safety barriers had not been installed, the Girton interchange was not finished while that at Madingley could not be completed for some months more.

But then the spirit of Christmas seemed to take over and as dusk was falling the barriers were quietly pushed back and it was opened to the public. It included one of the longest straight stretches of dual carriageway in the country, but rural drivers were not used to such an expanse of open road where speed would build up quickly so police appealed to them to get used to the road slowly.

One who took their advice was News reporter John Alexander who chose a Sunday morning for his first expedition along the new road, so he could dawdle and get a good look. But who would want to see Cambridge from this perspective, it had exposed the city's none-too-glorious backsides like Milton sewage works, the wrong end of the Arbury estate and a few dumping grounds that previously had been hidden from view.

This is his report:

"For the local travelling along this stretch of dual carriageway is a new and rather bewildering experience. Coming at everything from an unfamiliar angle creates an impression that north Cambridgeshire as I knew it has been wiped off the map. The reality is increased by the eerie quietness of the road – I met only half-a-dozen cars – stark banks of recently-moved earth and flyovers that seem to wander off into bigger and deeper piles of soil or simply disappear into the middle of a field.

"For a mile or two after picking up the new road at Quy, it was possible to retain a sense of direction. There on the left was Marshall's airport, and that must be the gasworks, and the houses which line the Newmarket Road. The first signposts help to keep one's mental compass under control. But from the wheel of a car it is difficult to visualise that the chunk of concrete overhead is supporting a familiar country lane between Fen Ditton and Horningsea.

"The next small intersection appears on the horizon before one has mentally decided what comes next. But of course, it's the A10 and somewhere around is Milton ... now is it on the right or left? The sewage works comes to the rescue, alerting two senses that of sight and smell. What a view of the plant! Just think its all happening down there and for years we've been denied this panoramic view.

"Surely Cambridge must be somewhere over there. But it seems so far away that without risking a nose-dive over the embankment I can't pick out the spires of King's. What is that collection of unsightly buildings. A factory? No Cambridge doesn't have factories on that scale. A comprehensive school? No, too big. It's the Arbury estate seen from an angle so far reserved for beasts of the fields, the odd farmer and a few glider pilots.

"Suppressing a bitter thought about today's architectural skills I press on, thoroughly confident that my next view will be of Girton. Disappointment. Girton looks like any other small village from this angle and again one has to rely on the batch of overhead intersections and their accompanying signs to act as identification marks.

"Ahead is a hill, perhaps created by those incredible earth-moving contraptions with wheels as big as bread vans. I note that my Cortina takes the gradient without the help of another gear and then pick up another view: it is the American cemetery at Madingley and there is something majestic and orderly about this well kept memorial on the gentle slopes leading up to the old A45."

But it was in Cambridge itself that the real benefit of the new road was to be seen. There was an immediate easing of the pressure as vehicles that had previously queued their way along Northampton Street to the traffic lights at Castle Street, round Mitcham's Corner, over Victoria or Elizabeth Bridge (opened eight years earlier) and along Newmarket Road, now found an empty highway. When the interchange at Girton was fully open and the Western Bypass - M11- completed Cambridge would have a road system surrounding it for which many other cities would give their eye-teeth.

Peace would descend forever. Or would it? By 1986 traffic flow within the city had reached the 1978 pre-bypass level. But the number of Heavy Goods Vehicles remained only half of the old numbers. Whatever the pressure on the Northern Bypass the prospect of a Cambridge without it seems as incredible today as the new road itself did just 25 years ago. Memories 21st January 2004, by Mike Petty

It seems that cinemas are coming back into popularity, with the news that the town centre Cineplex in Huntingdon is set to reopen. Formerly known as the Cromwell it closed at the end of December due to competition from multi-screen operators.

These large complexes have also had an impact on the Cambridge cinema scene, replacing the more historic movie houses where for generations people went to be entertained or to just while away time in the dark.

The cinema first came to Cambridge as part of Tudor's circus in October 1896 and shortly afterwards films were projected in the Guildhall and the Corn Exchange. The first regular shows were held in the YMCA lecture hall whilst the Sturton Town Hall and the Roller Skating Rink were amongst the early venues. But the first purpose-built building was the Playhouse, which opened in Mill Road in 1913. As developments continued first one cinema then another was erected and rebuilt.

In Cambridge building reached its height with the opening of a new Victoria Cinema on Market Hill in September 1931, replacing an earlier cinema nearer Petty Cury. In November 1952 they tried something new – the three-dimensional film which required a special screen and the audience wore tinted spectacles. New and modern projectors came in 1967, a second screen in 1972; it recovered from a fire in 1983 but it was sold in 1985 to be replaced by a new Marks and Spencer store, though the façade remains as a reminder of one of Cambridge's premier entertainment spots. Who now remembers the others – the Tivoli, Kinema, Central, Cosmopolitan, Rex or Regal?

But you did not have to come to the towns to see films as many villages were served by travelling cinemas. Thurston's the fair people took their Electric Vaudeville to Soham and perhaps this is what prompted 'Nick Knack' Taylor to convert his coach builders workshop into a permanent cinema there in about 1912. It was one of four cinemas to function there at one time or another.

At Burwell the Gardiner Memorial Hall was used for film shows soon after the Great War, its popularity waning when the Doric opened at Newmarket in 1937. At the time it was reputed to have the biggest balcony in East Anglia, outrivalling the older Kingsway and Victoria cinemas which also stood in High Street. At Haverhill cinema goers flocked to the Electric Empire in High Street, later renamed the Playhouse

Ely's first film shows were held in the Public Rooms although the Electric Cinema in Market Street opened about 1912, to be followed by the Majestic in Newnham Street and in 1929 by the Rex.

Littleport filmgoers could choose from the Electric Cinema, (later renamed the Cinema Theatre and The Empire) which was established in the Public Hall in 1913, or the Regal which opened just before the Second World War and was damaged by incendiaries in October 1940 (ironically when showing the film 'On the night of the fire')

Early cinemas had little of the latter-day comforts; sometimes as at Soham they had rough walls, a corrugated iron roof, the floor was just earth, the seats wooden benches. The only heating was a small coke stove, the projector was operated by gaslight. The films often went astray and if they did arrive had to be operated by hand and would frequently break - causing the audience to whistle, cat-call and stamp their feet.

But despite it all people came to see cowboys and Indians, Harold Lloyd, the Keystone cops and the rest together with the serial such as the Adventures of Pearl White which each week left the heroine in another impossible situation from which she could surely not escape.

The films in those early days were silent - but the cinemas were not. First there was the musical accompaniment which varied from a single piano - as at Soham - to the eight-piece orchestra at the Central Cinema Cambridge. Then there would be the sound effects - cocoa-nut shells for horses hooves and a drum to represent canon fire in the popular newsreels about life in the King's army.

The deaf were at no disadvantage in the silent movie days as many of them could lip-read and were better informed than the rest of the audience. This had its drawbacks and one party of deaf and dumb children were quickly ushered out of the Playhouse in Mill Road when their teachers realised that they could understand too well just what the shell-shocked victims of the Battle of the Somme were silently mouthing. And then there would be those who could hear but not read very well and would insist on repeating the sub-titles very loudly to the great annoyance of the rest of the audience.

The Talkies arrived at the Central Cinema Cambridge in August 1929 with the musical 'Broadway Melody'. Some thought it just a novelty that would soon wear off and while most agreed that the music was very pleasant they deplored the all-dominant American accents.

Not that all films were American. In June 1927 the News previewed an undergraduate film entitled "Grit", believed to be the first serious attempt in an English University to obtain experience in the technique of film production. Its storyline featured the stroke of a college crew being kidnapped to prevent his boat winning the Bumps and it contained some good views of Cambridge streets and colleges. Then in December 1928 there was a report of a new 'talkie' film in course of preparation which featured almost every aspect of undergraduate life. The director was an old Cambridge man who had persuaded the authorities to allow him to film the interiors of some of their 'most sacred institutions'. Certain 'dons' whose names were household words would describe the characteristics of some of the fine old buildings while in one scene the star part was to be played by a popular University hairdresser whose saloon and waiting clients provide the setting. But does anybody know has become of these pioneering films?

Other long-lost Cambridge films have recently been reissued on video by the East Anglian Film Archive. One, entitled "Horse Sense", was filmed in Technicolor by the Cambridge Accident Prevention Council; it was directed by Mr K.O. King with a script written by the Chief Constable, B.N. Bebbington being narrated by the BBC's John Snagge. It dealt with the adventures of a horse called Patch that escapes from its stable in Barton Road and wanders about the streets of Cambridge. Last year this and the even more enchanting "Wise and otherwise" with its views of motoring hazards in 1950s Cambridge was released on video by the East Anglian Film Archive and is once more enchanting viewers, though now on the small screen.

Now this tradition of home-grown filming is once more being revived by media students at the Cambridge Long Road Sixth Form College and there is no need to travel into town to see it. For with all the new technology at their fingertips their work can be seen on a computer screen near you just by logging in to their website – www.longroadmedia.com

It has indeed been a long road from the first flickering moving images to the most up-to-date digital imaging but if you have memories of any of it then please do share them.

Memories 28th January 2004, by Mike Petty

Once more the forecasters are predicting snow, but will it actually arrive?

Surprisingly it is not unusual to have snow at this time of year, as a glance through the back issues of the News will show. It is just a case of when & how much.

Thus in 1895 a great frost lasted from January to March, unbroken except for very brief thaws. From January 18th to 25th there were snowstorms, floods & north-west gales. Frosts of 15 to 20 degrees turned hundreds of acres of flooded land into skating rinks and for two months it was possible to skate from Cambridge to Grantchester or Ely. Entrepreneurs flooded three fields at Newnham and installed electric lights which encouraged skaters to flock there in the evenings and there were ice carnivals & skating races on river from Bottisham Lock to Ely

Then in 1927 snow began Christmas day & led to most complete stoppage of road & rail traffic since coming of motor car. Dorothy Grainger went out with her camera to capture photographs of deep snowdrifts around Burwell. Two years later the freeze came in mid February when the Cam froze and people took the opportunity to skate to Ely, the first time since 1895.

In early 1947 the snow seemed as if it would never stop; cars were abandoned as snow reached up to touch telegraph wires. All roads to Ely were impassable as drifts piled ten and twelve feet high bringing road traffic to a standstill. In another incident bus passengers were stranded when their vehicle ran into a five feet high drift on the Harston-Fowlmere road but a 'Clippie' accompanied them as they walked waist-high through the snow to another bus. Villages cut off by snow included Elsworth and Knapwell. "Neither the mail nor the papers have arrived to-day" an Elsworth resident told a reporter. "There are waist-high drifts in the village. The children are having a forced holiday". At Ely children rejoiced in freedom from school and indulged in tobogganing, snowball fights and snowmen. When the thaw finally came it came quickly and melting snow, further diluted with heavy rains, caused extensive flooding

On February 1st 1954 Cambridge recorded the coldest spell for seven years, parts of the river Cam were frozen over and water stopped coming out of the taps. The severe weather caused all previous output records to be broken at the Cambridge Gas Works as people struggled to keep warm. Then in February 1958 the snow was even worse and once more the roads were blocked.

It was to be a situation repeated in January 1962 but the great freeze of 1963 was one of the most severe ever. By early January seven-foot deep snowdrifts blocked Cambridgeshire's roads, Cambridge's water mains had frozen and so had the river. Cambridge itself was cut off for the first time in living memory, as were many villages. The city's police station became a hotel for people unable to get back to their rural homes. Bus services ground to a halt as diesel froze. Skaters turned out in their hundreds to explore the Backs and the commons. Others took their bicycles on to the river, secure in the knowledge that the ice was so thick it would easily bear their weight. The bitter conditions continued right through January and February and the Lent bumps had to be cancelled for only the second time in 136 years. It was in that winter that the Pools Panel was created, a panel of experts whose task was to decide the results of football matches if bad weather led to 25 or more games in the League programme being axed. Around Newmarket, the ground was covered in snow for an unbelievable 66 days. On the east coast, it was so cold the sea froze.

One of my worst memories of snow was on the evening of 7th February 1969 when I was working the nine o'clock late shift at Cambridge Reference Library in Wheeler Street. The old library was nothing like as superheated as the present Lion Yard and the staff desk near the window was always draughty. But this night a blizzard caused havoc, trapping scores in Cambridge. Fortunately our few readers managed to get out of the building and my own journey north along the A10 was one to be taken with care.

In mid January 1977 heavy snow hit Cambridge as the worst weather for 14 years caused nationwide chaos and led to widescale disruption on the roads and railways. In many places there were snowfalls of more than one foot. Thousands of people were late for work as hard-packed snow, freezing fog and black ice made driving treacherous. Many trains were late or cancelled despite an all-night fight against the Arctic conditions by British Rail who called in their full cold weather emergency procedures.

Two years later in January 1979 the Botanic Garden recorded 4½ [FOUR AND A HALF] inches of snow – the biggest fall since 1963. The situation was compounded by a strike of municipal workers. Ungritted icy roads produced a nightmare tangle of cars and lorries which choked all main roads into the city for up to three hours in the worst traffic chaos for decades. Dozens of car drivers abandoned their vehicles and walked into work and thousands of schoolchildren waited in vain for buses which failed to get further than the road outside the bus depot. The traffic only began to move again when council workers broke picket lines outside the Mill Road depot and brought gritting lorries back into action..

THEN LAST YEAR HUNDREDS OF PEOPLE WERE TRAPPED IN THEIR CARS ON MOTORWAYS ALL NIGHT AS LORRIES JACKKNIFED ON ROADS THAT HAD TURNED TREACHEROUS BEFORE THE GRITTING LORRIES HAD GOT TO THEM.
[PLEASE TOP AND TAIL THIS PARA]

Now the weathermen have once more issued their forecasts and we wait to see whether they are accurate. But we are assured the lessons have been learned, there will be no traffic chaos this time; you will receive your copy of the News – and so you can write with your own memories of snowtime

Several readers have been quick to help with Alan Wyatt's mystery picture of a group of gardeners outside a large Cambridge house. Christopher Keate e-mails to say that he and his colleague David Cannons of Hardwick identify it as Trinity Hall's Wychfield site on Storeys Way. The house in the background still stands in its beautiful grounds as Julie Powley, the college's Graduate Office confirms. Graham Pollard and Lorenzo Banyard agree while Alan Payne believes it shows men levelling an allotment for a future playing field on the site. The picture is particularly interesting to Catharine Wilson who would like to include it in a book on the college. [SCAN OF GARDENERS].

Mrs Lorenza Smith writes from Cambridge: "Long time ago I spoke to a lady telling her I had a photo of a class of children including my husband taken around 1920-23 in a school situated in the area around Bourn - Caldecote. My husband is the little one on the lap of the teacher. I went to the information officer in the library and someone gave me a few details about the school. I went after that back to my country, Italy, and travelled to and fro. My husband became ill and everything was left on the shelf. My researchers were very elementary, you certainly can do much better. Most probably somebody will still be able to remember." Lorenza over-estimates my knowledge as I can't place the building, but I'm sure somebody will help. [SCAN OF SCHOOL GROUP]

Memories 4th February 2004, by Mike Petty –

The news that prices for sugar beet could be drastically cut under new proposals being considered by the European Commission has worried local farmers. But it has happened before; in 1931 Sir Fred Hiam resigned from the board of the Ely Beet Factory in protest against the prices offered to farmers by its owners, the Anglo-Dutch group of companies. Then the Prime Minister stepped in with a special advance in the subsidy to the beet industry for one year only on condition that the factories offered farmers a firm price and agreement was reached.

The growth of the sugar beet industry owes much to Cambridge University Department of Agriculture whose experiments established that the crop could be exploited commercially. A processing factory was built in Norfolk in 1912 and after initial difficulties had been overcome others were constructed elsewhere

One of the first was at Ely where the new factory was officially opened by the Minister of Agriculture in October 1925. Amongst those not present were the Bishop of Ely, Winston Churchill and Prime Minister Stanley Baldwin, but they all wrote expressing their disappointment at missing the event. For this marked an important milestone in the development both of agriculture in the country and the community at a time of depression

Already the factory had made a major impact on the local economy with more than two acres of buildings were constructed on the 66 acre site. The massive project had employed nearly 1,000 men and the wages bill alone had amounted to £100,000. It had not been a trouble-free job with a number of carpenters striking after some had been working as many as 100 hours per week. But they didn't mind this – the problem was that health officials, concerned that such a lengthy period of employment was detrimental to the men's health, had decided to limit the maximum number of hours to 56 and employ more men. [SCAN OF FACTORY SHOWING CARS – POSSIBLY AT OPENING?]

But this increased employment was not an unmixed blessing. The casual ward at Ely workhouse became full up with Beet Sugar Factory employees who should really be staying in lodging houses, leaving the workhouse for destitute people. Guardians agonised: if they filled the casual wards with people with money what were they going to do with the poor chaps who really were down and out? But who could say who was who - some of the workers concealed what money they had.

Once the factory was up and running it would employ about 500 men, providing comparatively well-paid work for local people at a time of hardship. But it also attracted vagrants from around the country who heard that there were jobs to be had. As they tramped to Ely they stopped at Cambridge and Chesterton workhouses en route, adding to the accommodation problems there. And by the time they arrived all jobs had been taken, meaning there were more destitute people in the fens with nowhere for them to stay and nothing to do, but cause mischief.

The new factory had a riverside frontage with unloading berths provided for 30 factory-owned barges that would collect the beet from riverside fields and be towed by tug to the quayside where electric overhead cranes would empty them. [SCAN OF BARGES]

But this caused problems: farmers erected a number of shoots on the banks of the Ten Mile River and the Wissey for loading sugar beet into the barges. In so doing they weakened the banks, adding to the flood problems. Then when the beet was loaded on to barges an amount of mud fell into the rivers clogging them up. This problem was not confined to fen fields: by December 1928 so much mud and refuse from Ely Sugar Beet Factory was clogging up the river that tugs could not get through even with no boats in tow, except on a channel ploughed day after day. The water was being held up towards Cambridge causing a serious danger of flooding while the whole of the river between Ely and Denver Sluice had a thin coating of slime all over it and was the consistency of a mud-pie.

The factory also had its own railway sidings; Derek Harris from Histon recalled his memories of Ely station goods yard: "The busiest period was autumn when the Sugar Beet Factory at Adelaide opened for the campaign. This embraced the transport of sugar beet and its product of sugar, molasses and pulp, well known to farmers as animal feed. Dried pulp, known as pulp nuts, was bagged and sent away in covered vans, the wet pulp dispatched in open trucks. To 'feed' the factory, coal from the mines came on a regular basis on local trains from Whitemoor yard to Ely and 'tripped' to the North Junction. During the campaign, a BR pilot engine and a foreman shunter, transferred the loaded and empty vehicles to & from the factory private sidings. The beet factory employed two industrial steam loco's with a foreman and shunter to finally place the coal and return the empties to BR."

But a challenge to both rail and river came by road and soon most of the deliveries of beet to the factory were being made by lorries. As early as 1926 this was causing traffic problems, especially along Bray's Lane, Ely which was being used as short cut to the Beet Sugar Factory. As the years went by so more and more lorries were heading through Queen Adelaide, providing work for haulage contractors who frequently found themselves held up by the numerous railway crossings along that stretch of road and causing problems to residents who complained of noise and congestion. [SCAN OF LORRIES LOADED WITH BEET, SCAN OF RESIDENTS PROTESTS 1979]

The new sugar beet crop involved considerable labour with the onerous task of hand singling being undertaken in spring, while hand-hoeing providing back-breaking work for itinerant gangs during the early summer before the roots were lifted and trimmed by hand in autumn. It was a process suitable for mechanisation & in October 1925 a crowd of 500 farmers watched a demonstration of sugar beet lifters at the College Farm, Duxford. Mechanisation was something to be continued throughout the following years with Standen's of Ely developing a new beet harvester which they demonstrated near Ely in September 1964 [SCAN OF STANDENS DEMONSTRATION 1964]

However well equipped the farmer might be he was always dependent on the weather; a hot dry season would produce small roots but with a higher proportion of sugar than in the larger beet of a wet year. As the crop became established so the 50,000 tons of the first campaign grew more than fivefold in 25 years. During the campaign season, from September to January the factory worked round-the-clock, seven days a week, extracting and refining the sugar for domestic and industrial use. The green tops of the beet were fed to livestock or ploughed back into the soil, the beet-pulp made into high-energy animal feed while the soil washed from the beet was no longer discharged into the river but sold.

One by-product that was less appreciated was the decided pong from the factory that permeated the surrounding area. When this mingled with the whiff from Ely brewery, the reek from the sewage works and the dank river smell it made conditions along Ely's Waterside less than pleasant.

Now the Ely beet factory is just a memory and farmers are concerned that the crop itself may pass into history.

Vernon Place e-mails to add further details to an illustration of a skating match at Littleport that I featured in Memories last week. The race was for the championship of Great Britain in 1890 when J. Smart on the left won and later became Champion of the World. His opponent that day was Tommy Wells of 'Windy Hall', Isleham Fen, one of a family of accomplished skaters. [SCAN OF SKATING]

B.J. Darby from Bedford has just seen Memories for 7th January where there was a picture of Pymoor windmill in the 1930s. He tells me that windmill was built by his grandfather, George Darby, and operated by him and his son until the war. He's not seen a photo with the sails in the position shown in my view, one of those collected by the Cambridge Antiquarian Society for their Photographic Record in the 1930s. [SCAN OF PYMOOR MILL]

Mark Greenhow has e-mailed from Cambourne to say that he has become very interested in the wartime airfields and particularly the Short Sebros works on Madingley Road, Cambridge. Despite living in the area all his life he had never seen any photographs of this major company's existence in the city where, he believes, Stirling bombers were built and then transported to Bourn for assembly. The two plants employed 4,500 people between them – were you one of them, or do you have any photographs or memories that will add further to the story of this important part of the war effort.

George (Cherry) Palmer, from Cherry Hinton has lent me some photographs of the old St George's School in East Road, in what was once one of the roughest areas of Cambridge. But bullying was never heard of and the school under people such as Headmaster F. Dawson and teachers W.P. Kingdon & C. Duckering had a policy of stimulating and encouraging its pupils. Sport was part of that ethos and its footballers achieved remarkable success, forming the backbone of a Cambridge Schoolboys team that Cherry captained during a remarkable run in the All England Schools Shield competition before bowing out to the lads of West Ham in front of a crowd of 8,000 at Grange Road in 1934. [SCAN OF TEAM AND CROWDS]. Mr Duckering compiled a remarkable photographic record of the school, which closed in 1936, and his negatives are deposited in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library

Alf Peacock didn't have a funeral with a vicar and such, he didn't believe in such things. Instead the gathering of fiends and colleagues at York crematorium paid their own tributes to a man who dedicated his life to improving adult education and played him out with the rousing music he loved.

Dr Peacock was born on 30 May 1929 in Histon; it was a general election day, and his mother considered naming him Briscoe after one of the candidates, instead he became Alfred James.

Like many other lads he'd listened in the 1940s to the sounds of the dance bands coming through the wireless set, as he recalled: "Before the war I had seen Roy Fox at the Theatre Cinema in Cambridge and during the war the dance band addict was well catered for. By this time I was a member of the Cambridge Rhythm Club, the secretary of which was an ample lady called Beryl Bryden. It met in a room over Miller's music shop and we listened to record recitals and local musicians. Then, suddenly, the Yanks arrived and our Rhythm Club swung splendidly for the rest of the war. With the coming of the Americans also came the American Forces Radio Network and this regularly carried jazz programmes. Each morning one programme would finish with Tony Pastor playing The Blues with Artie Shaw. I found it absolutely impossible to leave my home at 8, Orchard Road Histon until that programme ended at about 8.45. I then rode my bike those six or so miles to the Cambridge and County High School for Boys. I must have been late every day, but I cannot remember getting into trouble. One of the few teachers I liked at Hills Road was a delightful person called T.P.R. Laing - Tippy Laing. In the mid 1960s I wrote a book about East Anglian agricultural labourers called 'Bread or Blood', and somewhat later I obtained a doctorate from York University. Mr Laing read the book and then heard that the author had a PhD. He wrote to me incredulously. 'You are not the person who was in 5BG in 1945 are you', he asked. I knew this really meant 'You are not that lazy young sod from Histon who was threatened with expulsion in 1944 are you? He was amazed to have an affirmative answer - and made the best and most constructive criticisms of 'Bread or Blood' that I got."

Alf's study of the agrarian riots around Littleport in the early 1800s was hailed as a valuable piece of social history when it was published in 1965, five years after he had been appointed warden of the York Educational Settlement. Here he continued to live in a house increasing filled with a mass of recordings, tapes, paper and publications on a wide range of topics. Two in particular fascinated him: the history of the railway and the Great War. [CHOICE OF SCAN OF LITTLEPORT, SCAN OF HISTON RAILWAY STATION]

He edited a series of publications for the Western Front Association under the title 'Gun Fire', one of which entitled 'A Rendezvous with Death' was devoted to a remarkable series of letters from the Front by a Wilburton man, Oliver Hopkin. Ollie was just an ordinary lad, the son of an agricultural worker – like Alf himself – and when men were needed for the war he made his way to the Cambridge Corn Exchange to enlist. He wrote his first letter home from the Gog Magog Hills: 'Dear Father and Mother i now take the plesure in riteing you a few lines hoping it will find you all well as it leaves me at present'. This was a greeting he was to repeat in letter after letter from far less pleasant surroundings. In July 1916 he continued: 'i am sorry to tell you that i have been wounded ... there is not many of our Battalion left and i don't now nothing about the Wilburton Lads at all i got 4 bullet wounds ... i am pleased i am alive.' He recovered and went back to the front. But then in April 1917 the letters from Ollie stopped. The family got another, signed Sergt W. Gilmore. 'Sir, These photos & pocket wallet was found by one of my men in a dug-out. The man thinks they belong to the dead Corporal who was in the dug-out, therefore I am sending them to you'. [COLOUR SCANS OF A WWI SILK POSTCARD FROM FRANCE AND CARTOON OF TRENCH LIFE (NOT HOPKIN), SCAN OF WILBURTON SHOWING COWS AND THE VILLAGE SCHOOL IN BACKGROUND]

The family kept and treasured the letters that Alf transcribed, annotated and published back in 1986 – a booklet that is now virtually unobtainable. But then they were stolen. Now his friends and colleagues at York are faced with the task of ensuring that his other papers are preserved; his tape recordings of Great War soldiers are already deposited in the Churchill College Archive Centre, just a few miles from his former Histon home.

The loss of valuable papers has long been a problem for historians. Back in Victorian times Nathan Maynard from Whittlesford discovered masses of parish archives crumbling to dust in the church chest and preserved them for future generations by pasting them into scrapbooks. To these he added his own diaries, notes & jottings on village happenings, which were continued by his son. These were deposited in Saffron Walden Museum which had been the catalyst for Nathan's interest following a visit in 1835 and where he would end up as curator. Now they have been transferred to the County Record Office in Shire Hall Cambridge

When Tony Carter retired from lecturing at the 'Tech' – now Anglia Polytechnic University in East Road, Cambridge - he had more time to continue his own studies on a variety of topics. He had already made his mark in his adopted village of Whittlesford, as Parish Councillor, Charity Trustee and founder of the village Society and had already participated in the publication of their village newsletter and Silver Jubilee history. Now he turned his attention to the Maynard manuscripts. The resulting publication 'The anatomy of a Victorian village' was published a few weeks ago, just a year after Tony's death.

The initial impression is of a nicely-produced book enhanced by numerous original Victorian colour sketches of country life, brickmaking, tollgates, the village stocks, carpenters shop or school. But it is only when one starts to read it that one truly appreciates the amount of scholarship that has gone into the text. Through an analysis of the landscape, via inclosure, poverty, witchcraft and festivities to the story of the important characters and the ordinary working folk Tony has left few stones unturned. One can appreciate how Tony Carter's students felt both inspired and overwhelmed by his lectures – so rigorously researched and documented that they scarcely left any scope for them to find out new things for themselves, yet so stimulating that they had no option but to do so.

It is a model and inspiration for anybody interested in Victorian times and an essential addition to the bookshelves of anybody whose family has lived in the area. 'The anatomy of a Victorian village: Whittlesford 1800-1900' was edited by Tony Cartwright, Jack Sutcliffe and Pat Carter & obtainable from Jack Sutcliffe at 34 Maynards, Whittlesford CB2 4PT for £15 (including postage).[SCAN OF PHOTO OF WHITTLESFORD GUILDHALL, COLOUR SCAN OF PICTURE OF MAN IN STOCKS, FROM THE BOOK]

This week the News has carried the story of an historic visit to Iran by the Prince of Wales but in one of those co-incidences Iran was making headlines in Cambridge just 25 years ago. For on Saturday 10th February 1979 the CEN reported: “Two hundred Iranian students made Cambridge demonstration history when they knelt on Parker’s Piece, prayed and recited from the Koran. In what is thought to be the first political demonstration starting with a mass prayer ritual on improvised prayer mats covering the wet turf, the Muslims called upon Allah to bless the efforts of the Ayatollah Khomeini to establish a republic in Iran based on Koranic law. When the prayers were over – all said facing in the direction of Mecca – the students left for a march taking in King’s Parade and the Market Square, before returning to the Piece. No incident was reported although some confusion existed among Saturday shoppers, knowing it was the first day of Rag Week. Several asked demonstration marshals whether the event was associated with the Rag. But the slogans ‘ “Death to the Shah” and “Long live Khomeini” soon dispelled their doubts.” [TWO SCANS ARE IN THE LIVE PHOTO ARCHIVE UNDER ‘IRAN’]

Mr R.J. Course from Meldreth writes to help Walter Worland of Wokingham with his quest for information on the Green Man public house in Meldreth. He tells me it was situated on one corner of Brewery Lane and the High Street. The opposite corner was occupied by Jarman’s Brewery which doubtless owned the pub. Abbis Worland was almost certainly the last landlord before it became a public house; he died on 26th November 1893, aged 58. The brewery ceased to function about that time and the property was sold, including the adjoining Malting House which was the residence of the brewery manager. Prior to being a pub the Green Man was probably the village Guildhall; there is a dragon beam running diagonally across the ceiling of the main lower room and protruding through the outer wall.

Cherry Palmer from Cherry Hinton has phoned to tell me that he was not the captain of the successful Cambridge Schoolboys Football Team I mentioned last week; that honour fell to Alf Greenwood. Sorry to both.

John Lester from Grantchester has written to say he can help Mark Greenhow with information on the Sebro depot on Madingley Road during the Second World War. He used to work there and adds that they didn’t built Stirling bombers, only repaired them, as Sebro stood for Short Bros Repair Organization

Now the weather is becoming warmer so the memories of the wintry conditions that brought much of the county to a standstill just a few weeks ago have started to fade. It was nothing like so bad as 1963 as Audrey Glauert from Fulbourn recalls. She has lent me a picture showing skaters on the Backs which won first prize in a CDN competition for the best picture of the bitter conditions. It was taken on 15th January that year by her brother, Dr Richard Glauert of Trinity College [SCAN OF SKATING PICTURE TAKEN FROM CLARE COLLEGE BRIDGE]

Mr C. Free from Cottenham has observations about the latest traffic disruption caused by a few inches of snow. He recalls; “Before the last war most of the council transport was horses and ‘tip-up’ carts. A gritting crew consisted of two men, a driver and a man with a shovel who spread the grit according to the road width. Down the centre of the road they went – no other traffic to bother them. Later when transport changed to lorries the crew expanded to three men, two of them grit spreading, each one working alternately. The lorry travelled at much faster speed and again there was little traffic". Not like today when the gritters can't get through the congestion to do their work.

The need for mechanical spreaders was appreciated in the 1950s, and Mr Free was in the forefront: "At that time Heathrow Airport was growing larger and there was need for a fast spreader. I was working for the engineering division of Pest Control of Bourn and was given two ex-Army trucks and two lime-spreaders with the instruction to 'get on with it'. The spreaders were made with adjustable deflectors to restrict the width of the spread. These were tested on the runways at Bourn airfield and accepted."

Alan Brigham, the Cambridge street-sweeping historian also recalls the hard working men who work long hours in all conditions to keep life moving: "I've been sweeping the same streets for over 20 years and for much of that time I worked with just two 'mates'. They are retired now, but I visited them over Christmas and it reminded me how lucky I had been to know them. First I worked with Ernie Hart, then with Trevor Seager. Between them they must have kept Cambridge city centre clean for over 30 years, and both would top my New Years Honours list.

"When I started as a road sweeper early one dark November morning Ernie showed me what to do, helped me when I was lagging behind (getting up at 5.00 am every day was a struggle!), sympathetically listened to my problems - and bought the tea twice a day. Did I listen to his problems? Did I buy the tea? No! Ernie taught me that the job mattered. It may not have been well paid. Many considered it 'dirty' and beneath them. But he took enormous pride in keeping the streets of the city centre clean. And he made sure that I did too. I was young and on my way somewhere else (I thought!), but this was his home, where his friends and family lived, and I wasn't going to be allowed to let him down! [SCAN OF ERNIE HART MAKING TEA]

"Trevor Seager was the same. He used to get to work early to clean Petty Cury before the first college cleaners came by, made sure that I swept into the deepest corners, and with good humour kept me going on cold winter mornings. [SCAN OF TREVOR SEAGER WITH HIS ROAD SWEEPERS CART ON A SNOWY MORNING]

"For both Ernie and Trevor the city centre was their 'patch'. Invisible to most shoppers and tourists, they cared about Cambridge. And were conscientious workers. Between them they taught me that the job does matter, and that it is important to do it well. I owe them more than a cup of tea!"

Roger Coleman from Cambridge has written following one of my daily 'Looking Back' snippets on from 1954 in which I mentioned an underwater camera designed by Pye. This had particular relevance to him as it was designed by his father, Donald Robert 'Ben' Coleman together with Douglas Allanson.

Following the tragic loss of a De Havilland Comet off the coast of Elba it was vital to discover the reason for the crash. But the plane was lying deep in the sea so the Admiralty turned to Pye of Cambridge for help and their Technical Director, Mr Baden Edwards, received instructions to create a television camera that could be sent down to survey the wreckage. One of the major problems they faced was to design a waterproof case which would protect the camera's valve electronics in depths of up to 900 feet. The aluminium alloy casing was produced in the workshops of Dan Morley's garage on Mount Pleasant Corner, Huntingdon Road by a team of highly skilled engineers that included Eric Maxim. The team worked around the clock and the camera was flown out in just nine days!

It was successful in locating over 90% [PER CENT] of the wreckage and provided the evidence needed. The innovative camera attracted worldwide attention and Ben Coleman appeared on the BBC Television Newsreel programme. Roger has vague memories of seeing his dad on their home-made 12-inch tv and has a studio-made 78 rpm record of the sound-track of his dad's voice from all those years ago [SCAN OF BEN COLEMAN AND THE UNDERWATER CAMERA]

Some weeks ago I appealed for memories of Cambridge cinemas and the messages have been coming in.

Basil Bonner from Whittlesford writes: "The reference to silent film accompaniment ranging from piano to eight-piece orchestra reminds me that cinema organs were originally designed specifically for the accompaniment of silent movies, and were equipped with a range of tonal and non-tonal percussions as well as pipework. Three Cambridge cinemas had such organs installed after the advent of sound. These were British instruments of which the first was a Christie unit organ at the Victoria in Market Hill, (1931), the second a small Compton organ installed at the Rex in 1934 and the third another Compton at the Regal in 1937. They were used for linking films and for short solo interludes". Basil frequented all of these cinemas, as well as the Central, Cosmopolitan, Kinema and Tivoli, usually accompanied by the lady who more than 50 years ago became his wife, Beryl. [SCAN OF REGAL CINEMA ORGAN 1971, GEOFFREY GOODE AT THE KEYBOARD, WATCHED BY RON CARTER]. Mrs E. Golding from Cambridge has sent me a picture of the staff at the Regal Cinema in either 1942 or 1943, when the manager was a Mr Roberts [SCAN]

Jennifer Nicholls from Waterbeach has special memories of the Rex Cinema in Magrath Avenue, near where she was brought up in Stretten Avenue. She recalls her music teacher, Mrs Cadogan took her school class to see 'West Side Story' there about 1964. When it finally closed down Jennifer's late husband, Gordon Cave, bought the building and had plans to turn it into a nightclub. But local residents were opposed to the scheme and it never happened. It was in February 1979 that the building which had become almost derelict since the Abbey Sports and Social Club closed six years earlier was put up for sale by auction and was bought by the County Council £33,000. [CEN PHOTO OF MAGRATH AVE]

All this is particularly of interest to Richard Finch from Haverhill as he is arranging for a visit to Cambridge by members of the Cinema Theatre Association and would appreciate as much information as he can get. So if you can help please e-mail him at bud_logan@hotmail.com or drop me a line and I'll pass it on.

Cherry Palmer's photo of the Cambridge Schoolboy Footballers who played West Ham in 1934 has sparked memories for several readers. Brent Greenwood saw his late father amongst the team, while Mr E. Shrimpton from Bar Hill later became friendly with one of the lads, Sammy Cornwell. He writes: "I came to Cambridge from West Ham with my family a couple of days after the Second World War broke out. I played against Sam for the Cambridge Borough Police in the Thursday League. He came from a great footballing family and his dad still played for Cambridge Wanderers together with Fred Pickett – though both were in their seventies." [SCAN OF SCHOOLBOY FOOTBALLERS]

Mrs Margery Haigh (nee O'Dell) believes she can identify her late husband Desmond seated at the end, far left. He played for the team during his years at the Central Higher Grade School, Parkside and she has two medals awarded to him between 1933 and 1937. While digging amongst her own souvenirs Margery has unearthed an early picture of Milton Road Infants School sometime in the 1920s. She can identify the Headmistress, Miss Hurry and teachers Miss Clarke and Miss Crossman. The boy holding the slate is Arthur Dunne and she is sitting next to him. Other names include Frank Hindle, Margaret Keele, Harry Missing, Lilly Tabor, Donald Pedley, Margaret Speed, Oliver Gilbert, Hilda Allan and Myrtle Bygrave. Although the school is about to be replaced with something more appropriate for today's youngsters Margery recalls it as a very healthy environment, on the very edge of open countryside, a really super, happy little school. [SCAN OF MILTON ROAD SCHOOL CLASS]

Memories 25th February 2004

Bob Briggs, who describes himself as ‘an old farm boy from Manitoba, Canada’ has got himself interested in life in Boxworth, the village from which his family emigrated.

He writes: “I am in touch with some of the families that have passed through Boxworth over the years and each have a story. I have collected some material from back years and am always looking for extra information. What I am working towards is where did some of these people come from, their time in Boxworth and where did they go.”

Bob’s grandfather Percy Briggs had planned to become a minister but opted to go to Canada instead in 1911. His brother Arthur and sisters Con and Kate followed ten years later and it broke their mother’s heart to have four of her children so far away. [SCAN OF WALTER, CONSTANCE, CHARLES, KATE, HARRY, SUSAN, ARTHUR AND ELLA BRIGGS IN SCHOOL HOUSE LANE c1919]

Bob has tracked down somebody who actually remembered them:

Harold Ernest Crossley recalled: “I was five and have recollections of Con, Kate and Arthur going to Canada. They went out on a scheme - £10 passage and a farm on the prairies. I remember seeing them off with my mother, on the boat train from Euston to Liverpool and then across on a ship called the Mettagam. Kate returned, she could not stand the extremes of weather, so she said.

“I spend my school holidays of my boyhood (5-15) with Charles & Susan Briggs at 1 School Lane, Boxworth.. Life in those days was very primitive. There was no running water, no electricity, no sanitation, and the privy was up the top of the garden.

Their cottage had been extended before the 1914-1918 war, when the Briggs family had outstripped the accommodations of the old cottage of two up & two down. The kitchen had a brick floor and a kitchen range with roasting spit hanging in an open chimney. The range had ovens both sides and two ovens in the walls. Fuel was mainly wood, coal on cooking days, usually Sundays. Kettles were boiled by the addition of kindling wood to make a flame. For quick boiling an oil stove was used. Lighting was by paraffin oil lamps. Uncle Harry bought his father and mother an Aladdin Lamp which gave a lovely light, placed in the centre of the table.

“The second room downstairs was the Post Office and in the wall was the posting box. Aunt Ella was the Post mistress and in doing so collected all the gossip of the village. [SCAN OF PERCY BRIGGS OUTSIDE POST OFFICE]

“Charles Briggs was a dear old man and he and I got on well together. He worked hard as a farm labourer on Mr. Mailers farm and being in his 60 - 70’s used a scythe a lot in the harvest fields, mowing the wheat at the corners so that the horse drawn binder could negotiate the corners without stopping. As the field of corn became smaller the rabbits started running and us lads had a whale of time trying to catch one. A rabbit meant a dinner that didn’t have to be bought in those days.

“His day would start at 6am, he came home to breakfast at eight, home for dinner at one, then back to the fields carrying his flask of tea before finally coming home at dusk, between nine and ten at night. Susan and I would take his tea about six in the afternoon which we all ate together. He could not read or write but nevertheless seemed to get by OK. After he retired he had an allotment up the other end of the village and would go up to the Golden Bull. He enjoyed a pint or two and would often find one of the younger villagers would have left a message for him to work a row of his potatoes whilst at he was at work.” [SCAN OF GOLDEN BALL]

“Susan was a very small person and she kept the home going. She had about 20 hens and kept them fed with scraps & ‘gleanings’ from the harvest field. The men’s wives were allowed to go into the field after it had been cut to pick up ears that had not been harvested. Saturday night in the summer she usually called on her sister Mary and brother Jim who lived in a row of cottages called the ‘Grapevine’. Susan and Mary would then walk down to the New Inn on the main road and have a drink. I walked with them but had to be content with a bag of crisps outside, as children were not allowed in pubs.”

Bob Briggs is delighted to share his information with anybody interested; you can e-mail him - rj.briggs@shaw.ca - or drop me a line and I’ll pass it on.

When Lorenza Smith from Cambridge wrote about a school photo she’d found amongst her husband’s papers, she wasn’t too sure of the details. But she has sparked memories for various readers.

Jane Reeson has e-mailed to say that she too had been clearing papers following the death of her Gran, Irene Jacklin (nee Wilson), and came across another picture showing the same people. It was of Kingston School which Irene had attended with her brother and sisters and where she met the lad who was to become her husband, Horace Jacklin. He later worked at Childerley Gate. [SCAN OF KINGSTON VILLAGE, ? CEN PIC OF KINGSTON SCHOOL]

Margaret Adams from Caldecote has memories of the Childerley Gate Council School which opened in 1910 on the St Neot’s Road close to the present entrance of Bourn Aerodrome. It was built to cater for 80 pupils, but even three years later was only half full. Many of the children were unusually backward in their education, having been so far from the other schools in the neighbourhood that they simply had not often got there. Like other schools the playground was divided into boys and girls’ areas and the kitchen garden was tended by the older pupils. They also had to cut the school house lawn with scissors, resulting in large blisters on their fingers. The school became a victim of wartime, being in the way of the bombers using the newly-constructed Bourn airfield. By then there were 100 pupils, the number boosted by London evacuees. They were dispersed around various village halls while a new ‘Temporary’ school was constructed. Margaret started there in 1943, having lived in Caldecote all her life. It consisted of two pre-fabricated huts heated by coke stoves whose chimneys were in the habit of being blown over, causing the room to fill with smoke. There was no electricity, water was carted in, sanitation was a cesspool and the playground regularly overflowed because of bad drains. The schoolmaster, A.G. Vincent Bruns was a very religious man and built himself a private chapel in the garden. The ‘temporary’ school finally closed 1963 , though the building still stands just before the BP garage on the left. [IS THERE A PIC IN CEN FILES]

Other readers have come forward with information on the Sebro Stirling aircraft repair works on Madingley Road to help Mark Greenhow. One, Mrs O. Osborne (nee Blundell) from Comberton writes:

“I volunteered for war work & was employed as an aircraft repair fitter on the spa structure section, Madingley Road from 1942 to 1945. The fuselage, wings etc were all taken to Bourn Airfield for full assembly. It was a very difficult job. I’d had six weeks training at the Technical College in Mill Road where Mr Grayston, our instructor had told us it would be hard and strict. But on my first day I just could not believe how slow and boring it seemed. We were once told to hide in the cloakroom through lack of work. However things gradually quickened pace; men and girls from all over Britain appeared including girls from Norfolk who had to go back at certain times of the season to work in the 'Flax Factory', which they really didn't care for at all. Our foreman used to love to show his authority by getting us to screw a tank top down just ten minutes before we were due to clock off. But I have great memories of wartime work and fun!"

Mark Greenhow also asked about the Green Man at Meldreth; Catharine Walston writes: "That is our house! It is not called The Green Man any more (sadly). I think it was only a pub for a fairly short period in its 500-year history. We bought it from a member of the Cavendish Labs, who had lived here for about fifteen years after extensively doing it up. Before that, it belonged to a family called Parker who had a riding stable here. It used to be faced with rather ugly yellow bricks and had a front door giving directly onto the road. Now it is timber and render and the front door is in the stable yard."

Last week's mention of the Pye underwater camera has sparked memories for Rodney Dale of Haddenham. He recalls: "Fifty or more years ago, I worked in the holidays with Ray Woodman, cabinet maker, who had a workshop in Sandy Lane which runs along the back of the houses on the south side of Chesterton Road between de Freville Avenue and Haig Road (as was). One day, we were visited by Ben Coleman from Pye; they had been working on an underwater camera which was in constant use, and he wanted a full-size wooden model for showing at exhibitions and so on. All we had was a sheaf of photographs and one or two key dimensions. Just the sort of problem I loved, and I invented a device for scaling measurements taken from the photographs to enable us to make a plausible model in wood. When it was finished, it was generally agreed to be indistinguishable from the real thing – perhaps it was the one in your photo! [PYE CAMERA PHOTO]

Chris Scurrah who organises the Soham Community website writes to say that Soham and Chesterton now have another claim to fame: "I thought you might like to know that Olaudah Equiano, otherwise known as Gustavus Vassa, has been voted 'The 4th Greatest Black Briton' on an internet site – www.100greatblackbritons.com. He was an African slave who gained his freedom and became an activist for the abolition of slavery in the 18th Century. He wrote his celebrated Autobiography - 'The Interesting Narrative of the life of Olaudah Equiano or Gustavus Vassa, the African 1789'. Olaudah married an English Woman, Susannah Cullen from Fordham at St. Andrew's Church, Soham on the 7th April 1792. They had two daughters but one of them Anna Maria Vassa sadly died on 21st July 1797, aged just 4 years old and is buried in Chesterton churchyard. Olaudah himself died on 31st March 1797, aged 52, just ten years before Slavery was finally abolished in England This is just part of a mass of Soham information on Chris' website – www.soham.org.uk – which is well worth a look by anybody researching the area. Memories 3rd March 2004, by Mike Petty

For me the last week was one of memories of wartime. Over lunch at Clare Hall on Thursday Dr Audrey Glaeurt recalled her experiences when bombs fell in the vicinity of her family's home in St Barnabas Road, Cambridge, and watching the flames as the Perse School blazed following another raid. Then at a meeting of the Haddenham Interest Club that night Tony Locke spoke of the bombing of Great Eastern Street and others mentioned crashes on Histon Road and how secret Cabinet Meetings were held at Pembroke College. [SCAN OF CUTTINGS OF GREAT EASTERN STREET AND PERSE SCHOOL BOMBING]

Now Archie Roberts has written from Thetford in Norfolk to say that reading an earlier Memories article on the anti-aircraft sites during the war has stimulated his own memories of some of the bombs that fell on Mill Road railway bridge.

He writes: "I was a boy of 7 at the time and living with my parents and younger brother at 13 Cockburn Street, Mill Road. My mother used to shop in the International on the town side of Mill Road opposite the then Maternity Hospital, and we often walked over the bridge to and from the shop. I can remember the ruins of the bombing of the two houses very close to the bridge, and also the patchwork repair of the side of the bridge damaged either by blast or shrapnel. In the 50's or 60's the houses were rebuilt in the same style as the originals. [SCAN CUTTING OF MILL ROAD BOMBING]

"I cannot remember the actual bombing but what I do remember is standing on the front step of 13 Cockburn Street in mid afternoon one day when a Mr Quelsh, a baker, was delivering our bread from his small van. While he was there a German bomber flew very low along Mill Road from the Cement Works towards the town. My brother and I were ordered to dive under the dining table in the central room, which we did. I always believed that the bombing of these houses was due to this bomber, but the Michael Bowyer's book 'Air Raid' says that it followed the railway line from Ely to bomb. So what did this dark unmarked particular bomber do?"

He continues: "However, what is missing from this very good book is the bombing of the Baptist Sunday School which was about a third of the way down Stockwell Street from Mill Road, and behind the Baptist Church on Mill Road. The Sunday School was flattened. Half way down Cockburn Street opposite numbers 13 and 11 stood the Tracey Hall, which up until the time of the bombing had a church spire. The blast from the bomb blew the spire off into our street, the corrugated hall itself shielding our windows from the blast. I can remember mum saying that the sticky papered bedroom sash window rattled like hell but didn't break; we were close and very lucky.

"I can remember that (in my age group) Raymond Holder, Brian and Barry Anderson (with their parents) lived in Cockburn Street directly behind the Sunday School, and like Fred Rouse, his sister and their parents, and Mr & Mrs Marks and their daughter, they would have all been affected by the blast from the bombing. These were the people living in the two houses on either side of the Tracey Hall at the time. I would be very grateful if your readers could come up with their memories of it, particularly the date and time."

Michael Bowyer has recorded that it was just after midnight on 29th August 1941 that a hundred houses were damaged when nine high-explosive bombs fell in ones or twos in Gt Eastern Street, Argyle Street, Sturton Street, Stockwell Street, Greville Road and Cavendish Road area. Two people were killed in Great Eastern Street and five injured. The dead were named in the CDN as Mrs Louisa Rowell, aged 82 and John Bowles aged four whilst Mrs L. Clark, Mr & Mrs A. Petit, Mrs Dorothy Driver and Mrs Florence Bell were treated for minor injuries.

One casualty was Sturton Street Methodist Church which was the only religious building in Cambridge put 'out of action' by the Luftwaffe. The chapel was in the news just 50 years ago – CDN 5th March 1954 - when the Master of Downing College laid the foundation stone of a replacement church to be built on the site. The News reported that it had been a hard fight - the War Damage Commission had given them a very raw deal, only offering £800 towards rebuilding costs. But they had pursued their resolution in the face of frustration to which all were accustomed in dealing with Government Departments and got £1,170. The rebuilt chapel reopened at the end of September 1954 [SCAN OF OLD STURTON STREET CHAPEL]

A few weeks ago Mrs H. Bainbridge from Cambridge sent me a series of newspaper cuttings from the CDN of August and September 1942. Much of what was happening at the time could not be published because of censorship but these articles celebrate the achievements of an important branch of the wartime workers – the National Fire Service.

Their first anniversary was marked by a drumhead service on Parker's Piece on 23rd August 1942 when between 200 and 300 firemen and firewomen were on parade. They heard their Regional Fire Officer, Mr R. Kidd, read congratulatory message from the King expressing his appreciation for their courage and devotion. Then the Vicar of St George's church paid his own tribute: "We do not know, quite frankly, what would have happened without your help and no one will deny the heroism and matchless courage of all ranks of the Fire Service during the past year". He went on: "For many generations the story will be told, and it is graven in stone up and down the country how you have saved both property and, what is more important, human lives". [SCAN OF CUTTING NFS PARADE]

But little of their story seems to have been remembered; Cambridge man Frank Reeve produced a dramatic account of their work in his unpublished work 'Going to blazes', but this is based on his experiences in London. Who can help piece together their story locally?

But wartime was not the only topic readers have asked me to feature; rambles walking the footpath from Linton to Hildersham will know there is a unique impediment in their way – a clapper stile. It looks like an ordinary gate, but when you press on the top bar it pivots down to let you through. But are there any others elsewhere in Cambridgeshire, or do you have any old snaps of this or other stiles? [SCAN LINTON STILE]

The hunt is also on for any transparencies of views of Bottisham, particularly in the 1930s, that I could borrow to show at one of my meetings, or does anybody have memories of the village at that time. [SCAN BOTTISHAM PUB]

And can anybody help me with reminiscences or stories about Cambridgeshire fountains, as I've been asked to speak at the Cambridge conference of the Fountain Society in September. I know there is the fountain on Market Hill, Cambridge, the ones at Trinity and King's Colleges, that magnificent affair in March and the one that used to stand on Ely market place; but there must be more. Any pictures would be welcome together with any interesting anecdotes that would help me spark up my talk [SCAN FOUNTAIN ON MARKET HILL, SCAN OF MARCH FOUNTAIN]

Further memories have been jogged by the story of the Pye underwater camera

Peter Prime has e-mailed to say he worked with Ben Coleman when a young man as did Ronald Hurst from Impington who adds that the waterproof case was tested in 1951 at Banham's Boat Yard and on the completion of the tests the camera and case were taken to HMS Reclaim at Portsmouth accompanied by Ben Coleman, Dan Robeson and Ronald; the trials were cut short as the ship was ordered to put to sea to investigate a missing submarine.

Mr W.A. Reeve from Cambridge writes following mention of the Cambridge Rhythm Club in Memories of 11th February. He recalls it back in the 1930s, as he writes:

"About 1934, encouraged by the Melody Maker, clubs were formed throughout the U.K., the Cambridge one being no.77. The paper covered not only the dance band scene but the jazz scene as well with articles on early bands and musicians and the Golden Age of Jazz.

"The Cambridge club was formed about October 1934 by Len Salmon, Basil (?) Cranfield, Roy Wickes who was a drummer. Rupert Buttress, a collector of jazz records, Sid Barrett a double bass player and myself joined the managing committee. A number of undergraduates also joined and were quite influential in its affairs; including Rupert Clerke who later became a fighter pilot. One evening one student brought along his cousin, Leonard Feather who was jazz critic for the Melody Maker and in the 1940s manager for the Duke Ellington band. Grace Wade who worked in the record department of Millers Music Shop was very helpful and very popular.

Wendy Maskell (nee Bell) from Cambridge has written to say that she saw her dad, the late Reg Bell in the picture of the Cambridge Auxiliary Firemen I featured on 14th March. Also pictured was Reg Smith and Wendy recalls: "During the war we lived at 26 Hobart Road and the Smith family lived at no.12. As soon as the siren sounded both 'Reggies' would cycle off to the fire station in Coleridge Road and my mother, brother and I would join Mrs Smith and her two children at her home. I remember my dad having to assist the London Fire Brigade during the blitz. Another memory is of him saying he didn't enjoy climbing to the top of the training ladder, which of course, was all part of his training!"

Memories 10th March 2004, by Mike Petty

Don Unwin of Cambridge is seeking information on the development of the Unicam Instrument company.

He writes:

"It was a small outfit, founded around 1933 by Sidney William John Stubbens, an ex Cambridge Instrument Company foreman. I worked there from 1935 until 1946. When I joined it was run by the boss with his two brothers Earnest and John and had only about 20 or 25 employees including ex Cambridge Instrument Company men Bill Varley and Earnie Marsh. The directors of the company were all local men, Mr Pretty, a director of Robert Sayles, Winton Smith the pork pie maker, Mr Slater a solicitor and W G Collins ex-works manager and later director at Instrument Company.

"My starting rate was a halfpenny per hour more than the normal starting rate of a penny per hour because I had been to the Tech, which came to 4s 8d (24p) per week less deductions that included a penny for the hospital!

"The workshop was in Barrett's warehouse yard next door to the Bun Shop in St Andrews Hill, an old rickety two floored building. It was equipped with mostly old machines that were driven by belts from line shafting mounted in a timber framework and powered by an old electric motor which when starting up had to be helped by pulling on the belt. The upper floor had a similar line shaft driven from the bottom shaft by a belt through a hole cut in the floor. Although there were stairs the direct access to the ground floor from the top was through a hole in the floor and down a ladder! The old boiler room on the ground floor was rigged up with a spray painting booth, fumes exhausting into the chimney through one of the soot cleaning holes! [NEWS PHOTO OF ST ANDREWS HILL SHOWING BARRETT'S WAREHOUSE?]

"In an area off the workshop on the upper floor was partitioned into three rooms, one Mr Stubbens' office, next door a small offices for the secretary. In a third larger work room were Mrs Stubbens and a Miss Sharpe who did engraving, dividing, electrical wiring and similar tasks.

“The main products were simple laboratory apparatus such as lab stands, lab clamps for glassware etc as well as special work for the near-by University laboratories

“Sometime at the end of 1936 Sid Stubbens was sent to his new works on a site between nos. 54 & 58 Arbury Road to help fit it out. It was just a roof, walls still being built and a dirt floor. Eventually the place was ready for occupation and the plant was moved from Barrett's Yard and installed. [SCAN OF ARBURY ROAD c1930]

“The business must have been doing quite well, a defence contract for optical instruments had been obtained resulting from the pre-war rearmament programme. As a result during the next year an extension, twice the area of the original building was announced. However soon after the two steel erectors had started work one of them put his hand through a window and then there was only one! He asked Sid if he could borrow a couple of men to help and guess who was one of them detailed to help. Yes, I was one of them, climbing up stanchions, drilling $\frac{3}{4}$ -inch [THREE-QUARTER INCH] holes in girders by hand using a ratchet brace, oxyacetylene cutting and welding, all in freezing cold weather. I thoroughly enjoyed every minute of it and it was a wonderful and valuable experience.

“Then the War started, the roof lights were fitted with sliding shutters, side windows fitted with loose blackout shutters, light locks on all external doors and air raid shelters dug in the grounds. In April 1940 we were told that to increase production two shifts were to be operated in the machine shop. We were to work 12 hour shifts, alternate weeks of 7 days and 6 nights. On the night shift there were the only two non-productive people and the chargehand was totally responsible for everything, discipline, quality control, setting machines, designing jigs and fixtures, accidents, first aid, evacuation during air-raids. On occasions a platoon of gunners came with their artillery and demonstrated how the instruments we were making used

“Just before the war a number of Jewish refugees, mostly quite educated, joined the work force but during the war however the number of employees increased dramatically, reaching about 600. They were from every walk of life, male and female, some quite young, others old enough to be grandparents, some very intelligent, some dim, mostly unfamiliar with machine work and working in a factory.

“Yet another large extension was built on the side of the existing building to house instrument assembly and a larger canteen. There was an optical mounting department in the Riley House garage on Mitcham's Corner and the London Instrument Company works at Newnham Mill were taken over.

“After the war there was a great slimming down. I left to join Cambridge Instrument Co and moves took place to join up with W G Pye to form Pye Unicam. By mid 1961 Unicam had relocated to York Street.” [SCAN OF YORK STREET IN 1950S]

Mention of St George's church in on the Milton Road in Cambridge in last week's memories has prompted Donald Flory to contact me with some details of its connections with Australia.

St George's church started in a hall back in 1932, complete with a harmonium and a lectern borrowed from St Botolph's Church on Trumpington Street. But they had plans for something better and an appeal was issued by the Bishop of Ely, which was supported the novelist Dorothy L. Sayers: “The church on the Milton Road is urgently needed and must be built. It will be built but let us see that priest and people do not have to start their work with a millstone of debt around their neck”.

A design for the new church was prepared by Thomas Henry Lyon, a former Director of the University School of Architecture and accepted in 1937. The foundation stone was laid on St George's Day 1938; it was consecrated in October before becoming a parish in its own right the next month. It had cost no more than three of the semi-detached houses alongside it, making it a wonderfully cheap church

Its unusual architecture attracted praise, but not from everybody; for although its acoustic qualities were great for organ and choir it was less successful for the spoken voice which reverberated within the lofty barrel vault. But there was a solution – fill it with people.

[SCAN OF CHURCH INTERIOR AND EXTERIOR / NEWS PHOTOS]

However it was not the only St George's church that Thomas Lyon produced, for 35 years earlier, in 1902, he had designed another one at Goodwood, near Adelaide in Australia. It was in part a memorial to his sister, Caroline. She had had married a friend of his, a fellow Corpus Christi College undergraduate named Percy Wise and emigrated. She died in 1900 while returning to England and her distraught husband persuaded his brother-in-law to visit his Australian parish and design its new church. Sadly Lyon never saw the completed church which has a similar plan to the one in Chesterton, both sharing an appreciation of Byzantine architecture, though the local one is the larger of the two and boasts its dominating tower. It was as near as he got to designing the Cathedral he had always wanted to build. [SCANS OF TWO ST GEORGE'S CHURCHES]

The Australian church celebrated its centenary in October last year, the Chesterton one still has some way to go but if the last 66 years have been any guide they will manage it.

The picture of the bombing of a house in Great Eastern Street has brought a very personal memory back to Margaret Jordan, (nee Watts). She e-mails: "The picture shows my Grandmother, Lydia Watts' bedroom at no.35 which is where my mother Edith Watts and sisters Doreen, Esme and I were asleep at the time of the air raid in the beds shown. We had just moved from Eastbourne to escape the bombing. My grandmother was asleep downstairs in the front of the house as was a Sister from the Maternity Hospital. Luckily we were all uninjured. [SCAN OF GT EASTERN STREET AS LAST WEEK]

Jean Perraton from Cambridge e-mails to ask some details of the annual 'Swim through Cambridge' from Mill Lane to Jesus Green. In a 'Looking Back' snippet for June 1977 I mentioned that the race had been cancelled that year – but did it subsequently start up again. My feeling is that it did not, but can you confirm it for her. She is writing a book about swimming in lakes and rivers and would like details to include. You can e-mail her - jean.parraton@virgin.net or drop me a line and I'll pass it on. [SCAN OF SWIM THROUGH CAMBRIDGE]

Jean Gimbert from Cambridge has sent me some old photographs discovered during a house clearance at Chatteris. Some show sights that are little changed, but a postcard of Brooklands Avenue shows just what a rural street this was back in 1905 before Dutch elm disease and motorists took their toll. There is a sketch of the corner of Magdalene and Northampton Streets in 1911 showing the White Horse Inn, the present Folk Museum which is currently closed while new facilities are added in the former inn yard. But two in particular needs explanation. One shows a group of smartly dressed hand-bell ringers outside a church door. There is no doubt as to the date, 1950, but where was it taken? The only clue is that it was taken by John Slater of Newmarket. So do you recognise faces please? The other shows an imposing building with a number of policemen outside – but where is it? Memories 17th March 2004, by Mike Petty

Pat Richards has send a copy of the latest edition of the magazine of Addenbrooke's Hospital League of Nurses magazine that she edits. In it Margaret Dorman who worked at Addenbrooke's from 1959-62 recalls her memories of working with young patients:

"I was sent to the Children's Ward in my first year. At the time I was living still at Owlstone Croft with two friends, Carol Dickson and Margaret Chaston where we were sharing a large room on the first floor. The rest of our set had left for the main Nurses Home in the hospital but there were not enough rooms for all of us so we elected to stay. It was a large room with a bed in each corner and the reason why it is part of my memory of my Children's experience is that this is where I used to call out in my sleep in my anxiety; Carol replying in her sleep, and the ever pragmatic Margaret listening in some amusement and able to report in the morning.

"My previous wards had been Private Patients 1, with Sister Bowyer and Hatton Ward (female medical) through a long hot summer. One of my first allocated tasks was to special nurse a six week old baby with a tracheotomy. The staff nurse led me to the area screened off by glass windows from the main ward to a tiny cot to show me this little mite. I recall two instructions. 'Don't forget to feed the baby' and 'If there is any problem, wave'. Conscious that I hardly knew how to hold a baby let alone feed it and had never seen a tracheotomy before, I became aware of that cold panicky feeling low inside the body. How could I do it? Where did I start? How long before I could justifiably wave for help? Already just nine months into nursing I had internalised the precept that you could never say that you couldn't do something, you just had to find a way. The gods were kind that day. Help arrived just in time for the baby, and me, in the form of a Consultant Anaesthetist who spoke kindly and went to find the Staff Nurse. Very quickly we changed places, she became the one behind the glass windows but I don't suppose she would need to wave.

"Sister was a remote person to me and had a reputation for being a bit erratic. I remember her throwing out all the equipment from the treatment room into the corridor with great passion. Perhaps it was her way of saying it was not tidy enough and had to be done again. She did not dislike me and for some reason I never understood, tended to give me more senior work (in the workbook) than would be expected even though there were more senior students. She did expect us to work hard and long. I quickly learned that there was no point in going to her to ask if I might go off duty unless it was at least half an hour after the due time. This seriously cut into the brief hours off duty. I frequently had split shifts and commonly the morning off from 10am to 1pm. By not going off until 10.30am, there was little time to do anything except cycle 20 minutes back to Owlstone Croft in the uniform and back in time for lunch at 12.30 ready for duty again at 1 pm. There could be another half-hour added to the 8pm finish time, but I was used to staying late by then.

"Children then had to be bathed on admission and separated from their mothers which was so traumatic. I remember a little boy, possibly about six, whom I had to bath and admit and he cried all the time. He was in pain too from the large swellings in his body and lay on his bed in total misery, learning how painful life could, and would be. Then there were medicine rounds and trying to persuade toddlers to drink their medicine with variable success prior to their operations. During this time however, I did learn to bottle feed babies. The Consultant was not to be forgotten, as he sported bright red braces as a personal feature. How well that worked too. I cannot recall his face but his name was Gairdner and the red braces are as vivid as in 1959.

"But the memory which will stay with me for all my life is having to special nurse three boys with head injuries. One was a toddler, the other two about seven and eleven. I can't remember what ill fortune led to their accidents. The three beds were in line on the ward and my responsibility was to take vital signs every 15 minutes and chart it. So each child, body, head and arms thrashing about on the bed, had to have a thermometer held under the arm sufficiently to register, then take the pulse and then the blood pressure. It was a combination of a sprint and a marathon since this went on for hours, with me rushing to the next child, struggling to hold him still to do the signs and then rushing off to the next. No wonder Margaret heard me talking in the night ... 'keep still, please keep still, please keep still' as it was my turn to thresh about.

"She also heard Carol and I discussing and agreeing in our sleep that Sunday was the best day of the week. The reason - Sister came on duty later and the pressure and possibility of catastrophe was deferred for half an hour. On such small patches of hope did we cling and so survive."

Pat Richards is always interested in hearing from nurses and patients with memories to share of the days when Matron ruled the wards. You can e-mail her at perl1@cam.ac.uk or write to me and I'll forward your letter. [SCAN OF OLD ADDENBROOKE'S HOSPITAL 1966, PIX FROM NEWS FILES]

Various readers have written following recent Memories articles

The piece on war-time bombing (March 3rd) has prompted Rod Norden from Quy to write: "I can remember being taken as a small boy to Mill Road bridge to see the bomb damage done there. I can also remember the German bomber mentioned by Archie Roberts. I was in our garden at 94 Catherine Street where I was born and was with my cousin Chris Norden who lived in Thoday Street. The plane came over very low. I think it was a Sunday dinner time and I was told he was trying to bomb the Norman Cement Works. I also remember going down the air raid shelter across the road from our house in the old builders yard owned by Crown and Cox. My father who was an engine driver on the railway was also an Air Raid Warden for that area" [SCAN MILL ROAD BRIDGE BOMB AS REPORTED CDN 31 JAN 1941]

Mrs E. Day from Histon also recalls the raids: "I was five years old at the time and lived on Mawson Road when the raid on Mill Road happened. I was ill in bed with measles and saw the German plane fly past and drop the bombs on Mill Road bridge. My late father-in-law, 'Banger' Day, was an air raid warden living in Sturton Street opposite the Methodist Chapel and when it was bombed he went in and turned all the gas off, otherwise it would have been completely demolished".

Betty Giddens from Sutton is seeking help in tracking down a photograph of all the children who attended a party held in Priory School, Galfrid Road to commemorate the Coronation in 1953. She was in the picture together with her sister Gill and nephew Geoffrey. I have one but am not sure whether it's the one she wants. Do you have others [SCAN OF ABBEY ESTATE GROUP]

Betty is very kind about the Memories articles and about my piece in the new "Our Time" magazine on the Lion Yard area before redevelopment. She recalls: "I walked through those narrow streets on many occasions – mostly going to and from work at Francis and Co., solicitors in Peas Hill and at the Guildhall. I hope you have more pictures of Cambridge in the next issue". [ALEXANDRA STREET PHOTO AS USED OUR TIME – REF 149876, LOOKING TOWARDS PETTY CURY 1972] Indeed I will, having found some marvellous photographs of Fitzroy Street and some of the shopkeepers there, that were taken back in 1964 – 40 years ago. There's more space in the new magazine and the glossy paper means that we can reproduce the pictures much better.

Rod Edney from Stapleford has send me a photograph of an old cottage at the junction of Airport Way and Newmarket Road, Cambridge. Does this jog memories for anybody and can you tell me anything about it? [SCAN OF THATCHED COTTAGE]

Richard Sanders from Stourbridge in the West Midlands was interested in Margery Haigh's picture of children at Milton Road Infant's School, Cambridge (February 18th) : "One of the children recognised by Mrs Haigh, Myrtle Bygrave, was my mother. She would probably have been living at 52, Oak Tree Avenue at the time, although the family had lived at Thompsons Lane prior to that. After leaving Milton Road, she went to the Cambridgeshire High School. She later worked at Chivers, the Pathology laboratories in Lensfield Road and then Pye/Philips. She married, had three children, and lived in Haig Road/Elizabeth Way from 1952 until her death in 1993. If my mother was in Miss Clark's class, the photograph would probably have been taken in 1925 or 1926 as she was born in 1921. Regarding Miss Clark, not only did she teach my mother, but also myself, some 28 years later, in 1953/54. Coincidentally, my third year junior school class teacher at Milton Road in 1956/57 was Mrs Cadogan, who is featured in another article on the same page." [REPEAT MILTON ROAD SCHOOL PHOTO FROM FEB 18TH – I DON'T HAVE COPY]

Barry Benton has e-mailed following another 'Memories' article (February 25th) one featuring the memories of Bob Briggs, an old farm boy from Manitoba.

Barry writes: "My great-grandparents were married in Waterbeach on 13th October 1904 and emigrated to Medicine Hat around 1908. He was working for the city as an electrician when he suffered a fatal accident on 4th December 1913. My grandmother and her younger brother were subsequently send back to Waterbeach to be brought up by their aunt while their elder brother remained in Medicine Hat with his mother. I am in regular contact with my 'first-cousins-once-removed' who still live and work in the area." But why, Barry asks, did they emigrate to Canada and were there 'recruitment advertisements' in the local papers to encourage them?"

Well on 12th March 1903 the CDN carried an interview with James D Bambridge of Manitoba who was visiting Cambridge to offer the depressed English agriculturist a chance in the farmer's El Dorado, Western Canada.. The Canadian government were giving a free grant of 160 acres of land to every emigrant, most of it prairie – virgin soil, rich in quality. The difficulties of the old settlers were now largely a thing of the past, no longer were they plumped down in a forest and expected to clear the timber before they could plant and sow. It was not only farmers that were wanted but all labouring classes, male and female, who could make $250 [TWO HUNDRED AND FIFTY DOLLARS] a year, much more than they would earn at home. It was expected that 120,000 people, like Barry's great-grandad, would emigrate that year. English agriculture did not pay whilst the Canadian farmer was making good money. It was an ideal time to seek a new life in a new world. [SCAN OF 1903 ARTICLE]

Did your family take up the opportunities offered, and did they prosper?

Memories 24th March 2004, by Mike Petty

The news of the impending closure of the Lion Yard multi-storey car park in central Cambridge will mark another chapter in an ongoing saga

Ever since the Honourable undergraduate C.S. Rolls brought the first car to the town in 1897 the mechanical monster had proved a problem. By 1907 it was felt doubtful if any other town of similar size had so many cars and motorbikes as Cambridge in term time: cars that not only knocked over cows in Victoria Avenue but also kicked up dust; cars that exceeded the speed limit with a taxi driver being fined £2 for driving at 12 mph in 1909.

As traffic increased so new measures were urged to control them. In 1921 staggered lunch hours were being urged to relieve congestion and four years later one-way traffic was introduced in Market Street and Petty Cury.

But if moving cars created difficulties, finding somewhere to park was already causing considerable problems

Relief was soon available with the opening of Drummer Street bus station and car park in 1925, though the area devoted to cars was soon found to be inadequate and in 1932 New Square car park was opened. It proved only a temporary solution, by 1934 cars and bikes were often parked so closely in Petty Cury and Sidney Street that pedestrians could not find space to cross over. Parking restrictions were introduced in 1936 which limited motorists to just fifteen minutes, using different sides of the streets on odd or even days and more one-way systems brought into operation. [SCAN OF DRUMMER STREET CAR PARK c1925 AND VIEW OF NEW SQUARE 1964]

Already the idea of using commons for cars was being urged and in 1938 came the suggestion of an underground car park on Market Hill, which could double for an air raid shelter in the fast-approaching war but war-time restrictions on petrol eased the problem for a while.

In 1950 a survey showed that whilst 43,000 motorists used New Square and 59,000 parked on Market Hill the favourite parking area was at the rear of the Lion Hotel, attracting over 80,000 cars in a year. The numbers increased as more and more of the old properties were demolished. [SCAN OF MARKET HILL PARKING 1964 AND LION YARD PARKING AREA 1960s]

By 1951 it was felt that the lack of central parking was driving shoppers away but the Trades Council wanted parks on the outskirts of the town and all waiting in the centre banned.

Much depended on whether the Holford Planning Report, the County's views on how Cambridge should develop.

The debate and arguments rumbled on... enlarge Lion Yard (1954), scrap Lion yard and build on the outskirts instead (1956). 1957 saw a plethora of plans ... parking meters in February, Park Street multi-storey car park in April, under Parker's Piece in May.

The Parker's Piece plan was deferred until October, the Park Street plan was deferred until the Parker's Piece plan had been discussed, the parking meters idea came up again ... and in the context of all this came the new idea. One morning in June 1958 Cambridge awoke to find that the Undergraduates had come up with their own solution. Parked neatly on top of the roof of the Senate House was an Austin 7 van. It had arrived there overnight and stayed for several days, finally having to be cut into sections before it could be brought down, perhaps a high price to pay for free parking in central Cambridge! [SCAN OF SENATE HOUSE ARTICLE – THIS HAS BEEN USED BEFORE, KEEP IT SMALL]

That year the concept of cars above houses approved not in Senate House Hill but in the prophetically named Park Street. Cambridge's first multi-storey opened in 1963, dwarfing Cambridge's last thatched cottage. [SCAN OF PARK STREET CAR PARK CONSTRUCTION OR IT DOMNATING THATCHED COTTAGE IN CLEMENT PLACE]

Elsewhere homes in Doric and Gothic streets were demolished to make space for more motors and multi-storeys were proposed for Donkeys Common and King Street. Others wanted parking meters, park and ride and underground car parks on Parker's Piece and Lion Yard.

Thus was the stage set and throughout the 1960's most of the alternative ideas were recycled.

Then in 1964 came the first parking meters. The charges of 1/- (5p) an hour would "produce a profit of £10,000 a year and they would pay for themselves within three". In fact by 1972 they had earned £101,000 and cost £145,000 in administration. Their immediate impact was to clear the streets, with long queues for car parks which were already full; traffic conditions were described as frightful and some traders reported a 78% dip in their takings. Double yellow lines began to appear in March 1965, and shoppers switched to the Fitzroy Street area where parking was easier and where the talked-of redevelopment seemed as unlikely as anything actually happening in Lion Yard. [SCAN OF PARKING METERS CORN EXCHANGE STREET 1965]

Yet in the centre things were changing though not for the better. In 1969 parking meter charges were doubled and one of the long established parking spots was closed as cars were banned from Market Hill. That Christmas the chaos was such that police had to invoke emergency powers in an attempt to clear streets clogged solid by jammed cars.

Worse was to follow next year when another central parking area became home for builders' vans rather than shoppers' cars. At long last work had started on the Lion Yard scheme after over 20 years of debate and despite a last minute hitch when University dons objected to the proposed design.

Envisaged in the Holford Report of the 1950s at a cost of £160,000, it would now come to over £700,000. And while Holford had wanted 400 cars it would now take 550. Completion was only two years away and in the meantime the Queen Anne Terrace car park and Elizabeth Bridge were due in 1971 and there was talk of pedestrianisation, a Western Relief Road, a Northern bypass and even 100 more meters

Lion Yard car park finally opened in July 1972. It was designed for shoppers, its prices pitched to discourage those who wanted to park their cars longer. Thus whilst parking for the first hour was 5p, with 15p for two, 25p for three and a horrendous 35p for four it would surely be only the richest motorist who would stump up the monumental sum of 75p for a whole days parking!

It has since been expanded and now will continue in a much-reduced capacity while the Grand Arcade scheme is implemented. In years to come will old folk ask themselves: "Do you remember the old Lion Yard Car Park?"

Or with park-and-ride, guided buses or whatever will we just marvel that it was ever possible just to drive and park in central Cambridge.

Readers write:

The photo of a thatched cottage on Newmarket Road has brought quick responses from readers.

Barry Pemberton from Sutton writes to say that the cottage was owned by Rueben and Sylvia Scott in the 1950's and 1960's. "My half brother Neville married their only daughter Beryl, and I visited the house on many occasions, I believe it was called Rose Haie tea room. The house had a great garden and orchard with superb views over open fields. The Scott's lived in the house up until the time it was demolished to make way for the extended airport runway. The picture shows a Morris Minor on the drive, this was owned by the Scott's and later sold to my brother. The Scott's have both now passed away and Beryl lives with my brother in Bosham Sussex" [SCAN]

Richard Doe e-mails: "Your picture of the cottage brings back memories. Firstly it stood to the west of the old Teversham Road, near the Park & Ride, and was not on the modern Airport Way. The picture was taken shortly before its demise to make way for Marshall's runway extension, notice the concrete posts for an additional security fence along the front. It overlooked a green area and was kept company by a magnificent horse chestnut tree, which I recall climbing on several occasions. Along with about eight other draughtsmen I worked in the cottage in its last role, as an annex to Marshall's aircraft drawing office. Before that I believe it belonged to a gentleman, I use this term in its old sense, who spent his last remaining working days in the admin section of the drawing office. My guess to its age is modern, probably 1930's. I would put the date of the photo at 1965/7."

Helen Seeley of Cambridge adds: "I remember going for cycle rides as a child with my father and sister, and we often stopped off at that cottage to buy apples, pears and other fruit and veg from a stall outside the cottage gate. In the photo, the front looked a bit overgrown. I always remember it as having a lovely garden and it was my dream to live in such a cottage one day! Incidentally, I have a book from 1906 on cycle rides around the Cambridge area. It describes the road between Cherry Hinton and Teversham and beyond (now Airport Way) as a dirt track, sometimes impassable, even in the summer!"

"I am a member of Fordham parish church bell ringers and instantly recognised the photo - we have a framed one on the wall in the church tower with all the ringers identified as follows: left to right - Keith Munns, James Morley, Anthony Doggett, Roland Morley, George Rampley (captain) and Claude Sargent.

They were all tower bell ringers as well as handbell and the photo was taken outside the west door of Fordham church probably around Christmas 1950 as it was the tradition until the late 1990's to play Christmas carols on Boxing Day morning around the village, in the pubs, clubs & some local houses as requested" [SCAN]

Mrs B. Challis from Witchford was another eye-witness to the bombs falling on Mill Road bridge in Cambridge during the Second World War. She writes: "I saw them actually coming from the plane. I was going to St George's School on East Road and to get to the air raid shelter we had to go through the boys' playground; the bombs dropped before we got there and my best friend was killed"

Richard Sanders from Stourbridge in the West Midlands was interested in Margery Haigh's picture of children at Milton Road Infant's School, Cambridge (February 18th): "One of the children recognised by Mrs Haigh, Myrtle Bygrave, was my mother. She would probably have been living at 52, Oak Tree Avenue at the time, although the family had lived at Thompson's Lane prior to that. After leaving Milton Road, she went to the Cambridgeshire High School. She later worked at Chivers, the Pathology laboratories in Lensfield Road and then Pye/Philips. She married, had three children, and lived in Haig Road/Elizabeth Way from 1952 until her death in 1993. If my mother was in Miss Clark's class, the photograph would probably have been taken in 1925 or 1926 as she was born in 1921. Regarding Miss Clark, not only did she teach my mother, but also myself, some 28 years later, in 1953/54. Coincidentally, my third year junior school class teacher at Milton Road in 1956/57 was Mrs Cadogan, who is featured in another article on the same page." [REPEAT MILTON ROAD SCHOOL PHOTO FROM FEB 18TH - I DON'T HAVE COPY]

Recently the pages have been full of stories about the proposed revival of the old railway line from Cambridge to St Ives for a guided bus. But just 25 years ago – on 2nd April 1979 – the News was covering the re-establishment of a passenger rail service – albeit only for a day.

The line had been closed to passengers on 3rd October 1970 & the only trains to use it since then carried freight and aggregates from Fen Drayton and oranges to Chivers' factory at Histon. But a now Saturday 'special' was being chartered from British Rail by the East Anglian branch of the Railway Development Society in co-operation with the Cambridge Rail Action Group which wants to see passenger services restored. Every single ticket was sold within five days: "We had to turn away as many people again", said the branch.

But by the time the 13.10 'special' for Cambridge calling at Longstanton, Oakington and Histon arrived at Swavesey it was already a little late. In fact the 50 minute journey took twice as long as the original passenger services on the line because the crossing gates had to be opened and shut manually by the train crew. One of the capital costs of reopening passenger services would be reinstalling automatic gates to remedy this problem. This was common on other lines too; it could take some time before the crossing gates over the A10 Cambridge to Ely Road at Little Thetford could be closed in the face of oncoming traffic when that line too was being used for goods trains. [NEGS 645.79.22 et seq. SCAN STATIONS AT LONGSTANTON c1910, OAKINGTON 1920s, HISTON SIGNAL BOX 1960s & OF RAILWAY GATES AT LITTLE THETFORD]

But 25 years ago no one was complaining at Swavesey. A few minutes extra wait did not seem to matter very much on top of the eight and a half years that had lapsed since the last passenger train pulled up to the platform. Not that there was actually much left of Swavesey station. The station house and offices had all gone, leaving just a few broken seats and a creeper-covered shelter to accommodate the traveller. The man who once lived in the station house at Swavesey, former station master Mr Herbert Wakefield, knew the line well and confirmed that Swavesey and St Ives were always very good passenger stations.

Amongst those waiting for the train was the chairman of Swavesey parish council, Mr Bob Stone, though he didn't make the journey as he didn't get a ticket in time. But the chairman of Longstanton parish council, Mr Jim Young was aboard and when the train stopped at Histon the chairman of their council handed over a letter of support.

Other passengers included neighbours Mrs Sue Watson and Mrs Carol Snelling of Ramsey Road, St Ives. They said they would use the train for shopping as it beat travelling in by bus which took too long and by car, which was difficult and expensive to park. Former county councillor Mrs Ethel Heffer, who had originally fought the closure, used to travel from Swavesey to school in Cambridge by train & was enjoying retracing the journey. Then on journey's end at Cambridge station the Mayor, Coun Alec Molt and his wife were waiting to give the train an official reception.

Although these councillors were convinced of the case for reopening there were others who were less enthusiastic, especially those on the Cambridgeshire County Council which would have to subsidise the reintroduction of passenger services.

Now a quarter of a century later the issue is still being debated. But did you ever travel by train along the route from Cambridge to St Ives, and do you have memories to share?

The pages are also full of stories of a rates-strike by people at Cottenham, which they see as a way of registering their protest against a travellers' site. But 100 years ago the same tactics were being employed by other law-abiding people. Then it was prompted by a change in the Education Act that introduced the teaching of the Prayer Book and the Catechism in schools. Many nonconformists objected to something they considered anathema to their religion and protested by refusing to pay a portion of their education rates.

The council had no option but to take them to court; but it was not a peaceful scene: In Cambridge large crowds packed the entrance to the court and decorum broke down with lusty cheering which the police made no effort to subdue. Even University dons were involved: Professor Sims Woodhead, speaking on behalf of Cambridge Passive Resisters, told magistrates that they were refusing to pay their education rate as they believed the money would be applied to the teaching of religious doctrines with which as Protestants they absolutely disagreed. Supporters in the grand jury gallery and in the space usually occupied by the public applauded.

As the process dragged on eventually the Council sent in the Bailiffs. Sales of goods seized from the Resisters were held at the Cambridge Corn Exchange and despite the presence of a large force of constables, there was a good deal of disturbance, shouting and hissing. It was a complete fiasco: the auctioneer conducted the sale from behind a barrier of corn merchants' desks but the crowd made a determined attempt to break through and would have succeeded but for the very active resistance of the police. Mrs Christine Newman from Cambridge has recalled: "My grandfather was a passive resistor. They had a chair just inside the door called the 'Passive Resisters Chair' and so when the bailiffs came to take some furniture to cover the debt, they always took this chair. Then the resisters went to the sale of their goods and brought the chair back for the money they owed. My aunt told me that nobody but the owner of the chair ever bid for it". [SCAN OF INSIDE OF CORN EXCHANGE 1920's – NB NOT DURING THE PROTESTS]

Nor was it a protest limited to Cambridge. At Newmarket 21 persons were summoned for non-payment of the rate, warrants were issued and the police called at the defendant's homes there to select one or two articles they considered of sufficient value to cover the rate and costs. But when the first sale of goods seized from the passive resisters of St Ives was held near the police station none of the local auctioneers would accept the job so a Peterborough firm was imported to carry out the sale. The appearance of the auctioneer was the sequel for an uproar of groans, hooting and hissing. The sale closed amidst general uproar and the crowd made for the Cromwell Statue for a great demonstration.

It remains to see whether the Cottenham protests are attended with equal excitement.

John Scott from Cherry Hinton writes:

"I can fill in some facts to both the Mill Road bridge bombing and Rose Haie, the beautiful cottage depicted in the picture.

My memories of the first live on clearly today; at that time I was a pupil at the Morley School and cycled to and from Mill Road, number 22, each day. I was returning home on that day, up Argyle St to the bottom of the bridge & had just reached that point when I saw the Bomber, I think a Heinkel 111 k, followed by a Hurricane. Its bomb doors were open, and I saw the bomb released. Needless to say I got well down behind the base of the pillar at the beginning of the bridge. I do not recall the explosion but rather the flying debris and dust. I picked up my bike, and set off over the bridge towards home. I remember an Air Raid warden trying to stop me, who I managed to avoid, saw the damaged houses on my left, and probably broke some cycle speed records. My Mothers reception is my starkest memory; her concern was the state of my school uniform for which I was severely reprimanded!

"Rose Haie, is part of my family history: I built a Hornet Dinghy in the garage on the right in which my brother and I competed with some success. The house was owned either by my Uncle Reuben & his wife Sylvia, or Jesus College for whom he was Head Chef. Reuben and family moved to Kings Hedges Road and it passed to Marshall who demolished it to extend the runway.”

Sid Hunt from Bar Hill has responded to my photo of the Abbey Estate Coronation Party; he was the Boys Brigade Band shown and wonders if anybody has other pictures of the band itself. Richard Doe e-mails to say the picture was taken in Beche Road with the old gas works retort house in the background. He was at Priory School from its opening in 1950 and does not remember any Coronation Party there.

George Sewell from Cambridge writes:

“Recently you mentioned Childerley Gate School and a lady responded with her memories. This school was unique in both of its settings; both were adjacent to the old A45 (now A438) and were distant from any village. I attended this educational establishment from January 1950 until July 1956. I was even taught, as many people were, by Miss Thompson, later Mrs Brightwell, who had taught my mother and in other cases both parents as well of other pupils. I sent the article to my aunts and uncle who attended the school and they have responded with their reminiscences. As this school, on both sites, only existed for 53 years I think some kind of historical record should be made and would welcome the help of past pupils who may have other memories and photographs.”

George can obtain inspiration from the work of Maurice and Sheila Hornsey who have been researching the Cambridge Castle End schools in Victorian times. They have based much of their study on the log books preserved in the County Record Office at Shire Hall and have included examples of the syllabus and examination questions together with notes on some of the individuals who served in the school. A copy of their findings has been deposited in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library

Chimney sweeps seldom find themselves in the headlines but in April 1979 Jock Hall of James Street, Cambridge was being featured in the News.

His home had always been distinctive because of the sign above the door that read:

“University Chimney Sweep”. But now it was unmissable, for it stood alone amidst the rubble of what had been a row of terraced houses, demolished in preparation for the long-discussed and debated new Grafton Centre. [PICTURE FROM NEWS FILES WITH ANOTHER OF A BRUSH EMERGING FROM A CHIMNEY – NB NOT ACTUALLY JOCK’S]

The innards of the neighbouring houses hung from the outside walls and the dust swirled everywhere – not that the neighbours were there to see. They had been moved out some time before to be replaced by squatters who had themselves been moved on just before the bulldozers finally moved in. [SCAN OF SQUATTERS IN JOHN STREET 1972]

The old street that in 1904 had been home to a mixture of the people who kept Cambridge going – laundry ladies & college servants, paperhangers and porters, cowkeepers and undertakers, butchers and plumbers was being redeveloped. Even Morley's pawnbrokers was not immune to change in a changing world though just last week one lady recalled how she called each Monday morning to return her father's Sunday-best suit that had been redeemed the day before. [PHOTO/SCAN OF JAMES STREET 1964 SHOWING MORLEYS, SCAN OF ZEBRA PUB 1920S]

Jock had been a sweep since joining his father working for Kirkup and Sons of King Street. He started his own firm after the war and the 'University' tag dated from the days when he'd swept all the college chimneys, with a fireplace in almost every room. With some 250 in Girton College alone he'd been kept very busy. But by 1979 modern heating methods and smoke control regulations had done away with many of the open fires. But there were still enough to keep the firm going, and they still preferred the traditional chimney sweep's brush.

It was all a very long way from the days of the chimney sweep boy when lads were sent climbing up inside the chimney. Often there were problems: some chimneys were so narrow they had to climb with their arms straight out ahead of them and then when they come down their shirt got rumpled up and they got stuck. Sometimes they had to be cut out, and that could take two hours or more. When the chimney was on fire it presented particular problems. But as a chimney sweep reported to the Cambridge Chronicle back in 1820: The fire is only at the bottom of the chimney and up nearer the top where the soot's alight. The lad'll go up quick to stop himself being singed and with any luck he'll find the blaze further up can be dealt with all right. Sometimes they'll get halfway up and then yell down that it's so hot they can't go no further. Then I have to go out and climb right to the top of the roof, carrying a heavy bucket of water. I pour the water down the chimney - that helps put the fire out - though it can wash the lad out as well

But there would be less call for chimney sweeps in the new James Street. The rebuilt homes would be better, more convenient, warmer – but at least in Jock's case there would still be a fireplace!

Amanda Monks (nee Stone) of Over writes: "Last week's article about the 1979 rail passenger service made me smile. The picture of 'passengers ready to take their seats on the Saturday 'special' at Swavesey' shows myself and two of my sisters at the back of the queue. [REF 162123] The strange thing is I can't actually recall this particular journey. What I do remember very well is nine or ten years previously to that before I started Swavesey Primary School, when my younger sister and I would catch the train from Swavesey Station every Wednesday morning with our mother to meet our grandmother in Eaden Lilley's for coffee. Could the reason for my memory loss of this event be because my sisters and I didn't in fact manage to travel on the train on that Saturday in 1979. You report 'the Chairman of the Swavesey Parish Council, Bob Stone, didn't make the journey as he didn't get a ticket in time' and indeed Bob Stone is our father!"

Alan Beamon from Girton writes to say that there was another trip later from Swavesey to Cambridge and back. He should know: "I had my office in the old Station buildings at Histon reached from the defunct platform, and I opened there in September 1988. I remember it was pouring with rain and the passengers were waiting about six deep under the canopy for the train to arrive. I think it was the Railway Development Society again which organised it, just two diesel carriages, and true to BR form it was late. It was strange that although the Office was visibly open, only one person asked to use the toilet which was, I believe, the former ladies waiting room!"

He's right, the News reported that four trains ran during the day with 500 crammed on Swavesey station for the first of them with another 100 at Longstanton, 200 at Oakington and 100 at Histon, many of whom had to be turned away as the four-carriage train was full. Mrs M. Southon from Cambridge was another eye-witness of the bombing raid on Mill Road bridge in 1941

"It was on a Thursday afternoon. During the war my mother used to go on the bus over the bridge every Thursday afternoon to help my father, Mr Reg Pilbeam, to clean his gents hairdressing saloon which was in Corn Exchange Street, as this was early closing day. She always took my younger sister Mary with her. They had just reached the town when she heard an enormous bang. I was at St Philip's School., Thoday Street, and we were all taken to the air raid shelters which were in the playground. My husband Derek, who is the same age as me, attended the Romsey School and was taken to the shelters across the other side of Coleridge Road. Does anybody have pictures of these or other shelters?

Susan Travers of Sawston has memories of the old Addenbrooke's Hospital and of the nurses who worked there. She writes: "I myself was a patient there in the early 1950s at four years old, having an operation for a hernia caused by me having whooping cough. It was very traumatic, being left there by my father. After the operation I would not take my medicine and can remember being pinched by a nurse to make me swallow it."

Colin Matthews from Bassingbourn wonders if anybody knows the location of an army camp in Cherry Hinton during 1915. He's been trying to find out about it for along time now with no results so far. This might be a military Venereal Diseases Hospital which caused controversy at the time. The papers reported protest at lack of control at this and another establishment at Barnwell. There was talk of insufficient guards allowing patients to escape causing great danger; Barnwell took 750 patients, Cherry Hinton 800. The prejudice even applied to the orderlies who were nursing there; and an autograph book kept by one of them at the Barnwell Hospital which contains poems lamenting the fact that they were a forgotten part of the war effort. There is a photograph showing a line of ambulances making their way along the road, but where was it? [SCAN OF ARMY AMBULANCES IN CHERRY HINTON ROAD WW1 AND POEM]

Lennard Lee has e-mailed to ask whether any Cambridge University student has ever swum across the English Channel; he's involved in a Varsity cross-channel swim this year against Oxford and is keen to know whether he'll be following in anybody else's wake, as it were.

Other people who I've met this week have been recalling topics that might jog memories:

Did you ever work in the engine sheds at Cambridge Station during the days of the steam train; who were the characters you recall and just how dirty was the work? This would need to have been before 1962 when I believe the last steam loco left. And do you have any photos of the railway engine turntable at the station, preferably while it was being used. The Queen Mother paid several visits to Cambridge over the years; but were you amongst the crowds that gathered to watch when she visited the Fitzwilliam Museum in 1975 [SCAN OF QUEEN MOTHER AND ONLOOKERS 1975]

Whilst I was out at Leziate near King's Lynn a lady was recalling the devastation that was caused by a severe hail storm, she thought in 1937. But whereas heavy snow, floods and gales seem to get rooted in the memory, and snapped by photographers, who has pictures of hail, or their own memories of this particular phenomenon?

Memories 14th April 2004, by Mike Petty

Derek Stubbings from Chesterton has kindly sent me his memories of steam locomotive days at Cambridge station in the 1950s, when he was a keen train spotter.

He writes:

“The point rods moved, the signal wires shook and with an audible clank the signal arm went up.

Amongst the dozen or so train spotters beside the railings conversation faltered as all eyes looked towards Cambridge south signal box and the plume of smoke rising behind it. The London express was about to depart, as the train came into view a green B 17 was seen pulling its load of 8 LNER teak coaches carefully across the pointwork onto the up main line. The engine was 2848 ('Arsenal'), a B17 Sandringham class engine in the footballer series, and a Cambridge depot engine on a regular turn.

The service road between the cattle market wall and the railings beside the tracks carried only traffic to the goods shed and very little of that. It was a splendid spot to see all the trains in and out of Cambridge to the south. Main line trains, branch line trains and the long slow moving goods trains provided continual interest, with a wide variety of the steam engines then in use providing the motive power. Between trains the shunting of carriages and goods wagons went on all the time often passing close to the railings.

The signal gantry by Hills Road bridge gave warning of movements and which lines were being used. The signals at the centre of the main platform could be seen and foretold an arrival from the London direction.

This spot, known as Hills Road bridge by the train watching community, was very popular especially so on Newmarket race days. After the races finished the several special trains followed each other at short intervals, taking the crowds of race goers back to Kings Cross. The great interest to the engine spotters was the motive power as Kings Cross shed sent the big LNER Pacific express engines to haul these heavy trains, often 10 or 12 coaches long. These engines were not often seen at Cambridge in normal service so each were viewed with special interest. Appropriately many of these superb engines were named after famous race horses – 'Papyrus' was frequently seen.

The long summer days allowed railway engineers to carry out work on the tracks and if this was done between Hitchin and Peterborough all the Northern main line trains to and from Kings Cross were diverted via Cambridge and Ely at weekends. Services were frequent (but did not stop at Cambridge) and hauled by a variety of locomotives not usually seen at Cambridge. These trains always attracted lots of local people to watch the continuous passing of the famous named trains (the 'Flying Scotsman', the 'Dalesman' etc.) with their carriage roof destination boards.

The familiar LNER green engines were seen less and less as the Britannia class BR standard engines took over, joined later by the diesel engines, especially the Deltics with their fine looks and distinctive engine notes.

The East Anglian region was the first to receive the Britannia engines. Good looking and powerful with names relating to our area – 'Boadicea', 'Hereward the Wake', 'Oliver Cromwell', with 'Britannia' itself leading the class and bringing a new interest to local train services.

The northern end of Cambridge station complex was just a popular with train watchers but the views and interest were different. From Devonshire Road railway staff had a footbridge giving access to the engine sheds, workshops and staff rooms over the busy rails in and out of the depot. This bridge was private and much frequented by those interested in all the engine movements continually taking place.

Provided you behaved yourself the railway accepted your interest and presence on the footbridge, which gave excellent views of the engines on the shed and those coming and going for turning and coaling.

Trains arriving from the Ely direction could be seen as could the signals on Mill Road bridge. Main line trains from London stopped at this end of Cambridge station when the newly arrived engine (perhaps a 'Claud', a 4.4.0. engine D/16 class) would then leave the train, go forward under Mill Road bridge and a few minutes later pass under your feet for attention. Then, if the train was going on, a new engine would back down from the engine siding onto the train, then away to Ely and probably Kings Lynn, and in days now long gone onto Hunstanton.

From this footbridge the turntable and coaling plant were easily seen and looking the other way was the Dump. Here were stored the engines currently out of use for some reason, perhaps awaiting repair in the workshops. .

Today Cambridge station is not much changed but the surrounding are. The engine shed and yard with the turn table and coaling plant have disappeared, much of the goods yards have been redeveloped. Two and four coach sets provide most services under the wires; these have their own interest but it is low, especially when compared with the days of steam which so many of us older citizens remember and why these memories have been committed to paper."

[PHOTOS AND SCANS OF STEAM TRAINS AT CAMBRIDGE STATION]

Derek is by no means alone in his love of steam trains; the News snapped a group of youngsters at Barnwell junction station in 1965 [PHOTO/SCAN OF CHILDREN 1965 AND STEAM LOCO AT BARNWELL JUNCTION STATION IN 1950s] while back in May 1938 Capt Cyril Hatfield one of hundreds of people who made their way to Cambridge station to witness an exhibition of various types of locomotives and rolling stock staged in aid of Addenbrooke's Hospital. Amongst the locomotives was the "Green Arrow", "Coffee Pot" and the "Papyrus" that Derek recalled. But there was also a breakdown crane, electric cooking restaurant car, a banana van and even some Italian and German wagons. Those attending were encouraged to bring their cameras, for there was a prize of two guineas for the best snap. Capt Hatfield took several views which are now preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Lion Yard Library. But do you have others amongst your photo albums? [SCAN OF HATFIELD VIEW OF CROWDS AT DISPLAY; SCAN OF PROGRAMME OF EXHIBITION]

Dick Smith from Cottenham has discovered a much older memento of the Cambridge steam engine days; its far too ancient for anybody to see themselves but somebody may be able to give a clue as to the date and names of any of the men shown. The visible part of the engine number plate reads 'Great Eastern Railway' and the first two digits are '04..' [SCAN OF OLD PIC OF TRAIN]

Lennard Lee's request for information on any undergraduates who may have swum the channel has brought a quick response from Catharine Walston. She e-mails to say that in 1949 Philip Mickman, then a schoolboy from Ossett near Wakefield, became the youngest person to swim the channel. He then came up to Trinity Hall in 1952 and repeated his feat at the age of 21. He died a couple of years ago but is still remembered by college staff and alumni

Madge Close from Fen Drayton has been sorting out her boxes and come across a photo of a staff outing at Homerton College sometime in the mid 1930s. She recognises her sister Wyn

Memories 21st April 2004, by Mike Petty

This week four readers have mentioned the River Lane area of Cambridge, between Newmarket Road and the Cam.

The first was Alan Thompson who e-mailed with more details of a photo of Coronation celebrations on the Abbey Estate in 1953 that I featured in Memories on 17th March. [SCAN OF PROCESSION.]He says the photo was taken at the River Lane end of Beche Road, and the building in the background is the old Cokeing plant of the Gas works. In the front of the fancy dress procession are two cowboys, the one in the lighter outfit was Brian Holbrook who now lives in Cwmbran; then on the left, the gentleman with his hands in his suits pockets is Mr Ernie Wilderspin. Carole Hillen (nee Wilderspin) of Newmarket Road also remembers the event, recalling that the children marched behind the Boys Brigade band to the party at the Brunswick School where there was a mighty tea for over 100 kids from the estate, and all received a coronation mug. Alan has other photographs of the tea party which were taken by Percy North who had a chiropody practice on Newmarket Road

I had the privilege of knowing Percy J North. He had a memory as sharp as the photographs he took. He could sit and recall the names of tradesmen in the shops around Burleigh Street as they were in the days of his youth, nearly a century before. His memory was not only of names but sounds - the calls of the traders who hawked their wares around the small streets off East Road. Cries such as 'Jam jars or bottels' encouraged children to bring such containers to be exchanged for a paper windmill, the lavender girl attracted their older brothers, the trotter man none at all.

He could also recall the sounds of the great Midsummer Fair, held on the common almost opposite his Newmarket Road chiropodist's premises. Percy saw it change from the days when horse-drawn caravans were strewn across the grass and the drinking booths by the river thumped to the sound of heavy dancing. Nearby would be the cockle and whelk stalls where Mrs Hames used to have a great boiler of hot peas - an old halfpenny a basin. Nearby too was the Red Cross tent where North and his colleagues administered to the innumerable accidents and illnesses, sprains, monkey bites and air gun slugs which afflicted the visitors and fairground people alike. [SCAN PEA STALL MIDSUMMER FAIR – NB NOT HAMES AND NOT TAKEN BY NORTH]

All these presented no problems to the man who had joined the St John Ambulance brigade in 1902, transferring to the Red Cross at the beginning of the Great War - the first man in Cambridge to don the uniform. During the next War he was commandant in charge of stretcher parties at Addenbrooke's Hospital and saw every casualty caused by the raids over the city.

He enjoyed many hobbies: music - at one time having his own orchestra – needlework, oil painting and antiques - he was able to tell the story of each of the items in his mini-museum which ranged from old lemonade bottles to clocks and fine furniture. But his main love was photography. Percy North made a photographic survey of the back streets off Newmarket Road, recording the dereliction and demolition of an area that he could people with memory and recollection. Many of these snaps he passed to the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library where they constitute a magnificent record of the changing face of this area of Cambridge.

Although blinded by an attack of shingles when he was 90 years old he remained independent, preparing his own food and baking his own bread until his death in 1983, five months short of his 100th birthday. [SCAN OF VARIOUS OF HIS PICTURES; CEN PICTURE OF HIM]

Percy could doubtless have answered some of the other questions raised last week. Whilst speaking to a meeting at East Barnwell two ladies recalled a wartime incident that seems not to have attracted much publicity. They were living in River Lane and recall a German plane coming over the Gas Works firing its machine guns. Joyce Griffiths remembers she was helping to get in the washing at about lunchtime and the bullets hit the top of their roof while Joan White recalls that a Hurricane was soon on the scene and went after it. But neither is sure when this was. Can anybody else recall it?

The previous evening I'd had the pleasure of meeting members of the Cambridge branch of the Royal Air Force Benevolent Association when George Blows asked an obvious question – why should Drummer Street be called that name? According to Ronald Gray and Derek Stubbings' book, 'Cambridge street-names, their origins and associations' (CUP) it goes back to at least 1248 when it was called 'Drusemere', probably meaning 'muddy pool'. The authors comment that the shape of the present bus station is still pool-like. George also believes that he knows the probable owner of a motorbike snapped at the Drummer Street bus station shortly after it opened. He thinks it belonged to James Scott, photographer with the firm of Scott and Wilkinson who had their premises in St Andrew's Street. He was a photographer during the Great War and had connections with the Royal Flying Corps. But do you have more details of this or other early Cambridge photographers. [SCAN OF DRUMMER STREET AND MOTORBIKE 63.74]

Another one of the topics of conversation was coal merchants and this seems something that might make another 'Memories' article – but only if you can share your memories or snaps. I have one of a line of coal trucks belonging to Wardales who had the premises in Trafalgar Road and we could recall other names such as Coote and Warren & Shelford Corn and Coal but there must be more and there must be tales. Please help. [SCAN WARDALE COAL TRUCKS 1920s - 88.32]

My mention of Jock Hall in Memories of 7th April has brought letters from his son, John. He writes: "I was very surprised to open the paper at your Memories page to find the photograph of my late father, Jock Hall, the chimney sweep, taken in James Street in 1979. I actually made the 'University Chimneysweep' sign above the door. My father was born in 1900 and worked hard all his life. I remember when he used to go to work at 6 am each morning on his carrier bike to sweep the chimneys. Later a cycle master was fitted to the back wheel and finally he had a van which was so much easier. My two brothers worked with him. Jock had many stories to tell. One comes to mind of the lady who came to order the sweep and asked if she could have a word with him. When my father told her that he was the sweep the poor lady was so surprised and explained that she expected him to be black because of the soot. To this he replied 'Madam I do have a bath every day, after I have finished work!' Jock kept on working until he was in his early 80s and lived to be 86. He was a real character of Cambridge"

The article also prompted Terry Reynolds to write from Over; he says it brought back childhood memories: "Mr Hall and his family lived in Burleigh Place in a small semi next to a man we all knew as Soupy Barrett. Mr Hall's son Derrick used to play with my brothers and me as our house at 28 Gold Street had a back gate to Burleigh Place. We later moved onto East Road when my father carried on the rock and sweet business from my grandfather in the 1950s."

Mrs Doris Cole from Chesterton writes following my mention of one of the Queen Mother's visits to Cambridge. She recalls: "I did a little job at Christ's College serving the evening meals for the undergraduates and the Manageress asked me if I would come in as the Queen Mother was coming for lunch. She sat at the top stable and although I didn't serve her I could see her very plainly. Afterwards we had to stand in a group outside and she walked round to thank us for a delightful meal. I remember she wore a lovely diamond brooch which shone in the sun". Doris has lent me a picture of herself and the other staff as they waited to be presented. Do you recognise anybody [SCAN OF CHRIST'S COLLEGE KITCHEN STAFF]

Peter Starling from Girton believes he can help locate the site of the first world war military hospital near Cherry Hinton. He writes: "I was born in Perne Road, a few doors from what is now The Ancient Mariner public house. In those days it was a field and a chalk path from the site crossed the bottom of our garden. During the early 1940s when I used to play in the field there were still the foundations of what I always understood to have previously been a hospital.

Percy North would have known for sure!

Memories 28th April 2004, by Mike Petty

Newmarket is a town that has been attracting visitors for centuries; and where there are visitors there are people providing services for them – hoteliers, public houses, shops, and postcard publishers.

In March 1904 the News reported: "Newmarket is being well catered for in the way of pictorial postcards. A delightful set of six views in colour has been issued by Mr Ernest Parr, stationer. Having seen them one can well understand the enormous success with which they have been received. The cards are selling at the rate of 250 a day. The series includes views of St Mary's church, horses returning from a morning gallop, the royal entrance to the Jockey-Club grounds and the High Street on market day". [SCANS OF NEWMARKET HIGH STREET SHOWING CAR AND SHOWING BICYCLE – NB NOT BY PARR]

Now Newmarket Local History Society is staging a major exhibition of old postcards in the town's Library. They are part of the collection of one man, Roger Newman who was born and educated in Newmarket and for many years has been acquiring images from every available source, including the internet and postcard auctions. He has tracked down over 800 cards from which the Society has made over 300 good-quality colour copies to make it easier to see details. Some of the rarer ones are now quite expensive and while a few go back to the earliest days of postcards most were taken by Sherborn during the late 19th and early 20th century. In addition there are several Comic Cards, one of which emphasises the sporting side of Newmarket – searching out bed bugs, mice and other pests in hotel rooms! [SCAN OF CARTOON CARD]

But Roger's collection includes topics of interest outside Newmarket itself. There are pictures of the Beta airship that took place in the army manoeuvres of 1912 and of troops based in the town during the Great War together with views of the various railway stations that will appeal to the transport historian. [SCAN OF PASSENGERS LEAVING STATION]

There is also a most interesting picture of an early motor car surrounded by onlookers. To track down its history I turned to Andrew Murkin's 'Illustrated tour of Burwell', a magnificent pictorial history published not in book form, but on CD-Roms.

The picture recorded an historical occasion in Cambridgeshire: the removal of one of the last turnpike toll gates at Burwell in December 1905. During the 1800s the landscape of many local parishes was altered forever by Inclosure Acts. When the commissioners surveyed Fordham in 1809 they decided it would be appropriate to construct a new road to Burwell. The Burwell commissioners agreed when their turn came in 1814. But when the new road was finally laid out it became clear that right in the middle of the route was a stretch of private land owned by Sir Vincent Cotton. He erected a tollgate and demanded payment from anybody passing through. Agreement was reached that if the villagers kept the road in good order they would be able to go through at a charge of only 1d, but he could charge other people what he liked.

The gate continued long after others had ceased and was a subject of constant complaint. In 1899 A.J. Wyatt wrote to the News: "Sir – I was cycling from Cambridge to Soham and between Burwell and Fordham I came suddenly upon a closed and barred gate, which I was kindly permitted to pass through on paying a toll of twopence. I learned that the gate is called the Ness Gate, that the roadway at this point is Crown property. In its present position this gate is a danger to cyclists but its very existence is a ridiculous and monstrous anomaly with its toll of 1d for every vehicle hailing from Burwell and 4d for every vehicle coming from less favoured districts. It is a very unfortunate circumstance that this piece of road is rented by the vice-chairman of the County Council"

Negotiations were started to have the toll removed once and for all. The Newmarket Rural District and Cambridgeshire County Councils each agreed to pay £250, but the remaining £100 was to be found by public donations. The chairman of the Newmarket R.D.C., William Ambrose undertook to organise this collection and Newmarket Member of Parliament Charles Rose, a racehorse owner and Jockey Club member, undertook to make up the balance if insufficient funds were forthcoming.

But there were no difficulties, and on 1st December 1905 a large number of people made their way to witness the final rites. There were speeches before the photographers moved in to record the final moments. One picture was taken of Mr Ambrose paying the last toll to the gatekeeper with a brand new 6d. Then the gate was lifted off its hinges and photographed in mid air and the gateposts undermined. The gate had gone and the road was open forever. But was it? Somebody seems to have had the idea of another picture, this one of Charles Rose M.P. in his motor car. The vehicle was manoeuvred into place, and his supporters gathered round, but if you study the postcard in Roger's collection it does seem that the post has been stuck back in the hole temporarily just for the record! [SCAN OF PAYING THE LAST TOLL; SCAN OF THE MOTOR CAR]

Modern roads permitting Roger Newman will be travelling down from his home in Stafford to perform the opening ceremony at Newmarket library on Tuesday 4th May at 11 a.m. after which the exhibition will continue for the rest of the month.

Basil Beavis from Stapleford has contacted me to say that he remembers the railway exhibition of 1938 that I featured in Memories 14th April. Janet Ingle from Gt Shelford has sent her memories of the Outpatients Department of the old Addenbrooke's Hospital, now Browns' Restaurant. She writes: "Who can recall the red flecked stone floor in that vast hall, the long wooden benches filled with those facing the long wait to see specialists in the small consulting rooms? I can remember the Women's Royal Voluntary Service – then the W.V.S. presence there, 50 years ago. In a dark corner near the dispensary two ladies stood behind a counter. Two iron kettles simmered on two gas rings. There were white cups and saucers and plates of current or long iced buns housed under clear plastic covers. There was little else as food was rationed still. The washing up was done at a small sink in an enamel bowl. Despite the drab surroundings and limited fare the W.V.S. ladies were much appreciated as patients had many miles to travel and long hours before they returned home again. So much has changed and present visitors to the W.R.V.S. restaurant in the current Addenbrooke's outpatients department remark how impressive the new makeover and extension is, how bright is the décor and how up-to-the-minute are the new uniforms. But one thing that doesn't seem to change is the need of that welcome cup of tea after a stressful day at the Hospital" [PIC FROM NEWS FILES]

Were you a wartime bride? Kasie Davies has e-mailed from Imago Productions, a television company in Norwich. She's working on a documentary for Anglia tv and is trying to track down any couples who met during the war and are still together, living in Cambridge. Ideally the man would be an American pilot who fell head over heels for an East Anglian girl. If you fit the bill then phone her on 01603 727600 or e-mail Kasie@imagoproductions.tv

A recent television series 'Restoration' concentrated on buildings in danger of demolition but Brian Bowles from Cambridge has his own memories of one that disappeared nearly 50 years ago.

Impington Hall was begun about the middle of the 16th Century by John Pepys and was well-known to the most famous member of that family, Samuel. He was always glad to go there knowing he would be guaranteed a fine time. His diary records several visits: on August 3rd 1661 he wrote: "At Cambridge at night I took horse and rode with Roger Pepys and his two brothers to Impington".

Another visitor was the Milton antiquarian William Cole who recorded this description in 1774: "At a small distance from Impington Church, and South of it, stands a very elegant seat of seven windows in front and built of brick, belonging to Mr. Pepys, adorned with beautiful gardens and canals about it. I long had a mind to see the house as every one praised it, and it pleased me much and is the best of the sort I ever saw. A noble hall, with two Corinthian pillars on one side of it, is in the centre. On one side a dining-parlour, kitchen, etc. On the other an elegant dining-room and drawing room, and by the hall a most beautiful saloon and staircase, with an open space to the top of the house with a gallery into which all the bedchambers have entrance - the whole elegantly fitted up and furnished"

The building was improved in 1862 when a rich undergraduate spent a fortune remodelling the Tudor mansion, adding a new wing, and emulating the lifestyle of his fellow student, the Prince of Wales. It was later sold to the Macfarlane-Grieve family and in 1909 a new library was built out from the north western front

Brian has a copy of the sale brochure for the auction of Impington Park Estate in May 1921. The House was still substantially what it has been for the last 300 years. It had a fine entrance hall with a handsome Carton Pierre ceiling, elaborately carved overmantle supported by Griffins, a drawing room with another fine ceiling with a moulding of a fen eagle, an oak-panelled dining room and library. The main staircase with carved balusters led up to a handsome gallery, billiard room and six principal bedrooms with another seven on the floor above. It had central heating with radiators in the principal rooms, running water and cesspool drainage.

When the estate was bought by the Chivers family the hall became an educational centre for its employees. During the Second World War it was requisitioned as a billet for companies of Royal Engineers with Italian prisoners-of-war housed in Nissen huts in the overgrown gardens.

By the time the war was over Nikolaus Pevsner found it neglected and derelict and its renovation was deemed impracticable. An expert from the Royal Commission on Historical Monuments was invited to inspect the remains of the building and declared that none of the interior decoration was of particular interest, except the ceiling in the south Drawing Room. This was offered to Magdalene College but they had nowhere to put it. The library fittings were removed and presented to the Perse Boys' School, some of the door pediments went to Pinewood Studios but the rest was of no interest to anybody in that immediate post-war period. But such an important site could not be left unused so the building was gutted to the outer walls and converted it to a grain-drying and storage plant for Chivers Farms. Forty years later the site was sold to developers who built the present Percheron Close.

Brian discovered the Mansion in 1950 when it had fallen into a state of disrepair. It was possible for anyone to enter and he did, many times, climbing in through the windows and wandering around the ruined building, relishing its unforgettable timeless atmosphere. On several occasions he took his Kodak box-brownie camera and snapped many of the interesting features that remained.

His photographs survive and remain a most valuable record of the final days of one of Cambridgeshire grandest houses. [SCANS OF BRIAN BOWLES' PICTURES OF IMPINGTON HALL]

More readers remember the German plane machine gunning near the Cambridge gas works as recalled by Joyce Griffiths and Joan White (Memories 21st April)

Mr W.R. Chamberlain from Foxton also saw it: "I was on Pye sports field and took cover near the pavilion where there was some sand bag protection. No air raid warning was given. I think a Home Guard fired at it, and had a quick reply. It was reported that a dog was injured"

Joyce Mansfield (nee Phillips) from Cambridge writes: "I too can remember a German plane flying low over me as I stood in the back garden at my home in Ferry Path. This happened in broad daylight so the markings on the plane were clearly visible. I was a pupil at Milton Road Junior School and the boy pupils also saw it because there were arguments next day as to its identity." She also recalls knitting for the troops using khaki wool under the supervision of two teachers, Miss Spall and Miss Tredgett and collecting all sorts of scrap metal. Their hard work was recognised in a picture that appeared in the CDN in July 1940. [SCAN OF PHOTO FROM NEWS 11 JULY 1940]

John Beynon from Haslingfield tells me that the late Annie Woods kept a daily diary throughout most of the war years. "As a poultry-keeper it was natural that Annie's Monday mornings were taken up by regular visits to the Cambridge Cattle Market, then located at the top end of Cherry Hinton Road, behind Rustat Road. It was there that she and many others saw a sight that would be imprinted on their memories – a low-flying German warplane. The aircraft was a Dornier Do 215 which made a number of low passes over Cambridge and Marshall's airfield whilst machine-gunning streets in the vicinity of the gas works" Annie's diary records: "Monday 30th December 1940: "German bomber came over Cambridge Cattle Market three times. Dropped seven bombs Waterbeach. Machine gunned street and Gas Works".

But although we may have solved one mystery John Betson from the Ditton Fields area of Cambridge has sparked another. He recalls that about 1944, when he was about 12 years old, there was a rumour that a military Red Cross train would be coming in to Barnwell Junction station. Like a number of other lads he made his way there to see a fleet of single and double-decker buses lined up. The train arrived and a number of soldiers were disembarked. The walking wounded were put in the double-deckers and taken to the Leys School which was then a military hospital, while the stretcher cases went into the single-deckers and were taken off to Addenbrooke's Hospital. The soldiers were pleased to be home; they showered the children with chocolate and one threw his helmet to them, saying he would not need it any more. Military Police soon rounded up the souvenirs but John remembers it was a paratrooper's helmet. But he does not know where the men had been; was it Arnhem, the 'bridge too far', he wonders?

Mrs Betty Butler from Cambridge writes following a picture of G. Wardale & sons' coal trucks (Memories 21st April): "He was my grandfather and my dad was one of his six sons who worked in the coal business. The trucks were sent to the sidings at Barnwell Junction from the Nottingham coal pits and then dad and his brothers unloaded the coal, bagged it up and loaded the lorries. My brother and I often went to watch and spent many happy hours there. I went with dad sometimes on his rounds, mainly to the villages around Cambridge. It was a lovely surprise to see this photo; I shall treasure it." [SCAN OF WARDALE COAL TRUCKS]

Betty Sanderson from Cottenham has lent me some photos of steam trains at Cambridge station. Her husband, Ron, was a signaller for 42 years. He started at the goods depot in Hills Road and Brooklands Avenue on his demobilisation from the forces in 1942, working at

Chesterton Junction, Oakington and Trumpington signal boxes as well as doing relief work at Foxton and Newport before ending up at the power box on Hills Road bridge. Both their sons are now train drivers having started as traction trainees and at one time working on the goods trains on the St Ives lines. [SCAN OF TRAIN AT TRUMPINGTON SIGNAL BOX]

Memories 12th May 2004 by Mike Petty

The news that Sir Arthur Marshall is to be made as A FREEMAN OF CAMBRIDGE RATHER THAN THE FREEDOM – PLEASE CHECK - prompts thoughts of other recipients of such civic recognition.

One was General Horatio Kitchener best known for the ‘Your country needs you’ poster of the Great War but then celebrated as the hero who had revenged the death of General Gordon at Khartoum. The proceedings in November 1898 started quietly enough: he arrived by train and was conveyed to the Guildhall by carriage through streets decorated with flags and bunting but only a few cheering spectators - the weather was blamed for the small turnout.

The front of the Guildhall itself was barricaded, the vestibule smothered under palms and plants, the steps were carpeted and drapery hid the unattractive walls. The floor of Large Hall was covered in crimson cloth and adorned with green and yellow drapery. It was packed with councillors and those those fortunate ratepayers who had been able to get tickets. On the stage was a table bearing a beautiful casket, especially designed by Mr G Munsey the jeweller, in which lay the scroll conferring the Freedom of the Borough.

Suddenly Lord Kitchener was there amongst them together with the Mayor, George Kett, whose speech was of great difficulties cheerfully overcome and the glory of the British Empire. Then it was over and Kitchener was gone off to inspect the Guard of Honour formed by 50 members of the 3rd (Cambs) Volunteer Battalion of the Suffolk Regiment.

Whilst the Mayor and Aldermen could relax another section of Cambridge was preparing. For next it was to be the turn of the University to honour the hero. Already Kings Parade was packed and undergraduates had taken their places high in the Senate House where they found a hosepipe to spray water to cool the temper of the distinguished gathering down below, already annoyed by their chants and songs such as “The Soldiers of the Queen” repeated endlessly. Cheers from outside announced Kitchener’s arrival, drowning the cries of pain and distress of undergraduates crushed when the great railings around the Senate House were pushed over by sheer weight of numbers. There were more speeches of praise, this time in Latin (and accompanied by student comments), before the procession moved off, his carriage pulled by undergraduates as far as Christ’s college where a contingent of police could not prevent the crowds surging through. Later students sought anything that would burn - handcarts, goal posts, fences from the Backs and much of the Christ’s Pieces bandstand to feed the flames of a bonfire on Market Hill. Next morning the centre of the town had all the appearance of having been in the hands of a mob, many cartloads of debris being removed from the bonfire site. [SCAN OF CROWDS ON MARKET HILL, I WILL TRY TO FIND OTHERS]

Such bonfires were a traditional way of celebrating major events, as Julie Langford from Fenstanton can show. She was sorting through her husband’s late uncle’s house when she discovered an old photograph taken on Midsummer Common on May 17th 1900. What was its story, she wondered.

At that time people were keeping an anxious eye on the news from the battle zones, then in South Africa. A Cambridge man had been amongst those trapped in Ladysmith; Sergt-Major F. Ingle of the Imperial Light Horse, who previously worked for Messrs Eaden Lilley, wrote to his brother. “Only by going into every house, hole or corner, could you be lucky enough to find someone who had found in some unexpected place, a small amount of food that had been mislaid or forgotten". The news of the lifting of the siege was the occasion for great rejoicing in Cambridge and undergraduates distracted draw police attention from the market place long enough to light a bonfire, fuelling it by burning the wooden framework of the stalls. The bandstand on Christ's Pieces was attacked again and the seats removed to the market and quickly consumed. Other damage followed and a number of undergraduates were arrested and convicted by the Cambridge magistrates, though others pointed out that most of the windows were broken by townspeople and over 1,200 petitioned the Home Secretary for a pardon. [CARTOON POSTCARD OF BONFIRE BATTLE]

It was not the end of military problems overseas, for Robert Baden-Powell and his men were trapped in Mafeking. When the news of their release broke cheering crowds took to the streets of Cambridge once more. In an effort to prevent a repetition of the previous disturbances the Borough Surveyor had arranged for a huge bonfire to be constructed on Midsummer Common using piles of builders' materials, boxes and other fuel from local tradesmen. This is what Julie's picture shows [SCAN OF BONFIRE ON MIDSUMMER COMMON]

Every precaution was taken to keep it safe and special constables built a fence around it. There were various attempts to set it on fire prematurely: one young man procured a box of matches, lighted them and then threw the burning mass on the brushwood. The police promptly scaled the fence and extinguished the flames.

People poured in as thousands from the country flocked to Cambridge and several streets were rendered well night impassable. But the crowds were orderly and the police had no difficulty regulating the traffic. Cambridge celebrated the relief of Mafeking right nobly and peacefully.

It could not be repeated once the Cambridge Volunteers came home. Many had responded to the call to arms in January 1900 and travelled by train and boat to South Africa. They had endured long hot marches, interspersed with long hot boring periods of inactivity and the occasional spell of excitement. It was September when they really saw action, getting near enough to the Boers to fire their rifles, and three days later in the chief incident of their campaign they captured a hill-top camp and held on to it for three days without rations. Everything else was anticlimax. More long marches, more waiting, a little more excitement at the turn of the year, and then home by coal truck and cattle boat, home to the great celebrations that Cambridge had planned its returning heroes.

Traffic was banned, shops were shut, and flags flew as both town & gown Volunteers in their khaki were escorted by other Volunteers in scarlet tunics before attempting the final march from the station into town. It was prove one of the most dangerous of their entire campaign. Every inch of space was occupied and walls, fences, balconies, windows & roads were packed. Near the Senate House a contingent of mounted police were drafted in but without avail. In the chaotic crush people were subjected to suffocating pressure and a bandsman was seen fighting for his life, using his drumsticks as weapons.

Somehow they squeezed into Gt St Mary's for a service, thence to the Guildhall where they were admitted Honorary Freemen of the Borough and into a Corn Exchange laid out as a banqueting hall for a meal of lamb, turkey and ox followed by African Gateau and Kimberley Jelly. Meanwhile the streets of Cambridge saw the traditional "rag, "Mob law on the common and the Market Place" read the headlines over stories of battle, charge and countercharge that resulted in more casualties amongst the participants than had been suffered by the Heroes they had gathered to honour. [SCAN OF SCENE IN GUILDHALL AND DETAIL OF MAYOR AND COUNCILLORS, SCAN OF THE OFFICIAL ANNOUNCEMENT]

Others have followed in their footsteps including American servicemen in August 1945 and the men of the Cambridgeshire Regiment in 1946. It was in recognition of their service in the South African War, for its superb professionalism during the fighting in Flanders in the Great War and for its latest valiant fight in the Far East and the years of captivity that had followed. Now there was flag waving and a particular flag had place of honour on the Guildhall flagpole – it was the blue flag of the 1st Battalion of the Cambridgeshire Regiment that had somehow been kept hidden from their captives during the long years of captivity. As the procession wended its way down Petty Cury it was the drums that marked their progress. And amongst the drums were some emblazoned with the Regiment's honours won in earlier wars but lost in the fall of Singapore. Amazingly they had been found by a Dullingham girl, Mary Taylor, during her work with the Red Cross and shipped back to Cambridge.

In October 1946 they led the old men of the First War and prematurely old boys from the Second to the Guildhall to receive the Freedom they had fought to preserve. [NEWS REPORT OF THE FREEDOM FOR THE AMERICANS, CAMBRIDGESHIRE REGIMENT MEN ASSEMBLE IN FRONT OF GUILDHALL 1946]

Memories 19th May 2004 by Mike Petty

One of Cambridgeshire's former railway lines, that from Cambridge to Mildenhall features in the May issue of Britain's leading historical railway journal, 'Back Track' to which Geoffrey Skelsey has contributed a detailed eight-page article on the goods traffic received at Isleham station.

He has examined a rare survival of the mass of railway paperwork that used to be produced: the Goods Delivery Book between 1893 and 1894 in which railway officials working at the Isleham booking office by the light of a dim light of an oil lamp jotted down each consignment. They recorded each crate of soap, hamper of grocery, cask of vinegar, kilderkin of beer or bag of bacon received at the station. Careful analysis shows that the principal commodities included Yarmouth bloaters, cattle feed, wallpaper and paint but there were also more unusual items – a harmonium, a piano, a sewing machine and a kitchen range amongst them.

The railway's main user was John James Rudland of High Street Isleham, who not only sold grocery and drapery but also traded as a wine and spirit merchant and a corn, flour and offal salesman. He accounted for a fifth of all inwards transactions at the station.

The records paint the picture of a country goods station in its heyday, receiving items from all parts of the country. Some came from far afield with consignments from Millwall Dock, Stratford Market, Birmingham and Liverpool. But more came from places just down the line such as Fordham, Soham or Burwell for in those days, and indeed still, Isleham was an isolated community with only narrow roads. But once motor transport became reliable, and Mr Rudland shut up shop, then the station saw its trade decline and long before it closed for general traffic in 1962 almost all of the business had disappeared.

It was a story repeated elsewhere. John Humphreys, the fenland historian from Bottisham, recorded his schooldays memories of the goods trains at Sutton station in his book 'A countryman's year' (David and Charles 1996)

“We called her the Fenland Flyer, the little train which puffed its way through a string of fen villages stopping at the market towns. On a busy day she came through my village as often as twice. We had a proper railway station with platform and all, an office marked 'Station Master', a garden of blazing summer flowers, frilly wooden canopy over-head and our village name blazoned on a white board, as if anyone did not know where they were. In summer that train bore the heavy responsibility of taking our produce to market. Many folk with cottage gardens or an acre of land worked hard to make a few pounds from their labour. The train would stand hissing to itself in the station while on the platform stood a cornucopia of punnets of strawberries, bundles of chrysanthus, baskets of runner beans and trays of eggs. The door of the single waggon was slid back with much clanking of bolts and our few bits of produce safely stowed inside. By the time it reached the market town it was full of flowers and vegetables, each offering identified with a label showing the owner's name and address. Within a week a cheque for often no more than a few shillings came through the post. In those thrifty days every little helped with straitened family budgets. Now and then you could make a killing if you had something which was in short supply. If your beans were a week early, if you happened on a good stand of field mushrooms or a batch of early goose eggs, prices doubled, but it did not last long. Soon everyone else was in full production. There were quiet times when there might be only a couple of baskets to collect, together with the usual four milk churns which stood on the platform like dumpy silver policemen. The driver would not go to the trouble of unlocking and heaving back the heavy doors of the waggon; instead he stood the churns on his footplate and took the few baskets of produce into the cab with him. The fireman stoked the boiler, black smoke billowed, the Flyer gave a peremptory whistle and chugged on to the next village and more churns and baskets. By the time it reached the town the engine resembled a travelling harvest festival.”

Arthur Randell described the reason for the decline of the goods train in his ‘Fenland Railwayman’ (Routledge 1968). “In about 1926 or 1927 a big lorry arrived one day and parked just outside our goods yard gate (at Waldersea, near Wisbech). Presently one of the fruit agents began to stop some of the lorries which were coming down the road bringing strawberries for us to load, and we saw the fruit being transferred to the parked lorry. 'That's a bit of cheek,' said Mr Jordan, the Station-master, while some of the porters remarked that the fruit would be in a fine state by the time it got to Sheffield market - it would be like so much pulp, after being jolted all that way on the road. 'Well' said one of them as we watched the lorry drive away, 'I'm sure we shan't see that again'. But we did, for that lorry came every day, and from then on our loadings began to dwindle. The next year brought two or three lorries and by 1930 we were only getting half the fruit we were used to handling. Then lorries which up to then had been used to bring sugar beet down to the goods yard began to take it themselves to the factories. The same thing happened in the case of potatoes, so that instead of loading twenty or thirty trucks a day we were only loading ten or twelve”

The steam locomotives gave way to less-attractive diesel engines and then, in the 1960s came the wholesale closures of small village stations. Some of the buildings were converted into homes, others to industrial uses, more – like that at Sutton - disappeared altogether. Often the railway lines were removed and the land on which they had run sold off to landowners on either side. Sometimes they were left as a reminder of a transport system once so important that was displaced by the motor car and lorry but whose memory will never quite go away.

Basil Beavis from Stapleford has memories of an incident at Shelford station during the war when a train came off the line and caught the engine of a goods train, pushing it over on to its side. Do you have more details. [SCAN OF LOCOMOTIVE AT SHELFORD IN 1920S]

Patricia Cooper from Rushden in Northamptonshire e-mails:

“My cousin David from Cherry Hinton sent me your article of 28th April 2004. I have so many lovely memories of my childhood with my parents & grandparents, who told me of their memories when they were young & living in Cambridge. I was born in Silverwood Close in November 1944. My sister Ann & I went to the Brunswick School before our parents moved to Shelford Road. We then went to Fawcett Infant's school, where Miss Hinkins was the head teacher. On graduating to the junior school the head teacher there was Mr Walker. My mother was an infants teacher at St. Philips school & my father, Frank Fortin, was a craftsman at Rattee & Kett for most of his working life & spent many happy hours on the water with the Cambridge rowing club. As a family we enjoyed punting to Grantchester Meadows where we always enjoyed a lovely picnic.

In 1960 I left school & commenced a hairdressing apprenticeship at Robert Sayles where I met some great people. After finishing there in 1964 I went to a lovely salon in Cottenham called Elizabeth's, named after the mother of the joint proprietors Hillary & Rosemary Bull.

My father bought a piece of land in Leeway Avenue in Great Shelford in 1954 & had our house built by Butler of Sawston. We made some lifelong friends there including Janet Ingle who asks in her letter in your' article mentioned above, 'Who can recall the red flecked floor in the vast hall at Old Addenbrooke's Hospital?'

I was unfortunate enough to have an accident with my bicycle when I was four years old and my mother & father took me to the hospital with me perched on my seat on the back of Mum's bike. We sat for hours in the hall with the red flecked floor, my mother trying to take my mind off the pain I was in by getting me to count the specks on the floor. My parents were not allowed into the hospital ward but had to stand at the entrance, a very different scenario to today's practice I am glad to say.”

Mr R. Crankshaw of Cambridge writes: “I read articles and books with keen interest but I never seem to see a report on the Abbey School that was in River Lane off Newmarket Road, Cambridge”. He has sent a photocopy of a class group about 1930 and wonders if anyone else is still around from that era.. He adds: “I was known as Lancashire Bob as I came each year from Lancashire for six months and stayed with my grandparents on Newmarket Road” Do you have memories or pictures of Abbey School?

Memories 26th May 2004 by Mike Petty

A new chapter in Cambridge entertainment history will be written with the opening of the new nine-screen cinema on the site of the old Cattle Market on Cherry Hinton Road. Together with the Cambridge Vue multiplex in the Grafton Centre and the Arts Picturehouse film fanciers will have a wider choice than ever before.

But not-so-long ago the best cinemas were to be found in the city centre – the Central, Victoria and Regal, whilst those in the further-flung regions such as Magrath Avenue, Mill Road or Mitcham's Corner catered for a more local clientele

Back in January 1988 News film reporter Alan Kersey contributed his own reminiscences of the merits of Cambridge's cinemas

The Rex, on Magrath Avenue had started life as a roller skating rink but was reconstructed after the First World War and became the Rendezvous Cinema and ballroom. In July 1931 it was destroyed by fire but reopened next year and changed its name to the Rex Cinema in 1938. For a while it doubled as a bingo hall but was revived again in 1970, only to close suddenly two years later. After debate over its future use it was demolished in 1979. For Alan it was "better known to a generation of Teddy Boys for its ballroom next door and showed 'The Wild Ones' in defiance of a nationwide censorship ban in the Fifties. The proprietor George Webb could not rake in the money fast enough. He used to turn the heat up in summer to sell ice creams and down in winter to sell hot dogs and coffee"

The Tivoli on Chesterton Road had been Cambridge's second purpose-built cinema when it opened in March 1925. The News reported that their 'representative' (not Alan) who had a look around came away very much impressed with the general air of comfort and the attractiveness of the interior. It had comfort, excellent lighting and excellent decoration. Over 600 people could be seated in the body of the hall and gallery and if you wanted a private box for six people you could have one for the sum of 15s. Alan recalled: "Here I watched 'Tarzan and the Amazons' three times in a row and my grandmother rang the police to find out what had happened to me." It showed its last film in November 1956. [SCAN OF TIVOLI CINEMA SOON AFTER OPENING]

On Mill Road the Kinema occupied the former Sturton Town Liberal Hall; it had been the Empire combining variety and pictures before becoming the Kinema in 1916. It showed films for over 60 years before becoming a bingo and social club. Alan remembered: "It had a hole in the roof and smelled of stale urine, but when Jerry Lewis and Dean Martin were on it had a magical atmosphere" [SCAN OF KINEMA 1957]

The Playhouse nearby in Mill Road had been Cambridge's first purpose-built cinema, opening back in May 1913. It had its own orchestra & cameraman who took pictures of local events for newsreels. It closed as a cinema in 1956. "It stood derelict with the front knocked out before becoming a supermarket. Drunks used to sit on the forlorn, empty stage", Alan commented. [SCAN OF MEMBERS OF THE '50 CAR CLUB OUTSIDE THE PLAYHOUSE, 1951]

The Central in Hobson Street opened in 1921 and became the first cinema in Cambridge to show Talkies with the musical 'Broadway Melody' in August 1929. Some thought it just a novelty that would soon wear off as silent pictures offered a haven of peace from the rush and turmoil outside. Most agreed that the music was very pleasant though they deplored the all-dominant American accents. It was completely rebuilt in 1930 and again in 1940 following a serious fire. It showed its last film in 1972 before being converted into a Bingo Club [SCAN OF CENTRAL CINEMA BEFORE REBUILDING IN 1930]

The New Theatre on St Andrew's Street opened in 1896 and showed its first films in 1912. It became a venue both for variety performers and the actors of the silver screen until 1956 and was demolished in 1962. As a theatre it achieved mixed fortunes as Mr W. Chamberlain from Foxton recalls. He writes: "Does anybody remember a variety show at the New Theatre in the 1950s. It was a very good do, but there were only 24 people in the audience that night. At the finish all the performers came off stage and talked or shook hands with all present. The only name I can remember was Dennis Spicer, a ventriloquist, who was killed soon afterwards in a road accident." [SCAN OF NEW THEATRE AND CDN OFFICES c1962]

Not all films attract mass audiences and the arts film movement had its base at the Cosmopolitan Cinema in Market Passage between 1933 and 1935. It then moved to the Arts

Theatre which had regular film seasons until 1947 when the projection equipment was moved back to a new Arts Cinema in the original building. It continues as the Arts Picturehouse but in another new home, the former Regal Cinema. [SCAN AT PROTEST OVER CLOSURE 1998]

The Regal opened in April 1937, complete with organ, and soon proved a successful venue. It installed cinemascope in 1954, stereo sound in 1955; it hosted live music in the 1960s with pop groups performing on its stage before doubling the number of screens in 1972, becoming ABC 1 and ABC 2. It succumbed to the demand for newer and bigger cinemas on East Road. [SCAN OF REGAL SHOWING 'THE RAILWAY CHILDREN' 1971]

But Alan's reminiscences were occasioned by the impending closure of the Victoria Cinema on Market Hill. It could trace its origins to the Electric Theatre that had opened in 1911 before being renamed Victoria in 1915. It achieved its greatest success following the construction of a brand new up-to-the-minute building near the corner of Market Street that opened in September 1931 in the presence of 1,500 guests. It incorporated a large bar and lounge, a restaurant and dance hall together with a spacious orchestra pit should the talking pictures not catch on. There was also the essential cinema organ capable of producing every possible noise necessary for the accompaniment of a film, from telephone bell to tram car, bird, boats, motors and surf. Subsequently it was restyled in 1952 in a 'eurythmic' design – "designer, architect and illuminators combining to make a symphony of shape, colour and tone". New and modern projectors came in 1967, a second screen in 1972; it recovered from a fire in 1983 but rumours of redevelopment were persistent and it closed in 1988. What are your memories of Cambridge cinema, and given the commemoration of D-Day shortly where did you see the newsreels that reported on those momentous days? Write to Mike Petty

Last weekend the streets of Monte Carlo reverberated to the roar of motor cars – but Cambridge too has been deafened by such sound, as Brian Lister recalls.

Motor-racing legend, Archie Scott Brown drove Lister Jaguars designed in Cambridge and in 1957 was asked by Coleridge school to open their summer fete. The children were told of his visit some days in advance and became very excited as the prospect of meeting not only a racing ace, but also his racing car. But one poor lad was unable to attend being ill at Old Addenbrookes Hospital. When Archie heard of this he put aside his mild dislike of infants and trundled down Tennis Court Road to the hospital grounds, stopping the racing car outside the ward window. There he sat, happily burbling the engine, so that the little fellow could appreciate it. The event reinforced Archie as a hero in the eyes of his young fans, although there were some grumbles at the noise of 260 bhp of barely-silenced racing car growling about the city centre. [SCAN OF ARCHIVE SCOTT BROWN AT COLERIDGE FETE]

Nor was this his only public appearance to be remembered this week. Archie lived with mother in Portugal Place and joined her at one of the Christmas parties for residents organised by the Birdwood Club. Memories 2nd June 2004, by Mike Petty

Friday May 21st 1979 was a night Cambridge culture-vultures had been looking forward to – an evening at the Sadlers Wells Royal Ballet. Nor would they have to travel to London to see it, for it would be performed in a big tent pitched on Jesus Green, right in the centre of the city. From around the region people phoned to book their tickets, arranged visits to the hairdressers, a table for dinner afterwards. They were ready for an experience of a lifetime.

It was a rare event, but not Cambridge's first experience of ballet.

In December 1922 the Russian Ballet had entertained audiences with a variety of dances at the Guildhall. Supporting the Ballet was Cavalier Gennaro de Tura, the famous tenor and dainty comedienne Miss Trixie Kay who found her way into the hearts of her audience. But, the CDN commented, 'Cambridge Guildhall is not the best of buildings in which to present such an entertainment and the fact that the Ballet held us whenever they appeared was testimony to the excellence of their work.'

In the 1930's the Vic-Wells Ballet had given regular performances at the Festival Theatre until its closure in 1935 but within a year the Arts Theatre had opened to provide opera, ballet, music, cinema and theatre for the people of Cambridge. During the Second World War the Ballet Jooss spent time in Cambridge

History was made at the New Theatre, Cambridge, in April 1948 when the International Ballet Company presented a full-length version of "The Swan Lake", described as the most spacious classical ballet spectacle ever to be seen in Cambridge. The result was an evening of sheet beauty. A company of over sixty presented a performance outstanding for its virility and attack, and there was a first class orchestra - their numbers made it necessary for them to overflow from the orchestra pit into adjoining boxes and the stalls. Leading the superb company was the prima ballerina Mona Inglesby

But ballet was not just for the professionals. Jean Garner (nee Spicer) of Cambridge recalled in 'Memories' in March 2000: "My sister Sheila and I started dancing classes (tap and ballet) around 1936 with the Martin School of Dance, then run by Michael Walsh. When he was called up the school was run by Valerie Redfarn and her mother Joyce was pianist. We carried on throughout the war, doing over 1,000 shows for troops".

When the war was over the Nina Hubbard Ballet School introduced more youngsters to the art. They celebrated their second anniversary in July 1952 with a production of "Cinderella" as a ballet at the A.D.C. The News reported how more than 60 pupils took part, with Helen Deakin delightfully convincing in the title role while Anna Wooster brought dignity to the role of Prince Charming and other pleasing performances were given by Patricia Read and Irene Smith as the step-sisters. Jennifer Andrew was outstanding as Cinderella's father and the doll dance by Carolyn Sanders and Margaret Jones, who danced on her points, was particularly pleasing. After the final curtain Nina Hubbard thanked Miss Humberstone, the pianist and other helpers.

Nor was ballet just for the young and athletic: At Christmas 1953 nearly 500 people attended one of the most looked-forward to and popular functions of the year, the Dustman's Christmas Ball in Cambridge Guildhall. Dustbins were displayed on the stage behind the Astrals All Star Dance Orchestra, reminding the dancers of the occasion and Miss Daphne Frostick of East Road was chosen as the new "Queen of Scavengeria". The cabaret was amusing and skilful with four men and four girls entering into a ballet. Although the men were a little less graceful than their partners they gave a performance that will long be remembered, but whether for its precision or other factors the reporter chose not to say.

And then in 1976 the Royal Ballet had pitched its large tent on Jesus Green for the first time. It was welcomed: "Sitting in the enormous blue tent on Jesus Green and watching the incomparable Sadler's Wells Royal Ballet I felt that this is what a fully international university city should be all about. The huge tent provides a sufficiently large stage and seats to stage large performances and make them pay. Cambridge should consider investing in something of this sort. It took a lot of courage, hard work and imagination to bring Sadler's Wells to Cambridge and they have brought Cambridge to the crossroads. Either it goes forward from here or it retreats" the News commented on the following years' visit

But on Friday 21st May 1979 it all went wrong

Ballet dancers arriving at the Big Top on Jesus Green, Cambridge found their 'blue boxes' which contain their make-up, practice clothes and spare shoes were standing in solitary state in an empty room. Heavy rains for two days meant that workmen were behind in assembling the pre-fabricated portable cabins which they were to use as dressing rooms. Some had no water, no glass in the windows and no heating. There were no trestle tables and chair, let alone bulbs, basins and bins. An icy cold wind whistled through the pre-fabs as groups of dancers dressed in a variety of old, loose garments rather like floppy pyjamas & woollen socks huddled together trying to keep warm, while wardrobe staff could only sit and wait. All around them people struggled to ensure the show could go on.

But it was to no avail: at 5.15 they decided for the first time in the company's seven seasons in the Big Top that there could be no performance that night.

Hundreds of disappointed ballet enthusiasts had to be turned away and City council entertainment staff headed by Mr John Wilkinson had to break the bad news to the ballet-goers who trudged through the squelching grass, many having travelled from as far as Bishop's Stortford and Hatfield. They were not interested in refunds, they wanted another chance to see the ballet. But most of the 1,200 tickets had been sold and the company's schedule means that no replacement performance could be held.

The bad weather continued incessantly for almost a fortnight but finally it relented and peace returned to the Big Top. At last it was possible to enjoy performances without the accompaniment of heavy rain on canvas, whistling wind and a variety of off-stage rumbling though audience and artistes still had to be on their guard against damp patches on the walkways and duck-boards.

It was a visit the Sadler's Wells Ballet Company was unlikely to forget. But were you amongst those that ducked the showers and wrapped up against the wind. If so, what do you remember of that experience of a quarter of a century ago?

Peter Willis from Gravesend has contacted me to say that he took the photograph of a locomotive at Barnwell Junction station that I featured in Memories 14th April. He can confirm John Betson's memories of the arrival of an ambulance train at Barnwell Junction station, Cambridge during the Second World War. Peter has distinct recollections of seeing the Sandringham class locomotive 'Elveden' number 2804 but cannot remember quite when it was. I have a photo of wounded soldiers arriving at Cambridge station during the First World War but can anybody add further light on the Second? [SCAN OF WWI TRAIN AT CAMBRIDGE STATION AND PETER WILLIS' PHOTO OF LOCO AT BARNWELL JUNCTION STATION 1950s]

But though Peter may have partially solved one question he has prompted another: about 1944 a Flying Fortress and a Marshall's training flight crashed on Fen Road, Chesterton; he remembers bodies being recovered from the river. Does anybody have further details.

One who would probably have known was Sidney Clover. I met his son, Arthur, at a Royal Naval Association meeting recently who showed me a series of cartoons drawn by his father during the war when he worked as a stock controller at Marshalls and served with the Home Guard. The drawings depict various light-hearted activities, but one has especial interest. Whilst thousands of troops stormed ashore on D-Day on 6th June 1944 members of the Cambridge Home Guard were engaged in other activities. One of the cartoons shows a group of distinctly bedraggled men with the caption "After the storming of Spud Farm on the 6th of June 1944 – s'pity it rained". Was this a diversionary raid perhaps, staged to attract attention away from the real activity down on the South coast? Can anybody shed further light on this or other episodes in the home front campaign. [CARTOON]

And can anybody shed light on a photograph lent by Lola Craft of Cambridge. It shows her grandfather Jim Baker from Fitzroy Street amongst a group of other men. She thinks they might be members of the 'Long Cigarette Club' but what was it and what did they do, apart from smoke oversized fags? [SCAN OF LONG CIGARETTE CLUB PHOTO]

Memories June 9th 2004 by Mike Petty

Today Sir Arthur Marshall is due to receive the Honorary Freedom of the City of Cambridge and Marshall's airport celebrates its 75th anniversary. It was born in the heady days of the 1920s when flying was all the rage.

People recalled the early fliers, how in August 1911 Lieutenant Barrington Kennett had been the first to fly an aeroplane over Cambridge whilst Second Lieutenant William Rhodes-Moorhouse had actually landed his monoplane on Parker's Piece after he ran short of fuel. He had left next morning to complete his journey to Huntingdon but later returned to land on Butts Green while he collected some shoes from Cambridge bootmaker Frank Dalton. The following year W.W.Ewen, the 'Daily Mail' airman's had brought his Flying Circus to town and in 1914 Gustav Hamel the aviator had given a show on Rock Meadows, Cherry Hinton Road.

Such was the enthusiasm for the new mode of transport that in 1929 University Proctors drafted rules for students who wished to use aircraft during term time. They recognised that undergraduates flying their own or civilian aircraft might cause annoyance by low flying and that there might be accidents. Now no student could fly as pilot or passenger during term time without written permission from his parents and tutor. Those offending will be liable to be punished by suspension, rustication, expulsion or otherwise.

But young men had a great passion to take to the air; the Cambridgeshire Aeroplane Club was formed at Conington just down the Huntingdon Road and on Monday 10th June 1929 they staged an entertainment spectacular. For nine hours there was always something happening and spectator's necks became stiff from staring upwards. It was opened by the Lord Lieutenant in the presence of club president, Lady Bailey, one of the most courageous ladies there had ever been whose flying exploits – she had flown over the Congo forests in just two days - were then legendary. She arrived in a silver-coloured Gipsy Moth, resplendent in a daffodil hat, skirt and coat with a white jumper, over which she wore a black flying coat.

Some 40 machines from around the country made their way for an inter-club rally, with the pilot who crossed the finishing line nearest to noon being declared the winner. The successful aviator had flown his Avro Avion from Cheshire and arrived dead on time.

There were giant planes such as the 'Inflexible' monoplane weighing nineteen tons which carried a crew of four, and a tiny monoplane with a Scorpion engine which could be put together in two minutes and be ready for flying

Great excitement was occasioned by the arrival of Mr E.N. Alliot of London in his Klemon Salmson monoplane though it was his passenger who attracted most attention. Mr J. Tranum, a daredevil stunter who was seen to be 'horseriding' the machine, sitting astride the body and urging it on by slapping the sides, waving his arms in the air and swinging his legs. On the second day he plummeted towards the earth, arriving safely due to his Russell Lobe parachute.

There were bombing attacks on motor cars, formation flying and aerobatics. But best of all there was the chance of a joyride; it was something the CDN representative could not resist. "A first flight dispels all fears one may have about flying. No sign of dizziness is felt and the experience seems nothing more than sliding along in a comfortable armchair. The banking provides a thrill when the wing on one side dips and round the machine turns. The landing holds no fears, for all that is felt is the bump of the underwings", he reported.

It was a thoroughly successful occasion and seemed set to establish Conington as the flying centre of Cambridgeshire.

But it had competition. A new private aerodrome had opened just the day before – in fact Lady Bailey, Mr Alliot and the stuntman Tranum had stopped off there on their way down.

It had been established by a motor car engineer, David Marshall whose son Arthur had become enthusiastic about flying and bought himself a Gipsy Moth aeroplane. He'd needed somewhere to land it and they'd gone shares on a farm near Fen Ditton, levelled the fields and put up a hangar.

Shortly afterwards they heard another plane landing unannounced. The pilot turned out to be a national hero, Sir Alan Cobham who had recently made a 26,000-mile flight to and from Australia to pioneer international air routes. Now he was considering sites for municipal aerodromes, including Huntingdon, when his engine had developed a knock. Over lunch they discussed whether the Cambridge field might be opened for others to use too.

One thing led to another and on 9th June 1929 Sir Alan was due to return in his Giant Moth as part of an Air Pageant. He promised free flights to councillors and officials: the Mayor, President of the Chamber of Trade, Borough Surveyor and Town Clerk would all be given a view of Cambridge from the air whilst a number of children selected by the Chief Education Officer would also be given a free flight. Sadly he'd crashed his plane the day before but he did arrive in a smaller one and anyway there were some forty other aircraft, a military band and lots of ladies in their summer frocks to entertain those invited to watch a flying spectacular.

There were displays of aerobatics, formation flying, aerial golf and dropping flour bombs on small cars. Mr Tranum performed his usual tricks of parachuting – with a variation in which he plunged from two thousand feet and dropped like a stone for six seconds before opening his chute. He was also booked to do his wing-walking routine but his plane too had broken down. So Arthur Marshall lent his own machine instead and Tranum walked all over it, burning his shoe on the exhaust pipe in the process.

The pageant attracted large crowds who went home thoroughly delighted at a magnificent spectacle. But not all were pleased: senior members of the University boycotted the event and the Bishop of Ely spoke out against it. The art of flying was a magnificent new accomplishment and Sunday flying had already come, like the Sunday motorist. But unless there was some restriction of time and place in 50 years we might get such a buzz of aeroplanes on Sunday afternoons that quiet would be almost impossible, churchmen complained.

Flying was here to stay but Conington did not flourish. By March 1930 the club was losing money, its telephone was disconnected, the machines flew away. It was inconvenient to undergraduates who had to drive nine miles through twisty by-roads for a twenty-minute lesson whereas Mr Marshall's field was just down the main Newmarket Road less than two miles from Cambridge. It had a railway station 200 yards away and a 20-minute bus service connection, making it truly accessible.

Soon the airfield was too small and meetings were held to discuss a new site near Teversham Corner. Permission was granted and it opened in October 1938. The rest is history.

Brian George e-mails in response to Mr W. Chamberlain's memories of a variety show at the New Theatre where there were more on the stage than in the audience. He writes: "This I don't remember but as a school boy I was in the enviable position of having a mother who worked at the New Theatre as a dresser and consequently had a complimentary double ticket for the performances every week. The theatre reopened after the war in April 1948 with a show called 'Over the Wall' and appearing were Danny O'shea, Jack O'hagen, Arthur Rigby, Gold and Cordell (Ballroom Dancers) and of course the famous Max Wall. I have all their autographs. In those days you could have a real belly laugh with the comedians. I saw Arthur Lucan and Kitty McShane. the famous "Old Mother Riley" and also Max Miller who always asked which colour book you wanted the jokes from.

"There were dog acts, jugglers, magicians, roller skaters. I remember once skipping school and watching the great escapologist Alan Alan escape from a straight jacket suspended from chains by his ankles from the jib of a crane outside Hobbs pavilion. This was a preview of the next weeks stage performance.

"It was a beautiful theatre with a stalls, circle, dress circle, and the Gods. It was a pity that it was ever knocked down."

Basil Bonner from Whittlesford writes: "I was most interested to read your Golden Age of Cinema spread. I should mention that the Regal and the Victoria were not the only organ-equipped cinemas in Cambridge. A cinema organ was installed at the Rex/Rendezvous in October 1935. I consider the point worth making, as these instruments were not cheap. A cinema organ was likely to add around 10% to the cost of a new cinema if one includes the cost of the chambers required to house the hidden pipework and percussions. This indicates the importance of such an instrument in the minds of the larger cinema developers during the 1920s and 1930s!" [SCAN OF THE REX CINEMA AND MAGRATH AVE]

Memories 16th June 2004, by Mike Petty

Geoffrey Hawes from Waterbeach has come forward to share some very rare glimpses of the activities of the Home Guard in Cambridge during the Second World War. He writes:

“It was November 1940, just a few weeks before my 15th birthday, when I decided to join the Home Guard. At the time I was attending the Cambridge Boys Central School and my friend, Charles Haydn Ross decided to go along with me. We both went down to the Home Guard office and joined as runners, to run messages as required. This meant that we were not armed but we were kitted out with battle dress, boots, gaiters, great coat, gas mask, steel helmet etc. This equipment was issued to us by our Company Quartermaster, Mr. Stanley Woolston, who had an antique shop in St. Andrews Street where he kept one room for his Home Guard stores.

“After being runners for some months and been involved in several night exercises they overlooked our tender years and Haydn and I were issued with an American .300 P17 rifle, complete with 18 inch bayonet and bandolier containing about fifty rounds of live ammunition. At the age of 15/16, years I had the responsibility of keeping a rifle and ammunition stacked in the corner of my bedroom at home! It certainly would not be allowed these days, but these were desperate times! We served with other ‘Dads Army’ characters, many of who wore service medal ribbons from the 1914/18 and even Boer Wars. They were all great fellows and game as fighting cocks!

“We had an old motor van painted a pale Khaki colour with a carved badge of the Cambridgeshire Regiment above the driver’s cab and the name ‘Godfrey’ painted on the side. This was often used to take us to the Barton Road Rifle Range for firing practice. Sometimes I was detailed to the ‘Target Marking Party’ whose job was to stand behind the protective earthworks under the targets and show the firers where they had hit by the use of a long stick with a black and white disc on the end. Often the marksman would try to hit this disc while you were marking his target. If he did you would end up with a shattered disc and stinging hands. Occasionally a bullet would hit the iron framework, and ricochet off with a whine. For all that it was quite safe. We used Gallyon’s 25-yards firing range at the bottom of Madingley Hill to fire our automatic ‘Sten Guns’. They were simple and very cheap to manufacture but they were not always reliable: they had a nasty habit of firing automatic when on single shot!

“We also used the Cherry Hinton Chalk Pits for live grenade practice. A small pit had been dug approximately eight feet in diameter and two feet deep. We were in a nearby slit trench and the object was to throw your grenade into this pit, watch where it had landed and then duck! Another time we were taken out to Fleam Dyke; we all stood down in the ditch with steel helmets on while Army instructors fired machine guns over our heads and detonated explosive charges buried along the side of the Dyke to simulate battle conditions. It was really noisy.

“By this time they had formed all of the younger and fitter men into a section which they loosely called ‘The Commando Squad’. We spent evenings in the County School gymnasium being taught unarmed combat and became fairly proficient. They also took us into the Cherry Hinton Chalk Pits where they got us to climb the cliff faces in full combat equipment, sometimes even wearing our gas masks. I do recall on one occasion sliding down some loose shale, ending with a ten foot drop - but that was because I had detached myself from the safety line, ‘Stupid Boy!’

“On June 20th 1943 our Company gave a training demonstration on the Perse School playing fields. The programme had such events as rifle drill, Lewis Guns in action, gas procedure etc. But the highlight for us was what was described in the programme as ‘Unarmed combat: the Commandos of the Company demonstrate the ungentlemanly side of their characters’. Someone had procured several German uniforms together with a staff car and two army motorcycles; half of us acted as a German column while the rest of us ambushed them by felling a tree in their path (a long pole with branches attached). We then chased the Germans who conveniently spread around the arena where we fought them hand to hand using unarmed combat. Needless to say the commandos won and drove from the arena in the captured German vehicles.”

Geoffrey spent some time manning the Anti-Aircraft Rocket Projectors before his Home Guard career ended when he became old enough to serve in the His Majesty’s Services. “I had had a good schooling”, he adds [SCAN OF HOME GUARD PARADE 1942, HOME GUARD ENROLMENT JUNE 1940, HOME GUARD EXERCISE CHERRY HINTON PITS, HOME GUARD ON THE MARCH]

Another previously untold story has been researched by Penny Rumble from Chittering near Waterbeach. As she explains:

“In September 1996, my husband and I purchased Causeway End Farmhouse, a Tudor building set on a raised bank overlooking the flat land of Chittering Fen. Abandoned in the early sixties, it was in a state of total disrepair and required nearly three years of back-breaking work to restore it to its original condition. Over the months, we uncovered ancient reed ceilings, mullion windows and huge inglenook fireplaces. The building leaked history from every beam so when finally we moved in, I thought a fitting tribute to the restored farmhouse would be a potted history of the site. Starting with the Roman period, I trawled through the archives of centuries and discovered many secrets but there weren't enough hard facts to fill a scrapbook.

We were unaware quite how closely the conservation team in Cambridge had monitored our progress and were astonished to find our name heading the list for the bi-annual award for the most sympathetic restoration of an historic building. On the day of the presentation in Cambridge, the Chairman of the District Council whispered in my ear. ‘I'm so pleased you won this award. My great grandfather once lived in your house; I've got his portrait at home. Why don't you come and see him some time’.

My research hadn't yet reached the nineteenth century but I was excited by the invitation and I called by later in the week. The man in the painting stared at me with critical eyes as my camera clicked and whirled. That night I woke suddenly at three in the morning. There was no creaking of floorboards or heavy breathing yet I was convinced there was someone standing in the doorway. Terrified of the unknown presence, I turned my head to sneak a glimpse of the intruder. The moon lit up the bedroom and although I saw nothing, a rush of air swished across my face, followed by a strong smell of cigar smoke.

But you know how it is when your heart knocks at your throat in fear and your mind is befuddled with sleep; so in the morning I put the whole event down to an illusion brought on by far too much red wine earlier on. But the following night I woke again. There was the same pungent smell of cigar smoke. Too strong to ignore, I flung open the window and sniffed the air. Nothing. Like a tracker dog I ran into the hall trying to trace the origin of the smoke but the smell had dispersed.

When this experience was repeated a third time, completely oblivious of any logical explanation, I binned my original research and refocused my work on the life and times of one man - the sombre fellow in the portrait - Mark Wyatt.

Knowing that he was a disciple of the famous Baptist minister, Charles Spurgeon; I began my revised project with a search on the web for anything related to him. Up popped an article: ‘Spurgeon's Love of Fine Cigars’ which said he did not regard the smoking as a sinful activity and that ‘by the grace of God he hoped always to enjoy a fine cigar before retiring to bed.’ I still have no idea whether Mark Wyatt was a smoker or not. But I do know he copied Spurgeon's ways and ideas to the letter so I became convinced that my cigar-smoking visitor had been Mark Wyatt himself. Thereafter the smell of tobacco vanished from the bedroom”.

Now Penny has published her researches in ‘Portrait of a Baptist farmer’. It paints a vivid picture of the life and time of a man who was minister to his flock baptising them in the Cam at Waterbeach, father to his family and a farmer though the hard times of agricultural depression and the Great War. Copies are available from Penny at £10 – phone 01223 861831. [SCAN OF BAPTISM IN THE RIVER CAM & THE PORTRAIT OF MARK WYATT]

Mr A.C. Waldock of Fulbourn writes: “Your article on the Golden Age of Cinema brought back a few memories as I worked for ABC/EMI/CANON as a projectionists from 1941-1988, though not continuously. I vividly remember the 3D. The Victoria was the first in Cambridge to show the true 3D – not the red and green type. This was about 2am on the opening Sunday in 1951. The then chief Phil Howlett, myself and two engineers installed the equipment overnight. The projectors had polarising filters in front of the lens to separate the images, one for the right-hand reel and one for the left – one horizontal and one vertical. Liz Ingle e-mails from Cambridge: “How lovely to see you asking for memories of the ballet in Cambridge. My daughter and I went to a lot of the Big Top performances. During the first season we booked modestly for about the middle of the seating, but there were so few in the audience on the first night we went that we were asked to move a few rows closer at the interval! One night we had a ferocious thunderstorm - we were in the front row and were totally unable to hear the big drum absolutely next to us. One young and wonderfully athletic dancer broke his collarbone when landing awkwardly, but carried on for the rest of the ballet. Coming out of the tent I remember having to wade through knee deep water, and I assure you I do not exaggerate! We went to all of the three seasons and I think all of the separate performances, We were so sad when we were told the tent was not coming again”

April Burgess-Martin writes: “I was interested to read in last week’s Memories a report of a performance of Cinderella by the Nina Hubbard Ballet School in 1952. I was in this as a very small spark who jumped out of a fireplace to dance and I still have the little red tutu! I now run my own Ballet School following in the footsteps of Nina Hubbard.

Do children still play ‘Cowboys and Indians’ or have the stories of the Wild West now given way to other, no less violent, pastimes

Just 100 years ago, on 24th June 1904, Cambridge went cowboy crazy with the arrival of one of the greatest shows on earth – Buffalo Bill’s Wild West Show

His company arrived at Cambridge station from Hitchin early in the morning in its own three special trains including 15 carriages of livestock that were shunted into the sidings. Within a very short time the 800 men, 500 horses and other appliances were unloaded and on their way. The procession of cowboys, Indians and Cossacks in military order attracted much attention as they made their way through town though many lay sleeping in their beds unaware of the spectacle outside their windows. They were en route to a field on the Huntingdon Road where the kitchens and mess-tents were the first to be erected, soon supplying a hot breakfast to hundreds of rough riders.

By two o'clock in the afternoon Stars and Stripes floated gaily, highly suggestive of the land of George Washington. As crowds arrived for the first performance 'Programmes, sixpence each' echoed from all sides in accents that could be cut with a blunt knife. The audience flocked into the canvas-covered tiers of seats in a vast arena that would become the Wild West, the Rockies, the steppes of Siberia, or Mexico, Australia - even the sandy wastes of the Sahara, depending on whichever part of the show was being performed.

A cowboy band struck up 'Yankee Doodle' to welcome the undergraduates, dons, schoolboys and schoolgirls – for this was an education - countrymen, aristocrats, even a member of the Salvation Army. Then came the performers, gorgeously painted and feather-decked Indians - Sioux, Ogallallas, Brutes, Uncapappas, Cheyenne and Apache tribes- followed by New South Wales horsemen, Mexican cavaliers, Arabs from the wastes of North Africa and of course the US cavalry. Once assembled all let out a cheer as a figure with flowing grey locks, riding a superb horse, swept into the area. This was Buffalo Bill himself, Col. W.F. Cody the world-renowned scout who knew more of Indian warfare than any man living.

Then it was on with the show: wonderful sharpshooting despite the flickering electric light; the lassoing of a horse-thief; the Deadwood Stage pursued by whooping befeathered braves, Indian war dances, bucking horses. There were Arab athletes, Japanese jugglers, galloping Russian Cossacks, even a man jumping through space on a bicycle. It culminated with Custer's last stand at the Little Big Horn with red limelight effects redolent of bloodshed and slaughter though the 'whoop' of the Indians was not nearly so terror-striking as expected.

Afterwards there were additional attractions to extract more sixpences from spectators: a variety performance by Buffalo Bill's Concert Party including a female saxophone player or an exhibition of 'freaks'. But there was to be no inspection of the camp itself, though numerous attempts were made to evade a strong cordon of police and take a peak backstage.

That evening they did it all again. Then it was over; as the crowds made their way back into town, the mess-tent was busy serving cowboy, Indian and Russian alike. Horses were fed and watered as tents were dismantled and everything made ready for a late-night return to Cambridge station ready for an early-morning start somewhere else. The Wild West had come and gone in a single day but would live on in the memory of some 14,000 people who had been there and seen it for themselves. [SCAN OF ADVERTS FOR THE SHOW]

A few weeks ago Mr W. Chamberlain from Foxton wrote to ask: "Does anybody remember a variety show at the New Theatre in the 1950s. It was a very good do, but there were only 24 people in the audience that night. At the finish all the performers came off stage and talked or shook hands with all present. The only name I can remember was Dennis Spicer, a ventriloquist, who was killed soon afterwards in a road accident."

I've now had time to scan some of the programmes of performances at the New Theatre that are preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library. There amongst them is one dated 7th March 1955 for an entertainment called 'Radio Tymes' boasting a star-studded cast of radio and television artistes. They included Ken Morrison, a concert accordionist, Dudley Dale and his gang of boy singers, comedians Billy Winsor and Syd Wilton from "Workers' Playtime" and somebody billed as "Ann Robinson, radio's lovely soprano" (it can't be the face-lifted person from the tele can it?). And there amongst them was Dennis Spicer billed as "the unique ventriloquist from 'Showcase'". [SCANS OF NEW THEATRE PLAYBILL, AND THE NEW THEATRE IN THE EARLY 1960S]

Stan Howchin from Cambridge adds further details about the organ at the Rex Cinema when it was closed for refurbishment after 1935. He recalls that the stage end was knocked down and the auditorium extended. The speaker chamber was placed on the outside wall to make more room and extra rows of seats were added in the stalls. A small two-manual Compton organ was installed with an illuminated console and the cinema re-opened with none other than Reginald Dixon of Blackpool Tower fame in 1937 or 1938.

Sally Thoday from Cambridge remembers attending the Cosmopolitan Cinema well into the 1940s adding that as there were only a few British films made during the war they went to the Cosmo to see foreign ones. Clifford Manning's notes on Cambridge cinemas, published in the Cambridgeshire Local History Society Bulletin in 1984, records that the Cosmo had opened in the Central Hall, Market Passage as a part-time cinema in 1933 and became full-time in October 1940. It was damaged by fire in July 1943, reopening that November. Four years later it closed for reconstruction before being relaunched as the Arts Cinema in October 1947.

Memories 30th June 2004, by Mike Petty

The recent news that Bradwell's Court may be redeveloped to include new shops, a café and 15 luxury apartments could revitalise an area described by one councillor as "1960's tat"

But in the 1960s it was seen as the latest in shopping development – Cambridge's first arcade. It provided a continuous covered walkway from Drummer Street bus station to the city centre with an additional 20 new shops and showrooms.

The Court had been a joint venture between two colleges - Jesus and Christ's - and Ravenscroft Properties and it was designed by the Cambridge architects, Hughes and Bicknell who took special care that the scheme harmonised with the adjoining college buildings.

There have been several changes of occupants – not all of them welcome. In November 1975 a furious row broke out after the manager of the Wimpy Bar complained that he was losing trade to a hot-dog stand who'd set up at the entrance. Eventually the developers suspended metal poles from the arcade roof to keep the stall out.

While Cambridge gained up-to-date shopping it had lost two old areas. One was Bradwell's Yard, which had included cottages as well as commercial premises as Paul Griffin, one-time head of Cambridge Anglo-World Language Centre recalled in the News back in September 1987. His recollections will jog many other memories.

"It was 1946 and my wife and I, newly-married, had to find somewhere to live in Cambridge. Everything was in short supply and the best we could discover was a very thin cottage sandwiched in a row of buildings in Bradwell's Yard. The cottage was used by Mr Roe, an antiques dealer for storing furniture but he agreed to store it somewhere else and put in an electric supply. There were only three small rooms occupying the same number of floors"

There was no bath, no washbasin, an open-air lavatory across the yard shared with the next cottage and the only source of water was a tap over a sink. But it became home and he started to search for materials with which to redecorate. He even managed to acquire a zinc bath the size of a coffin which was filled through rubber tubing. "We emptied it by hanging the rubber tubing out of a window and siphoning the water out on to the waste land. We were happy in that little cottage, but thank goodness it is in the past now", he concluded.

Mr E.P. Dickerson from Primrose Croft – who had wonderful memories of Old Cambridge, some of which he shared with me and are recorded in the Cambridgeshire Collection – also added his recollections of the Yard at the turn of the 1900s. "Mr Fawcett had a house on the right-hand corner, there were two or three cottages and at the bottom end was a builders' yard."

The Bradwell family were builders. One had worked on Clare College in the 1660s and another is commemorated on a tombstone against the wall of St Andrew the Great church just across the road. He was David Bradwell who designed the Victoria Homes almshouses in Victoria Road in 1837 while a namesake occupied the plot until it was demolished for the arcade in 1958

The redevelopment closed Christ's Lane which had linked St Andrew's and Drummer Streets. But it could get muddy, as a correspondent to the News complained back in 1897: "Sir: Christ's Lane is a thoroughfare that is as much used as any in Cambridge, and is owned by a college. During the last two years it has been a veritable quagmire, I came through last evening and the mud was several inches thick through the lane. When is Cambridge to be governed so that there is the same law measured out for the University as there is for the worker and when is Christ's Lane to be paved in such a manner that that it shall be as pleasant to walk through as it is walking across Christ's Pieces? - B.L."

Nor was it always a quick route as Mrs J. Jenner of Bourn recalled in June 1999: “There was a toll bar about half way up which was always open, except for Rag Day. Then the students held it shut and put sludge around it about an inch thick and ten inches long. This meant that people passing had to give them something to walk through the small gap in the sludge. The opening was only wide enough for one person at a time to pass. They gave mums with prams a helping hand by lifting the pram over the barrier”.

The barrier had put been there to deter traffic – reflections of yet another modern proposal – but like the modern equivalents there could be problems: in June 1924 a Spanish student was killed when he swung his motor cycle into the lane at speed and ran into it.

The City Council wanted the barrier removed in May 1952 so that the Lane could be opened out as a thoroughfare to be used by buses. This would alleviate congestion and provide relief for Emmanuel Street. While about it they also proposed a new road on the line of Post Office Terrace to Wheeler Street. Then with Corn Exchange Street widened this would provide for a good circulation of traffic in the city centre. Now the issue of traffic management is again being discussed but I suspect this is one solution that will not find favour.

But whatever becomes of Bradwell’s Court and the bus station beyond it there will remain a problem for shoppers – how to cope with all those bags. As Mrs Jenner recalled this was one issue that had once been resolved: “When the bus office ceased to look after passengers’ parcels a man, Jim Wooders, who lived in the Sturton street area, came and sat by the wall near Milton’s Walk to watch the parcels and sometimes cases, when people had a long wait for coaches. He charged according to the length of time parcels were there. Those to be collected before noon were placed on his right, between then and two p.m. were in front, and two to four or five on his left. He charged 1/- a parcel for each period of time. Each customer was greeted by ‘Good Morning’ or ‘Good Afternoon’ and he touched his cap to lady customers.” [BAG WATCHER - CEN SCAN 158580 – USED IN MONDAY MEMORIES 19 APRIL 2004; VARIOUS NEWS PHOTOS OF BRADWELL’S COURT AND ONE OF BRADWELL’S YARD ARE IN A PLASTIC ENVELOPE IN THE LIBRARY PICTURE FILES ‘CAMBRIDGE – BRADWELL’S COURT’] [SCAN OF BRADWELL’S COURT FRONT 1962, CHRISTS LANE FROM ST ANDREWS ST - 6934 AND THE BARRIER FROM DRUMMER STREET – 9108]

These days we are used to seeing our news illustrated by pictures that appear almost as soon as the incident has occurred. But this is not just a modern phenomenon as events of 100 years ago demonstrate. On 16th June 1904 the News reported that two steam traction engines belonging to Pamphlins of Cherry Hinton had been at work ploughing land at Linton when tragedy struck. One of the engines boilers exploded sending debris flying in all directions some of which killed a workman who had been tending a water cart. Within two days local photographer S.F. Talbot had published a series of picture postcards of the scene and within a week views of the explosion were being shown to audiences in a cinematograph show at Midsummer Fair. [SCAN OF BOILER EXPLOSION]

Other issues seem to return over the years. Out at Sutton a new straw burning plant dominates the landscape and generates both traffic and energy that is fed into the National Grid. But back in the 1900s the village firm of Drake’s had a different use for straw – they turned it into horse feed by cooking it in steam boilers. The problem was that when the boilers were opened they released a very unpleasant odour that penetrated houses and brought objections from some of the villagers not employed by the company. When the firm wanted to expand in Station Road objectors bought up adjacent fields to try and stop them, but without success.

The straw and hay used was landed by barge at Mepal and transported to the works by traction engine – past the present generating plant.

Drake's story is summarised in a new booklet 'Open all Hours' which surveys the trades, businesses in shops in the village – copies £2.50 plus postage from Peter Smith on 01353 778665. It is published as part of Sutton Feast celebrations which will include a display of old photographs in the village church next Sunday afternoon, 4th July. [SCAN OF DRAKES BARGES AT MEPAL]

Remember 'One potato, two potato, three potato, four ...' – the rhymes that we used to sing in the playground.

Some 25 years ago Ruth Craft toured the schools in the Romsey area of Cambridge to gather a selection of them as part of a Children's Poetry Week when she analysed the chants of both children and their parents.

"One potato" was one of the rhymes used for choosing 'IT' but it was not the one most favoured by the children. They preferred the version

Ippy dippy dation,
My operation,
How many people,
At the Station,
No,
So you are not IT

Romsey had its own variation of the actions where each child put a foot forward into the circle and the 'dip' began with the words "Your shoes are dirty so go home and clean them"

There were chants for various purposes; some gave a strong beat for ball bouncing and skipping games. One of these went

I went into a baker's shop
To buy a loaf of bread
And this is what I said
My name is L-I-L-I
Tickill-Ticklli
Pon-pom-poodle
Chinese chopsticks
Indian chief – How!

Then there were pledges against which the children asked their honesty to be tested; most recalled 'Cross my heart or hope to die' but Romsey had some more chilling versions like

Sky is wet, Sky is dry
Stick a needle in my eye

Ruth felt that in a sometimes-frightening world the rhymes could be a kind of ritual through which the children tried to control things that were threatening them. One mother recollected that every time an ambulance went by she used to say:

Touch my collar,

Touch my nose,
I will never go in one of those and she had to keep the finger on her nose until she spotted a black dog.

Famous figures of the day always have featured in rude playground rhymes. Older residents recalled chanting

Hark the Herald Angels Sing
Mrs Simpson's pinched our King

But in the 1970s this had given way to verses based on television characters:

Jingle Bells Batman smells
Robin ran away
Kojak lost his lollipop
And landed in the hay

There were rhymes featuring school dinners and soggy semolina but perhaps of the favourites was the one to be chanted at the end of the school term

One more day,
One more day of sorrow.
One more day in this old dump
And we'll be home tomorrow

Such songs and sayings cannot have just be confined to Cambridge schools in the 1970s. If you can recall what you chanted – or have pictures of other playground activities – then write to Mike Petty at the News [SCAN OF CHILDREN AT PLAY, STRETHAM 1968 – BUT WHAT RHYMES DID YOU CHANT; PROBABLY PHOTO OF ROMSEY SCHOOL CHILDREN 1970S]

Kathleen Bouttell (nee Mc.Atavey) has lent me a picture of a group of Brownies taken at Sawston in 1935 at a parade in celebration of the Jubilee of King George V and Queen Mary. She recalls: "I was the Brown Owl (aged 19) and remember it being a very hot day. I was preceded as guider by several people, the first being Miss May Johnson, who had been a teacher at the Infants schools, May and Ruby Ashman and, briefly, another Miss Johnson who lived at The Grove, Stapleford. Mrs Huddleston of Sawston Hall was greatly interested in the Guide movement. Before her marriage she had captained the guides attached to Westminster Cathedral and every year a contingent of guides from there came to hold a fortnight's camp on the Moor at the back of Sawston Hall. When war broke out everything came to an abrupt halt. The Boys' Brigade hut, where we held out meetings, was used for other purposes. Barclays Bank occupies the site now." Kathleen can't remember the names of all the Brownies in her picture but they include Olive Harradine, Rosemary Wade, Dorothy Wright, Lily Goodwin, Doris Allen, Rosalind Mathews, Pam Searle and Barbara Rouse. Mr K. Bright from Cambridge wonders if anybody can tell him why his father, Maurice Bright, received the OBE Civil Division (Admiralty) in June 1943. The only information he has is that Maurice worked for the Cambridge Instrument Company and together with a naval officer was involved in developing a degaussing system for ships to combat the menace of magnetic mines. His son was serving with the Royal Navy on a landing craft at the time and although he treasures the certificate never got to learn the details. Can you help?

Steve Wilkinson has written from Histon to say he has a programme for the Rendezvous (later Rex) cinema in Magrath Avenue, Cambridge dated 21st October 1935. This when it was reopened after enlargement – having previously been reopened in November 1932 following a fire the previous July and reopened in 1919 before that. The October 1935 programme shows that the then M.P. for Dudley, a Mr B. Joel, performed the ceremony before the assembled company watched the Pathe Gazette ‘Leong’, a story of native life on Bali and the cartoon ‘An Elephant Never Forgets’. The feature film was ‘Dance Band’ featuring Buddy Rogers and June Clyde. For many the main attraction was a recital on the Compton organ by the great Reginald Dixon.

Terry Beaumont of Cambridge can solve the mystery of Lola Craft’s picture that I featured on 2nd June. It was not a ‘Long Cigarette Club’ but the Ancient Druids Brush Club – this can be seen written on a large brush being held by a young lad in the front row. Terry can identify his late father, Harry Beaumont in the back row with his grandfather a little to the left. He believes most of the men were survivors from the Great War, including one he just knew as ‘Charlie’, sitting at the extreme left of the second row, who only had one arm, part of one leg and one eye as a result of his wartime experiences. Does anybody have other details of this particular club or its members. [SCAN OF BRUSH CLUB MEMBERS]

Two more ‘Memories’ readers have written about the ambulance trains at Barnwell Junction station. Patrick Mills of Cambridge says it happened quite frequently: “Early in the war I had a school friend who sadly became ill and later died in the Leys annexe of Addenbrooke’s Hospital. When I visited his home once his mother remarked that she had to go to Barnwell Junction to meet a hospital train and I was certainly under the impression that this was a regular occurrence”. Mrs M. Pink (nee Dean) from Bottisham says: “I too remember the ambulance trains; I remember seeing the red cross on the roofs of the carriages. It must have been about 1944/45. I and my brothers used to hang over the bridge – a different shaped bridge in those days – to watch the trains and get all smoke and steam in our faces” [SCAN OF OLD BARNWELL BRIDGE, NEWMARKET ROAD 1963]

Shirley Smith from Southwold in Suffolk has sent a copy of a picture she found amongst some family papers. It was taken by the News in the early 1960s and shows a lady with a parrot. But who is she – and why did her picture get as far as Suffolk. Can anybody help? [SCAN OF LADY AND PARROT]

As preparations continue for this year’s Bridge the Gap Charity Walk round Cambridge on Sunday 5th September the emphasis is on the fact that this is walking for the fun of it. Starting from Jesus Green the route winds through the historic centre and along the Backs providing local folk with a glimpse of what thousands of visitors travel often half-way around the world to see. It is of course a route open to everybody every day but this is good opportunity to see it without feeling that you should not actually be there or worry about getting lost.

Walking has long been a way that Academics have chosen to relax. Back in the early 1800s the Rev Charles Simeon recommended to his young students that every day they should make sure that the third milestone from Cambridge was still in place and a Sunday perambulation along King’s Parade was part of the undergraduate’s routine. Nor could the weather disrupt their recreation for on wet afternoons the cloisters of Trinity College were thronged with dons and undergraduates pacing backwards and forwards.

Some dons specialised in longer distances; Leslie Stephen walked 50 miles from Cambridge to London on a hot day in 1903 to dine at his Club. On another occasion the vicar of Eaton Socon complained that his parish had been invaded by four lunatics but was told that they were clergymen from Cambridge who were walking from Bedford to Cambridge. They left Bedford at 11.30 and arrived at the back gates of St John's College at 6pm having stopped at St Neots for three-quarters of an hour.

But for some townspeople walking was a serious sport at which they excelled

One such was Tom Abbott who was in the News back in July 1954. He was then hailed as one of the best-known heel and toe walking experts in Cambridgeshire. When Lewis Todd visited him at his home he found him sitting in an armchair smoking his pipe. Big, active and supremely fit, he had covered thousands of miles over 20 years of competitive walking.

Tom had started in 1925 when as a lad in the Cambridge Territorials his sergeant, Chris Hewish, had encouraged him to take up the sport. Then he saw an article in the CDN about the formation of the Cambridgeshire Walking Club. Tom took part in its seven-mile road walk becoming the first novice home. It was the start of a lifetime's interest that took him to the very top of his sport. In 1937 and 1938 he took part in the two miles walk at the British Games held at the White City Stadium and by then he held every walking record in Cambridgeshire – he still did nearly 20 years later!

He'd also won 30 championship medals. They included the E.H. Church Handicap Cup, a two-mile race at the Cambridge Railway Orphans Sports – which he won over a dozen times - the Royston to Cambridge 13½ [THIRTEEN AND A HALF MILES] mile road race held annually on Boxing Day, the County Championship ten-mile walk, another ten-miler along Newmarket Road and inter-county meetings without number.

Tom won a gold watch at the Luton sports of 1930, a canteen of cutlery at the Bury St Edmunds one-mile race in 1931, a suit case at Ely Show in 1934, a silver flower stand next year and another canteen of cutlery the year after that. As he had a family of ten, five boys and five girls, he needed as many knives and forks as he could get! Even during the Second World War, when he manned a coastal defence gun in the Royal Artillery, he kept on walking in Service races in Belgium and the Shetland Isles.

When Tom finally retired from competitive walking he joined the Amateur Athletic Association's committee and helped youngsters of the Coleridge Athletic Club, teaching them to walk with a will to win and to enjoy friendly rivalry.

Tom Abbott one of Cambridge's sporting legends in his lifetime, passed away in December 2003. Amongst his papers is one of a group of athletes lining up in Kings Parade ready to start off on a walk. The quiet village of Hauxton seldom hits the national headlines; but it did so 75 years ago in July 1929, with a Cambridgeshire county councillor imprisoned and questions asked in parliament. The dispute started in 1916 when the Councillor bought some land in the village that had once belonged to the rectory. It carried with it obligations to repair the chancel of the village church but he claimed he had not been told this at the time and so refused to fund them. The matter went to the Consistory Court at Ely Cathedral who confirmed that he should pay up as previous owners had done. But when the councillor stuck to his guns he was found guilty of contempt of court and imprisoned in Bedford gaol. The case was raised in the House of Commons but the validity of the old law repairing chancels had been vindicated. If the work had been done when first requested the cost would have been but a few shillings, now it was about £30. He could only be released once he had apologised, the work was completed & had been inspected by a surveyor. Workmen were soon on the scene, scaffolding was erected, the roof repaired and replastering put in hand. Another court at Ely Cathedral confirmed the arrangements and the councillor was released from gaol to return to his home in Brookside, Cambridge after a week inside. At Hauxton the churchwardens and parishioners were relieved that they did not have to fork out for the work themselves [SCAN OF HAUXTON CHURCH 1964 OR FIND PHOTO FROM NEWS FILES]

Last week I featured a picture of a lady with a parrot that had been found amongst family papers in Suffolk; readers have been quick to identify her as Miss Emma Louise Heffer. All have special memories of her: Olive Clough from Cambridge remembered her as a regular customer at Munceys the jewellers while Angela Parker-Woodward e-mailed from Sutton to say Miss Heffer had been a regular visitor to Barclay's Bank Trustee department in Bene't Street where she worked during the 1960s. Sheila Mann e-mails to say Emma had been trained as a nurse at the London Hospital long before the Great War – and was said to have met Florence Nightingale. Later she became owner and matron of the Priory Nursing Home in Newmarket Road, Cambridge, roughly on the site of the old News building. Her parrot, Joey, accompanied her to church and subsequently to retirement in the Evelyn Nursing Home where they both did a daily round of patients on the ground floor and inspected babies born in the Home's Maternity Unit. Miss Heffer died in the Evelyn in her 100th year early in 1974 while enjoying her favourite food – ice cream. John Heffer, her nephew, says she was known in the family as Aunt Pom while William Heffer from Cambridge says Joey was still alive a few years ago living in the Cherry Hinton area. Garry Carter writes from Deal in Kent sending a picture of a Post Office Telephones Morris Z van registration number GYT 866. It was first registered on the 5th of April 1945 and worked in the Cambridge area until 1961 when it was sold at Stevenage auctions for £7 10s. [SEVEN POUNDS TEN SHILLINGS]. Garry came across it looking very sorry for itself in 1990 and has now totally renovated it back to it's former glory as a Post Office linesman's van. He would like to hear from anyone who may have driven it or have any pictures. His phone number is 01304 373486 or write to 7 Sutherland Road, Deal, Kent CT14 9TQ. Memories 23rd July 2004, by Mike Petty

They're removing the telephone box on the corner of Wood Lane and Berry Close at Stretham; the notice says it doesn't pay its way any more. I suspect it never did. It was erected in 1957 so that residents in the new council estates could make calls without walking all the way to the kiosk in the centre of the village. Soon it will be uprooted and carted away for good. It is a scene that has been repeated throughout the county over the years. [PHOTO OF KIOSK BEING REMOVED OUTSIDE CEN OFFICES, NEWMARKET ROAD IN 1988]

Our Parish Council had tried to get a telephone for the village back in 1898. This was just two years after the first trunk line had been established from Cambridge to London, opening up communication with a large number of towns which many had never heard of.

But the Post Office didn't respond to our first request, nor to the second sent in January 1903. We asked again in September 1905 and finally the negotiations started. The Postmaster General agreed to establish a call office at the Post Office, open during the ordinary hours of business. Telephone calls to Ely would be charged at 2d [TWO PENCE] for three minutes conversation but any beyond that would be trunk calls and charged accordingly. There was one snag: the Parish Council had to guarantee to cover a third of the cost of any shortfall in revenue to a maximum of £10 a year. The Council called a public meeting which approved the scheme and the telephone arrived in Spring 1907. Year after year after that the Council's accounts show payment to cover the shortfalls with sums ranging from over £9 in 1908 down to just £3.9s.4d in 1921.

Then our village was in touch with the outside world and could summon help when needed. But this was not always the case elsewhere. In July 1929 a fire broke out in a furniture store at the back of the premises of Mr Hunt, milkman and general dealer at Haslingfield. Mrs Hunt sent her maid to the Post Office to phone for the fire brigade but when she got there she was told that she could not use it. The maid was too excited to ask why not and ran to Mr Burrell the butcher, at the other end of the village, which meant a delay of several minutes. When the CDN probed the case they learned that it had been early closing day and the postmistress had been away. Her mother had been there but she'd never used the phone and nor had the maid. So they'd sent for Mr Hunt to show them what to do, but he'd never come – probably being too busy fighting the fire. Whatever the facts it was a scandal that there was no public telephone in the village. [SCAN OF HASLINGFIELD POST OFFICE IN 1920S - PERHAPS CHECK LIBRARY FOR PICTURE OF HASLINGFIELD SHOWING POST OFFICE OR PHONE BOX]

Other villages were petitioning for phone boxes; the County Council approved the site for kiosks at Harston and Histon in July 1931, Toft and Comberton that November. Stretham too was trying for a telephone kiosk but in November 1930 were told by the Post Office that one wasn't needed. Seven years later we tried again and this time we were lucky; it was installed in the centre of the village by March 1938.

It was just a red phone box, not like the earlier designs of the 1920s such as that erected in Conington [CEN PHOTO - NB I THINK THIS IS THE CONINGTON IN HUNTS, NOT THE CONINGTON NEAR BOXWORTH SO WORD THE CAPTION ACCORDINGLY] or at the Cambridge and County Bowling Club [CEN PHOTO] nor the two-tone 1929 version on Ely Market Place [SCAN]. But over the years it has become part of the streetscape like many of the others throughout the county, some of which, like the one at Waterbeach, have now been listed as buildings of historic interest to ensure their survival [CEN PHOTO OF PHONE BOX AND VILLAGE PUMP AT WATERBEACH]

The kiosk became a gathering place for the village youngsters and they used it, chatting away for hours as people queued up outside. Sometimes it was out of order or in dire need of a good clean, but it was there in emergency. [CEN PHOTO OF LEANING KIOSK AT UPWARE 1974]

When the evacuees arrived during the Second World War the phone provided a vital link to the people back home. At Sawston the coming of American servicemen added to the pressure on the telephone service as Abe Easey recalled in 1992:

“Outgoing calls from the little manual telephone exchange at 95 High Street soared to over a thousand a day and a time limit of six minutes had to be imposed on all calls. From the start the British telephone system bewildered American troops. GIs could not get used to being ‘put through’ and the manipulation of Button ‘A’ to complete the connection or Button ‘B’ to get ‘tuppence’ back if the connection proved not possible baffled them completely. One frustrated master-sergeant stumbled out of the dark kiosk near the Cross after a vain attempt to ring his new-found girlfriend. He had progressed no further than the operator who had been sitting in the little white-washed exchange only a yard or two from where he had fumbled helplessly in the blacked-out booth. ‘Crazy broad!’ he groaned. ‘Drop her on the krauts- she’ll sure snafu their communications’.”

I have sympathy for his bewilderment. Our phone box was just that. It used to have a telephone directory and a list of exchanges. You looked up the number you wanted, put in your money and dialled it. Over the years Button A disappeared, other buttons replaced the dial but it was straightforward. Not like some of the modern ones: they will connect you to the internet, apparently, but the last time I tried just to make a phone call I couldn’t understand out how to work it. Perhaps that’s why they’re not being used so much now!

Following the excitement of the Grand Prix at Silverstone and the parade of motor racing cars in London Roy Chamberlain of Foxton has sent me a copy of a programme for a race organised by the Cambridge University Automobile Club that he attended at Gransden Lodge aerodrome in June 1946. It was, he tells me, the first motor racing in England after the war and the only track then in operation.

The meeting featured races for both sports and racing cars and motorcycles. Amongst the entries were A. Issigonis in a Lightweight special who competed against R. Salvadori in the category for racing cars up to 750cc. In the 1101 to 1500 cc Racing Cars R. Parnell in a Maserati beat G.E. Abecassis in his Alta and R.E. Ansell in an E.R.A.. The sports cars saw G. Crossley in a Frazer-Nash B.M.W. as well as a clutch of Jaguars and Bentleys whilst in a race for Edwardian Cars B.B. Tubbs in a 1904 Gobron-Brillie was up against J. Bolster in a 1911 Rolls-Royce. There was another meeting on 13th July 1947 in aid of the RAF Flood Victims Relief Fund when the first Cooper racing cars competed.

On a somewhat slower tack Roy also comments: “There was a letter in the News on 28th June this year in which someone commented on putting an empty cigarette packet in the spokes of a Hercules cycle to make a noise as you rode along. I did this many times. My father lost a leg during the First World War and had a fixed-wheel bicycle with two carriers on in, one in front of the handlebars and the other over the rear wheel. He sometimes took me to school on them. I could sit on either carrier, or on the seat or handlebars and ride it backwards and forwards because of the fixed wheel. I have never seen it done on a standard cycle”

Sarah Baylis has e-mailed to say she is trying to track down the story of the statue of Jonas Webb the Victorian sheep-breeder. At various times it has stood on Cambridge Market Hill, inside Cambridge Corn Exchange, outside South Cambridgeshire Offices in Hills Road and outside Babraham Hall. I was working in the old Reference Library at the back of the Guildhall when Jonas made his journey from the Corn Exchange to Hills Road on the back of a lorry having overseen a wide range of activities from roller-skating to all-in wrestling. Now he enjoys a quieter lifestyle, back in his home village. But do you remember seeing him when attending events in the Corn Exchange? [SCAN OF DRAWING OF JONAS WEBB STATUE IN CORN EXCHANGE]

Memories 28th July 2004, by Mike Petty

Tomorrow the Antiques Roadshow visits Cambridge and hundreds of people will be bringing their treasures to King's College for the opportunity of some specialist assessment. But visits of Antiques Roadshow have themselves become part of history.

Back in August 1979 Arthur Negus was amongst the experts who joined the presenter, Angela Rippon, at Ely Maltings. There they appraised a variety of objects including a 12-foot punt gun made in 1840, African carvings and a Ming vase valued by Hugo Morley-Fletcher at as much as £10,000. It remains to be seen what will be discovered this time round. [SCAN OF ARTHUR NEGUS EXAMINING ANTIQUES AT ELY MALTINGS 1979]

But Ely folk did not have to wait for bargains – they were to be found every week on the market, as Ruth Sealy discovered when she visited in July 1979. Ely's market was (and is) held on Thursdays and the city soon filled up with people, with parking space at a premium. In those days you could usually park on the Market Square but on Thursdays the stalls took over, filling the square and stretching some way along the pavements; if it was fair time too they also stretched down High Street as well. [SCAN OF ELY STALLS IN HIGH STREET 1978]

Ruth counted about 50 stalls many selling fruit and vegetables, one of which was almost totally devoted to bananas from Wisbech priced at 26p a pound. Flower stalls, some selling garden plants had ten French marigolds for 30p while geraniums, white or red, were three for £1.

Specialities included a well-stocked cheese stall where the staff were happy to cut it into cubes suitable for party-style cheese on sticks, and a 'soul food' stall selling a small selection of goods such as 100 per-cent wholemeal flour, herbs and dried beans. Many of the other stalls sold clothes and other non-perishables. 'Live like a Lord on a shilling-a-day' was the cry of one regular stallholder while others offered cut-price polish or domestic equipment. [SCAN OF ARTIST AT ELY MARKET 1970S – BUT TRY LIBRARY FOR BETTER MARKET VIEW]

For many country folk the highlight of the week was the auction sales held in the Cattle Market on what is now the Cloisters shopping centre. There was a set timetable: the fat pigs were sold at 10 am, then live poultry followed by dressed poultry and produce, furniture and dead stock and more furniture.

Notebook poised Ruth recorded what she saw: "Sale by auction is a curious business, attracting its own brand of custom. It is a jolly bantering and time-consuming affair in which you can quite easily be misled into thinking you have got a bargain.. The crowd seemed mainly old hands, but that didn't guarantee rock-bottom prices. Quite often they reached and sometimes went above prices in the nearby general market. On occasions this was loudly pointed out by a member of the audience who nevertheless appeared to be tolerated as an unavoidable part of the proceedings. It was he who often started the bidding, albeit well below the auctioneer's asking price". [SCAN OF CATTLE AT ELY 1963 SCAN OF FARMERS DISCUSSING PRICES (NOT ELY)]

You didn't have to buy in bulk. The produce was sorted into fairly large lots but bidding was usually done on the basis of the price per single cabbage, lettuce or pound of strawberries and there was no obligation to take the lot. Most people took two or three items and bidding started again for the rest.

Today day-time television is full of programmes featuring people buying 'antiques' and hoping to resell them for a profit at auction. They are all a bit too late – they should have joined Ruth at Ely 25 years ago. There were bargains to be had in the auction of household goods: furniture and bric-a-brac. Ruth spotted an 'In Memoriam' vase for holding graveside flowers and a few old bikes, among them one with a flat-tyre. 'Needs attention' would be the way to describe it but in the excitement of the auction room it went for £11!

The Ely cattle market is no more; it closed in September 1981 after a century of trading when cattle and pigs were auctioned for the last time. During the previous few years the market had had less business as more farmers switched from animals to arable farming, so the auctioneers who ran the market Cheffins, Grain & Chalk had decided to call a halt.

It was a particularly sad occasion for the auctioneer, Mr John Grain, who first started work at the market exactly 48 years ago to the day, the third generation of his family to be involved in the market. At 10.45am he rang the bell for the last time to summon farmers, dealers and onlookers to the final cattle sale. This time there was only one cow to be sold – a black Hereford brought along by Mr Sidney King, a Littleport farmer. It tipped the scales at 680kg and was bought by King Brothers of Holbeach, Lincolnshire for 100p a kilo.

Then 78-year-old Mr 'Nips' Lee of Ely – a market hand for 63 years until he was forced to retire – was called to ring the bell to herald the start of the final pig sale. The bidding was brisk for the 50 pigs on offer, the last one being sold by Mr William Darby of Haddenham. Entering into the spirit of the occasion the bidders pushed the price up to 290p per kg, when it was bought by Mr Sidney King junior, of Littleport.

The poultry, produce and furniture auctions continued for a while longer before the site was redeveloped. [SCAN OF FINAL CATTLE MARKET SALE AT ELY]

Edna Fryer (nee Walton) from Fulbourn writes: “I was interested in your articles on the ambulance trains at Barnwell junction station. I was an ambulance driver during World War II and also have memories of hospital trains arriving there. If my memory served me right all our ambulance work, the unloading and transporting of army wounded and sick patients was done during the night. On one occasion we were told the wounded we were working with had started their journey from Anzio off the coast of Italy by hospital ship. I think we took patients to the Leys School, Addenbrooke's Hospital, Hinchingsbrooke and I do remember that we took all the German Prisoner of War wounded to the University Exam Halls in Downing Street. The RAF had its own hospital in Ely and the Americans used Wimpole Hall. I would be interested to hear from anyone else who took part in this war work”. Memories 4th August 2004, by Mike Petty

Do you remember the rhymes and songs you sang in the playground? I asked a few weeks ago.

“Yes”, replied Susan Mackay of Linton, who has delved back to her memories of primary schooldays at Ashdon County Primary School in the 1950s. She writes:

Skipping, always regarded as a ‘girls’ game was a popular playground activity with plenty of chants to choose from to accompany the different games, most of which required a large number of participants.

‘Drip Drop’ was a game for experienced skippers with good timing. The younger girls would watch admiringly as their elders ran in and out of the rope with ease. When you were allowed to join in this game you had really arrived! Two girls would turn the rope while others ran in, initially for two skips and later for just one. The skill in this game was to run in on the same turn of the rope as someone ran out. The accompanying words were

(Two skips per person)
Drip, drop
Drop him in the sea.
Please pull
The rope for me.
Come, come
Coming to the fair?
No, no
The fair's not there

(One skip per person)

I

Must

Not

Miss

One

Loop

Or

I

Shall

Out

In 'Bluebells' two girls gently swayed the rope from side to side while another jumped over it until the word 'over' was reached when normal skipping commenced:

Bluebells, cockleshells

Eevie, ivy, over

My mother said that I was born

In the month of

January

February

March etc – one skip per month with the rope being turned faster and faster until the skipper failed to clear it.

'On the Mountain' could be played with the skipper turning the rope herself or with two turners

On the mountain stands a lady

Who she is I do not know

All she wants is gold and silver

All she wants is a nice young man

So come in my (name) dear (named person runs in)

(Name) dear, (name) dear

Come in my (name) dear

While I go out to play (original skipper runs out)

Our repertoire of playground rhyming games was widened with the arrival of some children from Saffron Walden who introduced us to the skipping game, 'I know a boy'

I know a boy and he's double jointed

I kissed him, made him disappointed.

Now he's dead and I've got another one.

Bless his little heart,

He's better than the other one

All right (name of skipper), I'll tell your mother,

Kissing little (name of boy) round the corner

How many kisses did you give him?

One

Two

Three etc – one number for each skip until the skipper failed to clear the rope

The same children were responsible for teaching us a game called 'The King of Spain'. The skipping in this did not involve a rope. A row of pupils stood against a wall while another pupil skipped backwards and forwards; each time they reached the wall they would put a foot against it before backing away, accompanied by the song

Here comes the King, the King of Spain
To call upon my sister Jane.
My sister Jane is far too young
To marry a man of twenty one
So fly away, fly away,
Come again another day.
Face to face,
Back to back
Choose the one you love the best.

At this point the skipper chose a pupil from the wall who joined her in to-ing and fro-ing until the end of the rhyme when another pupil from the wall was chosen to join them and so on until everyone was in the skipping line

The prelude to all these games was a few pupils running round the playground, hand in hand, chanting "Who wants to play ...?" Other pupils would tag on to form a chain until sufficient numbers had been recruited.

I was one of the Ashdon pupils who lived at Hadstock. We travelled to and from school in rickety old buses which resounded with our chanting (unless we had a grumpy driver). Some of our chants featured local people including John Morley, a fishmonger from Linton whose cry of 'Fi-i-i-sho-o-o' alerted villagers to his arrival in Hadstock:

John Morley sells fish
Three ha'pence a dish
Don't buy it, don't buy it;
It stinks when you fry it

"I hope these memories from nearly half a century ago will be of interest. I'm amazed at the ease with which they came flooding back to me", Susan concludes. [FIND PICTURE OF ASHDON AND HADSTOCK, SCAN OF SKIPPING ON PARKER'S PIECE CAMBRIDGE 1937 BUT TRY AND FIND OTHER PICTURES OF CHILDREN SKIPPING]

Once the school gates were closed for the summer, children had to find other places to play

In March 1925 five Harston lads were each fined 2s.6d. for playing football in the highway. In his evidence to the court PC Carlton said there was only a small piece of grass near the White Swan and this was unfit for football purposes. During the summer cricket was allowed in the Park and at one time Mr Arthur Hurrell had let the boys play football in the meadow, but owing to some wilful damage being done he had withdrawn these facilities. [SCAN OF HARSTON IN 1920S]

Communities rallied round to provide somewhere safe for the children to play. In May 1928 Ely council decided to open the Barracks Field in Silver Street for organised games. Ely was very badly situated for child life; the streets were narrow and motor traffic made things worse for children to play on the streets. This was a most ideal spot provided they could find another field suitable for the council's horses. But their horsekeeper objected, pointing out he got no half-day on Saturday and if the horses had to go out of town it would be impossible for him to put them out to grass.

In May 1954 Teversham people turned up in substantial numbers for the opening of their new recreational ground, Queen's Playing Field. There were a lot of youngsters and adolescents getting into trouble because they had nowhere to play and it would keep them off the roads helping reduce the appalling number of accidents. Villagers had worked hard to get the land but this was just a start and they had plans for a children's adventure playground. These were quite small and very informal. You could have all kinds of junk, as children would be far happier playing with a lot of old junk rather than with the ordinary swings and slides. [FIND PICTURE OF TEVERSHAM]

The idea of an adventure playground was developed in the Arbury areas of Cambridge when parents raised the initial funding and in August 1974 were expecting between 150 and 300 children to pour into the new Adventure Playground enclosure each day.

It was laid out like an outpost of the US Cavalry after the Indians had been. There was a 10-foot-high perimeter stockade, big main gates and a high watch-tower in the middle. In one corner were the livestock, all snuffling, clucking and crowing. On another was 'Venus' an old landing craft looking rather washed up and nearer the middle a large battered playhut. It was not for the fastidious or tidy-minded but it was an excellent place to light fires, cook sausages and potatoes and melt down old cola cans into aluminium ingots. Such activities together with others such as building dens and whizzing down the aerial ropeway were everyday events overseen by the play leaders who would supervise the site 12-hours a day, seven days a week throughout the holidays. It brought a sense of adventure into young lives that might otherwise be spent moping on street corners wondering 'What can I do ...?'

Memories 11th August 2004, by Mike Petty

Recent "Memories" articles have prompted responses from several readers but it was Edna Fryer's experiences during the second world war that was very personal for one reader. Edna recalled on 28th July that she had been an ambulance driver transporting army wounded to Addenbrooke's Hospital and the Leys School annexe, adding: "On one occasion we were told the wounded we were working with had started their journey from Anzio off the coast of Italy by hospital ship"

This has prompted Mrs Kath Gray to write: "I was very interested in Mrs Fryer's letter about driving the wounded soldiers home from Anzio. My husband was one of them. He was wounded on the Anzio beachhead. The ship was brought into Bristol and then they came by ambulance to the Leys School. When I knew he was there I took our son down to see him. But after nearly three years apart the Sister would not let us see him until he was washed and cleaned. So we walked up and down Brookside for half an hour before I could go in. He was very badly wounded, but he was home". [PERHAPS FIND PIC OF BROOKSIDE]

Her experiences were sadly not unique; parents of young children with broken limbs were not allowed to visit them until they had been in hospital for four weeks and even then could only see them for an hour-and-a-half on Saturday afternoons.

The Leys School buildings played an important role during wartime, as Geoff and Pat Houghton have recalled in their history 'Well-regulated minds and improper moments'. After the fall of Dunkirk in June 1940 the country prepared for the worst. The Ministry of Health were looking for additional hospital spaces and the Leys had already been used in the First World War. So the school staff and pupils were evacuated to Scotland and the buildings prepared for military casualties and civilian patients.

The first arrivals were evacuees and their mothers rushed out from London and for over 3,300 people the Leys was their first experience of Cambridge. Meanwhile beds for some 375 patients were being fitted in while the basement of the school's East House was strengthened in case of air raids and converted into an Operating Theatre.

The top floors of two of the Houses were used for male patients while the ground and first floors housed maternity and gynaecological cases. This meant removing parts of the banisters so that stretchers could be carried upstairs; later a lift was installed but once the war was over it was dismantled and transferred to the main Addenbrooke's Hospital building in Trumpington Street – now the Judge Institute.

The nursing staff found that life in school dorms was not ideal; they complained that the rooms were too cold and demanded gas fires. The hospital porters were conscientious objectors who had been male dancers in the Royal Ballet Company. Once when needed to take a patient from one ward to another they could not be found. Eventually they were discovered practising ballet steps, holding on to a hospital trolley.

As well as Kath's husband the Leys cared for Canadian soldiers injured in the Battle of Arnhem and at the end of the war British soldiers who had been Prisoners of War were sent for a health-check before being returned to their regiments. One Red Cross lady given the task of getting things ready for them was appalled by the state of the beds and the chipped enamel mugs and plates. She was still so fuming as she cycled home that she rode through traffic lights on red. When two policemen rebuked her she told them they ought to have better things to do – and was duly prosecuted. She wanted to appear in court to make a protest against the conditions the ex-prisoners of war were being asked to endure, but her husband persuaded her to pay up and keep quiet. [FIND PICTURE OF LEYS SCHOOL]

But do you have memories of the Leys during wartime?

My recent mention of James Street (Memories 21st July) has prompted memories for Jack Williamson of Cambridge, who has known the area for the past 80 years. He writes:

"I was born in James Street in 1923 and lived there for a long time. The only shop in the street was Leveringtons, a general store – later an antique shop. As a schoolboy I traversed East Road four times a day to the Central Boys School on Parkside, so I know it well. The White Ribbon Hostel, next to Coulson Building Works and two houses from the corner of Gold Street, was run by the Salvation Army. Nearby was the Working Mens Club. I knew most of the businesses carried out in the Kite area and loved it. That was before they turned it into 'Legoland', and now I hate it" By happy coincidence George Blows of Cambridge has sent me a picture of the Working Mens' Club that should jog more memories. [SCAN OF WORKING MEN'S CLUB EAST ROAD]

Nick Richardson also has memories of the area: "As a young lad in the mid 1950s I can remember going with my grandmother to the phone box next to Ward's shop at the corner of East Road and Norfolk Street. She wanted to speak to her daughter who lived in Louisiana, U.S.A., and booked the time of the call in advance with the Post Office. They told her to be at the phone box at 7.30 on Thursday evening when the operator would try and get a line. We got there a few minutes early to make sure no-one was using the phone, and get ourselves into the box. At 7.30 the phone rang and the operator said 'Go ahead with your call'. For the first minute or two they were crying, then said 'hello' and it was almost finished until the next month when they'd do it all over again". [SCAN WARD'S SHOP EAST ROAD]

Joyce and Peter Lewis write from Cambridge: "Your article about the Antiques Roadshow on July 28th gave us much pleasure, especially when we saw the photograph of Arthur Negus. He was a family friend when we lived in Cheltenham 50 years ago. He was a delightful man and very popular there before he became involved with the Antiques Roadshow which meant such a lot of work, travelling and entertaining the public with his knowledge. He looked around various sales in London for our parents as they wished to purchase a nice card table; after their death we brought it to Cambridge and still use it for a game of Bridge. I have found another picture of Arthur at Ely in 1979 – do you recognise anybody else? [SCAN OF ARTHUR NEGUS AT ELY WITH ANTIQUES ROADSHOW 1979]

Various readers have responded to the photograph of the Cambridge Schoolboys football team 1951-52 that was sent in by John Lawrence from Huddersfield. Roger Osborne e-mailed to say he recognised the teacher on the right of the photo as Henry Bugg who was still at Chesterton school when he attended some years later. This is confirmed by somebody who should know: his widow, Christina, who tells me he taught at Chesterton for over 30 years. The other teacher shown is Mr B. Chapman from the Manor School and together they taught many boys including two who went on to achieve sporting fame – Bruce Rioch and Willie Carr. The first person to respond was Maurice Rolph from Cambridge and when I e-mailed John he was delighted: "Many thanks; ironically Maurice Rolph was my best man and we had lost touch over the years, certainly for the 35 years that I have been in Yorkshire. Now I have telephoned him" [SCAN OF SCHOOLBOY PIC]

Mr K. Bright wrote in to ask for details of why his father, Arthur Bright, had been awarded an OBE for work at the Cambridge Instrument Company (Memories July 7th). Now has dropped me a line to say that two readers have been in touch to give him the information he required. Since then I have met another gentleman who actually worked in the same Laboratory. If you could do with similar help do write to me as there's a great store of information in the minds of the people who read the 'Memories' articles

[IF YOU HAVE TO CUT SOME STORIES PLEASE KEEP THIS LAST ONE]

I met Roy Chamberlain of Foxton the other day. He tells me his family always buy two copies of the News on Wednesday as neither of them can wait to see what's in 'Memories', and that there is a regular inquest next day on what was right or wrong with other members of the Foxton 'antiquarians'. Back in April Roy wrote to me and I featured some of his letter; but he went on to say: "I remember when the R101 airship had an early morning flight before its tragic intended trip to India. I heard an unusual noise, looked out of my bedroom window and there was the R101, going slowly, when it suddenly dived or hit an air pocket at about 30 degrees and went out of sight behind a small hill. I quickly dressed, got my bicycle out and went up the hill. It was still flying, very low and I watched it while it was in view, then came home to Foxton, relieved." Now I have had a letter from Mrs Joan Smith of Cambridge who has lent two postcards she found amongst the papers of her late aunt. One on them shows the giant airship Roy saw; it was taken at Cardington before its fateful flight. [SCAN OF R101]

Memories 18th August 2004, by Mike Petty

Last week year the News headlined an important new development in cinema facilities: the installation of state-of-the-art digital equipment to show subtitled screenings of the latest blockbuster films. Now the deaf and hard-of-hearing can enjoy bug screen films with friends and family. [SCAN OF NEWS HEADLINE 10TH AUG]

But just 75 years ago, in August 1929, the News was headlining preparations for Cambridge's first talking pictures, which would make subtitles unnecessary. A CDN reporter was amongst the first to experience the new age as he made his way to the Central Cinema in Hobson Street for the screening of 'Broadway Melody'. "The biggest obstacle to an English audience is undoubtedly the American voice. Its inflexions to an English ear are harsh and monotonous, a defect intensified by the limitations of amplifiers which have only half the range of a good speaking voice. The dialogue is the weakest part but the singing and the spectacular parts of the picture are on the other hand masterly. The amplification affects it far less and such numbers as 'Broadway Melody' come over perfectly", he reported [SCAN OF HEADLINE 'TALKIFYING CAMBRIDGE CDN 15 AUG 1929]

But what would the ordinary cinema-goers make of it? The News opened up its columns to its readers: "The talking film is at present a novelty and like all new things it attracts, but its popularity in the future is doubtful" – W.E. Crewe, Mill Road. "The talkies are decidedly better than the silent films; the only fear is the type of story used. Let us hope it will not be stereotyped like so many of the silent films" – Ronald Barker. "The eulogistic letters extolling 'Talkies' surely are written when their writers' minds are numbed by the tunes or doped with the American sentiment. We are now faced with a ghastly future of an endless succession of Broadway Melodies ... an invasion of American blatancy and vulgarisms far worse than the silent films. Surely we should not put up with this awful travesty of our language" – 'Non Broadway'. "I think the Talkies are wonderful and should not like to see silent films again" – L. Cherry, Round Church Street. "What if the silent film dies out? Can one imagine such films as 'Ben Hur' or 'The King of Kings' as 'Talkies'. No never; I say 'Silence is golden'" – E. Essery, Merton Street.

While everybody remembers the first talkie to hit Cambridge, what was the second? It was 'Show Boat', apparently a film that combined both talkie and silent film in one. "For the first half-hour we wondered whether it really was a talking film at all, for although the characters kept opening their mouths, not a sound came from them. The dialogue was conveyed by means of the customary screen captions while the Show Boat band or mechanical organ played a running accompaniment of old-time melodies. Later the voices came across in true 'talkie' style but were sometimes so distorted as to spoil the effect"

Whatever the opinions talkies were heard to stay; no longer would the silent cinema resound to the sound of dozens of voices reading the subtitles out loud; they were a thing of the past – until now. Peggy Pink from Cambridge contacted me after seeing a picture of her mother swinging a skipping rope on Parker's Piece in 1937. (Memories 4th August). In fact most of the family are there too – Peggy herself, then aged 9 ¾ [NINE AND THREE QUARTERS] beside her with her aunt Hilda behind. The question was – did the original photo also show her sister Pamela as well. Peering into the edge of the photo it does seem half of her might be there and I will need to track down the negative to see if there is more. Peggy tells me that whole families went together each Good Friday for the traditional skipping and the Piece was packed with stalls set up along Parkside selling trinkets, candyfloss and balls on elastic [DETAIL OF PICTURE SHOWING PEGGY, HER AUNT, MOTHER AND SISTER (EXTREME RIGHT)]

It was a welcome break from the hardship of the daily grind in the depressed days of the 1930s. Peggy's father had worked for Fremlins off-licence in Newmarket Road, running the shop with his wife and going out with a horse and wagon during the daytime to deliver supplies of beer to well-to-do houses out at Shelford, Fulbourn and Wilbraham. Peggy remembers riding with him and had a great time, often being given a piece of fruit or a lollipop by the customers. The horse was stabled at the Newmarket Road end of the Working Mens' Club (which by coincidence was featured in Memories on 11th August). "I used to go with my father to help him groom and clean out the stable. I was small enough to walk under the horse's stomach", she recalls, adding: "It seems such a rural thing to have a horse stabled in East Road. But an elderly aunt told me she used to see cows driven along Coldham's Lane when she was a girl to go to Goodrum's dairy to be milked!" [SCAN OF NEWMARKET ROAD IN 1928 WHEN HORSES WERE COMMON]

But her dad could not drive and lost his job when motors came in; instead he found work digging drains at Waterbeach, riding his bike there and back. The family moved to East Road and Peggy started to save for her own bike, taking a little girl called Valerie Dean to school every day for her parents who ran a busy greengrocers shop in Burleigh Street and on Saturday doing their week's washing up. After eighteen months she had saved 27/6 [TWENTY SEVEN SHILLINGS AND SIX PENCE] and her parents gave her the last half-crown for the second-hand machine. "This sturdy bicycle was passed to my younger sister, then to the eldest three children of the family of five next door, until the middle boy made a go-cart with it" she recalls.

Janet Morris from Bar Hill has sent her recollections of playtime at Morley Memorial School in the 1950s. "We certainly skipped and played jacks (fivestones) and marbles according to the time of year, and I remember one chant which went 'The big ship sails on the alley-alley-oo, the alley-alley-oo, the alley-alley-oo, the big ship sails on the alley-alley-oo, on the last day of September' (or possibly December). The game which went with it involved holding on to a tree growing up against a wall in the playground, but I can't remember how it was played. I also remember the more agile girls (we were separated from the boys at playtime) doing handstands against walls or fences and occasionally walking on their hands for a short distance. We used to throw balls up against walls and catch them, sometimes allowing them to bounce and sometimes turning round or performing other movements while the ball was in the air. Tig was another favourite game and one rhyme for choosing 'it' was 'Penny on the water, tuppence on the sea, threepence on the railway and out goes he'. But I'm not sure whether I used this myself or heard it from my parents." [SCAN OF CHILDREN AT MORLEY SCHOOL 1950S]

Such games were not confined to Cambridge as Rosamond Key recalls. She went to school in Hockwold-cum-Wilton: "One of the games we used to play in the playground and after school was skipping. We had a long piece of rope, one of us holding each end. We used to have to run in time to the rhyme that we were singing and we managed to get six to eight of us in at a time! Another game was whips and tops. We used to colour the tops with chalk of different colours so they looked pretty when they spun. We played many ball games ranging from twosey up the wall to football. A whole group of us used to play together and spent many happy hours playing hide and seek around the village in the evenings. Of course we were lucky as there was very little traffic in those days and we could play in the roads too. I also remember playing for hours with my dolls and prams."

But getting to school was difficult as sisters Barbara Allen and Mary Hanslip recalled: "Our first memories are of living in Southery Fen in 1931. We walked three and half miles to school and as this was mostly fen road we had to wear sensible shoes because of the mud. These were laced up leather boots and we hated the fact that we had to wear them and the children who lived near the school could wear nice shoes. In winter it was dark when we left home in the morning and dark again by the time we arrived home. Later we moved to the other side of the river but carried on going to school in Southery. This meant we had to cross the river twice a day we were lucky as there was an old lady and gentleman who lived on a houseboat (Mr and Mrs Money); they had wire across the river and used to pull the boat over by it. If it were near their food time she would say 'You will have to wait until we've had our vitals'. There were no hot dinners, we had to take sandwiches with us. If anyone misbehaved at school they got the cane".

Their memories, together with those of Rosamond and a group of other fen folk have now been collected and published in a booklet "50 years in and around Littleport" which is available for £4 including postage from the compiler, Tom Daly of 20 Isleham Road, Fordham, CB7 5NL [SCAN OF A CHAIN FERRY – NOT SOUTHERY]

Kate Howarth-Brown is seeking other memories of childhood; she e-mails "Do you know if any of the Cambridgeshire photographers called Smith had a daughter called Kate or Katie. My mother has a photograph of her mother as a child taken at Aberdovey in which she is posed almost as a nymph at the water's edge. Originally there were two other photos similarly posed. Apparently Katie Smith often took her holidays in Aberdovey around 1915-1917 and whilst there became very friendly with my grandmother's parents. The reaction to the photos was very mixed even in a more innocent age but I believed this sort of fairytale photo was what she specialised in".

Memories 25th August 2004, by Mike Petty

Throughout the county, parish by parish, the constant round of coffee mornings afternoon teas or garden fetes are arranged as communities raise money for the repair of their churches. It is a struggle that has continued for centuries.

But just 25 years ago, on 25th August 1979, the parishioners at Ickleton were sharing the trauma of having been awoken late at night to find that their church was alight. While five fire engines raced to the scene they had formed a human chain to salvage valuables from their Saxon building, trundling them away on wheelbarrows to be stored for temporary safe-keeping in barns opposite the church.

But although they removed a painting of the arms of King George II, the altar cross, candles and the hassocks illustrating scenes of the village's history they could not save the fabric of the church itself.

That was down to the firemen. But despite their heroic efforts the blaze which had been started behind the organ in the south transept completely destroyed the chancel roof, a valuable fresco painted on the oak ceiling below the belfry and the organ that had only recently been renovated at a cost of £1,000. There was also tremendous smoke damage but the stone itself had survived as had the oak pews, and the church records were found intact in the safe. [SCAN 10071 ICKLETON CHURCH 1937; FIND PHOTOS FROM NEWS ARTICLE 25TH AUGUST 1979, FIND MORE RECENT PICTURES OF THE CHURCH AFTER RESTORATION]

Few other parishes have faced such devastation. One was Great Shelford back in November 1798 when the church tower collapsed. It had been obvious for some time that something serious was likely to happen and when it did the parishioners rallied round to rebuild it. [SCAN 99.65 OF GT SHELFORD TOWER AFTER COLLAPSE 1798]. But when the tower of All Saint's church at Fulbourn collapsed in 1766 the congregation decided not to bother to rebuild; for they had two churches in the one churchyard and so they just switched to St Vigor's alongside [SCAN 9606 THE TWO FULBOURN CHURCHES BEFORE 1766]

At Knapwell when the chancel collapsed in 1753 the rector obtained permission to rebuild 'the great rambling old chancel to one of smaller and more useful size'. However the problems were far from solved. In 1785 parts of the nave also collapsed and the church became unusable. For the next eighty years services were held in a village barn. Eventually in 1861 Henry Brown was appointed curate, walking from Cambridge to take the morning and evening services. He set about raising money to rebuild the tumbledown church and a grant was made by the Incorporated Society for Building Churches. The most successful local architect, W.N. Fawcett, was employed to make the designs and the new church was completed in 1866.

The parishioners at Wendy almost got used to losing their churches. The original medieval church was in such a ruinous condition that it was replaced in 1737 by a small plain building without a chancel. But its foundations were so poor that it lasted for little more than a century: by 1863 the gable was a long way out of perpendicular and the congregation could look out into the churchyard through the huge cracks in the walls. So four years later it was replaced by a new church built by public subscription and containing a fine 16th-century double hammer beam roof which had been rescued from the old church of All Saints, Cambridge. This had itself been demolished two years earlier. However history repeated itself: the foundations were again inadequate and the church was pulled down in 1950. [SCAN 10399 OF WENDY CHURCH WHICH WAS TAKEN DOWN IN 1950]

Occasionally the damage has been caused by 'An act of God': Reach church was severely damaged after being struck by lightning in 1958 [MAY BE PICTURE IN NEWS FILES]. At other times it has been the act of man: Heydon church was damaged during a wartime raid in 1940; the bomb blew out five bells in the church tower which collapsed and tore down half the nave and part of the aisle. It was shored up until it could be restored in 1956. [SCAN 10123 OF HEYDON CHURCH AFTER BOMBING AND 64.77 INSCRIPTION RE BOMBING AUG 1964]

But whatever the cause, people have found the strength to rally round to ensure that the church building continues stands at the heart of their parish as it has for centuries, and the coffee mornings, afternoon teas and garden fetes continue to do their essential work.

Memories 1st September 2004, by Mike Petty

Caroline Wardle from Cambridge has been recalling her early days at Milton Road Junior school, soon shortly to be replaced by a new building.

She left in July 1966 and says things have changed very much since her days there. She recalls milk monitors, hymn sheets, dinners shipped in in huge silver containers and dinner money. "Dinner money - five shillings a week - had to be taken in on a Monday morning (along with your shoe bag with indoor pumps and plimsolls in). And the dinner money tended to arrive in old tins - tobacco, sweet tins etc. Odd - so many children used old tobacco tins yet most of our fathers never smoked roll-ups - so who kept supplying these tins remains a mystery!"

Caroline remembers the camp beds the youngest infant class had: "the caretaker used to erect a bed per child whilst we had lunch and we were all made to have a sleep after lunch - covered by an exceedingly scratchy, dark-grey wool blanket which made you itch!"

"In particular I can remember a May Day event when the parents attended. We all danced round the Maypole holding a coloured ribbon in our hand, and as we weaved in and out, ducking under some peoples arms, then ducking under ours at different points, we formed a beautiful design in a regular pattern of colours around the pole." [SCAN 72.01 MILTON ROAD SCHOOL MAY QUEEN 1952 (BEFORE CAROLINE'S TIME)]

And the loos: "We only had outside loos, a big, red-brick building and had to change our shoes and run across the playground in all weathers to get to them. In winter everything froze out there (including your bottom if you hung around!) so life used to get pretty whiffy and unpleasant!"

“By the time we were half-way through the Juniors, we all knew exactly why the girls and the boys had different loos (boys one side, girls the other). Obvious! Girls got pregnant if they sat on a toilet after a boy, and that's how our parents had landed up having us! They'd been forced to use the same loo at home and sometimes the naughty Daddy had forgotten to raise the seat, hence we were born!!!

“This was worked out and discussed in great depth at every break - mid-morning, lunch and mid-afternoon - for at least a week solid, by those considered brightest. The rest just listened in. But I don't think any of us bothered to tell our parents we now knew how they'd got us and all about the facts of life!”

Milton Road School has affected so very many thousands of lives - not only pupils but all the staff too – and Caroline would love to hear other people's recollections of their time there, before the old school door closes for good.

She's sent me a couple of photos of the school in the 1960s. One is of a class group in 1963:

“We had a teacher, Miss Buchanan, who came from New Zealand, and as part of a class project, learned about Maoris. We made the grass skirts ourselves at school though Mums made the girls' tops and the pois. We learned a traditional Maori song which the whole class sang whilst the boys hit their sticks together and the girls did a typical Maori dance. Apart from helping teach us about the country, culture and history of New Zealand, the class also did their song and dance at the Guildhall. In those days there was a festival for local Primary school children held annually, and our Maori routine was the Milton Road entry for that year. We all had enormous fun - as you can imagine - but because the whole project was such a 'hands on' one, we also retained the information we covered in class.” [SCAN 100.67]

“The second photograph of boys in Mr Hoskins' class in 1966 is interesting, I think, because it shows just what dramatic changes have occurred in such a relatively short space of . The dark, glazed tiles on the walls - just the desks and chairs themselves - all looks more like something from Dickens! Yet the oldest of my year are only just approaching their 50th birthdays, and at the time we certainly didn't consider our surroundings inferior - they were normal and acceptable and as far as we were concerned, we were actually rather advantaged! Having seen the pictures of the school as it is now on its web pages well, you'd never believe it's the same place and I dread to think what the present children would think if they saw the rooms as they were in my day! However, some things don't change. I noticed when I walked past the school that during term-time there were still plastic washing-up liquid type bottles of ready mixed paint standing on the window ledges of the classrooms. Very reassuring! Oh - and the white line painted on the surface of the playground - it marks the division between the infant and junior playgrounds - is still there, too. Woe betide anyone who put a foot over the line and stepped into the 'wrong' playground - though I'm sure things are more relaxed now! [SCAN 100.66]

Numerous readers have sent in their memories of the Leys School annexe to Addenbrooke's Hospital during the Second World War

Some helped out, as Joyce Mansfield (nee Phillips) of Cambridge recalls: “Pupils of the Chesterton Senior Girls School who were members of a Junior Red Cross group were asked to help with the washing up after the patients' evening meal. One evening two of us were asked to wash an iron bed with a carbolic solution. Apparently the patient had died and the bed frame and springs had to be washed before it could be used again. No fear of any bugs then”

Rachel Atkins, nee Rolph who is now living in Gosport, Hants, started nursing at the Leys in 1943; she might have treated Audrey Garner (nee Sharp) from Impington: "In September 1942 I was ill and taken to Addenbrooke's Hospital. They took me on to School House, Leys Annexe. I had rheumatic fever and was there for a month. They were very kind to me, but my heart was affected and I was away from the Central School for a year."

Other readers recall taking their children there:

Margaret Cream from Cambridge: "My 18-month-old daughter was found to have 'congenital dislocation' of her hips. A Mr Butler looked after her, putting on plaster in 'frog position'. She spent several weekends in the Leys over the next 13 months having checks or new plaster. It was all very successful and as Mr Butler promised she was fine until after middle age, though now all the bones are crumbling and she needs a new hip. How I wish he was here now!

Two readers had contrasting experiences of the same complaint:

Muriel Moorman (nee Le Roy) of Fulbourn: "In January 1941 my four-year-old brother, Keith, was taken by ambulance to the Leys with meningitis. My mother took me (I was twelve years old) to visit him. He was in a little L-shaped room with another little boy. My brother died next day and I have never forgotten that room". Others were more fortunate: Mabel Law from Longstowe: "My sister, Margaret Ambrose (nee Northrop) was taken ill with meningitis and was taken to the Leys for treatment until she recovered. She was a 'clippie' on the Eastern Counties bus company."

Perhaps she was one of the bus conductors recalled by Miss Margaret Skempton of Coton:

"My father Geoffrey Skempton was at the Leys during 1945. He was wounded in the Battle of Arnhem and taken to Nijmegen Hospital, then by train and boat to Derby City Hospital before going local people and was also allowed to travel home on the bus to see my mother, and me, then living at Eaton Ford near St Neots. Having both wrists in plaster he had to ask bus conductors to get the fare out of his pocket, but some would not and allowed him to travel free. On the return journey my mother put the fare in his hand before seeing him on the bus"

Ivy Kirkup (nee Sewell) from Impington was one of those who helped the wounded: "My sister Joan and myself spent weekends helping out on the wards; most of my time was spent writing short letters to the poor soldiers' parents just to let them know where they were and how they were. We would put those patients who were not so badly wounded but very depressed in wheelchairs and take them along Trumpington Street and across a meadow down to the river for a walk to cheer them up. We got very tired as we had to cycle from Haslingfield but I think we did a good job just to see a smile on their faces. I hope many of the poor lads are now enjoying a happy retirement." [REPRISE LEYS SCHOOL PICTURE FROM PREVIOUS WEEK]

POSSIBLY HOLD OVER

The recent plagues of hover flies and wasps recalls similar invasions in summers gone by. In July 1979 it was greenfly, as the News reported: The ferocity of the invasion has turned shop fronts green with aphid slime. Motorists are battling hard as swarms of flies cause clouded windscreens while at home all doors and windows have to be firmly closed despite the heat. It is now getting difficult to hold conversations outside without swallowing mouthfuls of greenflies and all citizens are being advised to go to the nearest swimming pool, retire to the bar or simply stay indoors."

But back in August 1929 it was flies that hit. A correspondent wrote: “The flies were particularly thick in the Willingham district, where they literally clogged the air. It was almost impossible to cycle in some places without the protection of goggles. The tiny slate-coloured insects flew in dense clouds, filling people’s eyes, ears, mouths, noses and hair and penetrating to the innermost recesses of one’s clothes. About mid-day on Friday the main street of Willingham was filled from end to end with the pests and life was a burden. It is estimated that if it had been possible to precipitate them to the ground they would have covered it to a depth of half an inch or more” [SCAN 9961 – WILLINGHAM WINDMILL WHERE FLIES CLOGGED THE AIR]

So does you have memories of insect plagues?

Memories 8th September 2004, by Mike Petty

While spending a few days away in Norfolk I found myself rummaging through the books in a charity shop in Reepham. For some reason one volume caught my eye. It was a concordance to the works of Mary Baker Eddy, founder of the Christian Science movement. But tucked inside it was a slip of paper that was worth a donation in its own right.

It was a bill dated 15th January 1952 from W. Rothwell of 29 Victoria Road, Cambridge to a Miss Wright of 57 Eltisley Avenue. The billhead records Mr Rothwell as a ‘Practical Furrier’, an expert in remodelling and renovations who undertook dyeing and cleaning at the owner’s risk. His job this time had been: “Natural Musquash Coatee shortened at the hem, and the ‘cut-off’ usde (sic) to repair many broken places in various parts of the coat. The old lining sewn back”. For this he had charged £1.15.0

Fur coats were much regarded in the immediate post-war days. Princess Margaret had worn a fawn-coloured version - complete with blue lizard sling-back shoes and a grey lizard bag - when she’d paid her first visit to Cambridge in January 1948, accompanying Queen Elizabeth and Queen Mary on a visit to Mr S.N. Woolston’s antique shop in St Andrew’s Street.

Ellis Powell – of Mrs Dale’s Diary fame – had worn a fur coat over a royal blue dress when she’d opened the new branch of the Co-op on the housing estate at Whitehill Road, Cambridge in December 1952 although the Co-op did not include such coats amongst their usual stock. However Joshua Taylor showed a beautiful fur coat in Russian ermine, priced at only £1,195 at a Fashion Parade in 1953, alongside drain-pipe corduroy slacks in navy and red vertical stripes worn with an off white wool and mohair jacket.

But by the sound of things Mrs Wright’s coat had seen hard wear; perhaps she’d been one of the ladies who braved the elements and flocked to the University Arms Hotel in 1924 for what the CDN described as ‘a treat such as the feminine soul loves’. The middle of the large dining room was empty except for a small dais. A band discoursed dance music, and to the strains of a waltz there floated into the room a vision of beauty in a delightful blue and silver frock, trimmed with fur. She was speedily followed by another in black crepe de chine and yet another in a straight simple afternoon dress. They all went through a set programme, pausing as they entered, posing gracefully and making various graceful movements to display the garments, before finally vanishing back through the entrance. All this was done with a detached, almost mechanical air, as expected at a mannequin parade organised by Miss Poupard.

Or could she have made the acquaintance of “Ben”, a talking dog owned by Mr Alfred Brissenden of Royston, who appeared in television’s “Picture Page” in September 1946, when he almost let down the side by mistaking a fellow artiste’s fur coat for a cat.

Can anybody shed light on either of the people concerned – or should I have delved further into the rails of that charity shop where the coatee itself might still have been lurking. More memories of Milton Road School have continued to flood in.

Councillor John Powley from Soham e-mails: “I attended Milton Road Infants and Junior schools from 1940 to 1947. Obviously there was a war on for most of that time with all the problems that a war brought. The teachers I recall were as follows. Headmaster was Mr Varley, teachers Mr Leach, Mrs Tregett, Miss Samuels, Miss Buchanan. I think that the head teacher of the infants was Miss Shrive. When I was old enough I recall riding my bicycle from Lovell Road (where we lived) to Milton Road School. This was quite a long way for a young lad but there was not so much traffic in those days. We did not have any sports field, we used Cambridge City Football Club grounds or Jesus Green. I had school dinners whilst there but had the advantage (?) of my mother being a dinner lady. Another dinner lady was Mrs Andrews whose son, Richard, (now living in New Zealand) became my best man. I also recollect that we were regularly visited by the "nit nurse". I must say that Mr Varley the headmaster commanded a great deal of respect from staff and pupils, and taught everyone a sense of values not very often seen today.

Ann Stone from Swavesey has different recollections: “I have vivid memories of Milton Road School during the war in the 1940's - not as a pupil but as a patient at the Dental Surgery which was in a room at the front of the school building. It was run by two lady dentists and I can remember sitting in the 'dreaded ' chair looking at a blood stained bowl full of extracted teeth, to my left. There was also a shelf with a collection of gruesome looking dental equipment. Once I had had an injection & was sent into an anti room until it took effect. After the extraction I was again sent into another room with big wads of cotton wool in my mouth to soak up the blood. Other children sat in the same room awaiting their turn. Needless to say, with these memories imprinted on my mind I have never got over my fear of visits to the dentist! [PHOTO OF GROUP AT MILTON ROAD SCHOOL IN 1978 ON CHRIS ELLIOTT'S DESK]

Unique medical memories of the Leys School in wartime have come all the way from the USA. Mary Brown writes: “I was most interested in the article I read of August 11, 2004. I am an Addenbrookes Hospital trained nurse and was promoted to Night Sister at the Leys. I recall so well walking those grounds in the middle of the night from North House to East House, and across the street to Brookside, to make rounds on the patients. One night I went through the main entrance when suddenly a soldier jumped out from around the building scaring me. They were on military manoeuvres but I think he was as surprised as I was to see a hospital sister out that late at night. We were required to wait for military convoys to arrive from the railway station for hospital admissions. They usually arrived between 3 a.m. - 5 a.m. They were given water immediately for a brief wash, and then a meal. Many of them were quite ill from being in prison camps overseas, and had travelled long distances.

“I later held the position of Sister in Charge of a twenty bed unit for British Officers. Many of them stayed a short while and after medical clearance for such conditions as diabetes were returned to their regiments. We had a few seriously ill wounded men who were with us for a long time. I recall one officer who joined up in India. His family home was in Suffolk and his mother visited him almost every day which was a great stimulant to his progress. When he recovered from his many complications there was great rejoicing from the other officers who has been so supportive of him. On the day he was allowed out on a late pass they celebrated by throwing toilet rolls out of the windows; I was horrified as toilet paper was a scarce item at that time!

“For a short period I was responsible for a ward of German prisoners, located in School House. There were guards on duty at all times, but we had no problems. We were taught several phrases in German such as "Did you sleep well?" and "Do you have pain?" The older prisoners were polite and grateful, but the younger ones were not so co-operative, especially when we had to turn them on their sides to dress their wounds. They would always raise their right arms and shout "Heil Hitler" when we removed the dressing cart from their bedside. We did not respond in any way to this gesture. We found out later that they were swearing badly in German while we were doing their dressings

“The task of closing this temporary hospital was considerable as we had to have detailed inventory of equipment for the Ministry of Health. This was my final task before transferring back to the old Addenbrookes” [REPRIEVE PIC OF LEYS SCHOOL]

Another regular reader in the USA is Maggie Primeau (nee Hayden) who e-mails:
“I was born and lived in Cambridge until 1964 and have recently started reading your column in the News via the Internet. What wonderful memories they are bringing back: hiding under the table during an air-raid with a swastika painted underneath to poke our tongues out at, walking all the way to school from Elm St when I did not have the bus fare. Listening to the band on Christ's Pieces on Sundays, Rock and Rolling at the Rex in the 50's. The story of Gwydir St Bath-house also brought back good times. What a great town Cambridge was then. I was also proud to be the niece of PC William Hayden who in his time was a great athlete. I now reside in the USA but will be retiring back home soon.”

Memories 15th September 2004, by Mike Petty

Doreen Bacon from Fulbourn has sent me a photo of her older brother, Charles Fitness in his magician's kit. It was taken in a field at Exning in 1946 just after he had been demobbed after the war

Doreen had a happy childhood growing up in the new council houses on Exning Road Newmarket with her mum, dad and 'Charlie magic', her big four-years older brother; “I could never remember the time when he wasn't around. Just as I was struggling to walk and following him around the house and garden there was another baby on the scene. When Charlie was called to inspect the new arrival he said in a puzzled tone, 'But why did you get another one? She's just like the one I've got'. Then off he went to start school. I was left with the baby for company, but it was not the same.

“In winter we all played in the street under the gas lamps. There was hopscotch on the pavement, skipping, paper chases, chalk chases and yo-yos. The Muffin man brought muffins and crumpets to toast on the fire with a long toasting fork. On Saturdays we would eagerly await the arrival of the mail van, if it was Mr Butler he would say 'Hop in the back'. As we knew His Majesty's mail carrier was not allowed to carry passengers the drill was that if anyone stopped him we had to dive quickly under the pile of empty mailbags.

“Dad worked in the Post Office in Newmarket High Street. When in town we called in the Sorting Office to see him. I liked to sit on the revolving stool and watch them put letters in the pigeonholes. The limbless ex-servicemen would sit on the pavement in the High Street and draw pictures. When Dad took the Post office money to the bank he would say, as he gave them something, 'There but for the grace of God go I'. He had been a soldier in the Great War and came back all in one piece, but never forgot those who did not. I wonder how he felt 20 years later when one by one his three children put on a uniform and went off to war.

“Every year the talented post office staff gave a concert for the inmates of the Workhouse and us children were allowed to go with our mums. I was so proud of my dad dressed as a clown doing magic tricks and Charlie wanted to go up there on the stage with his father. He always had a part at the Sunday School concert and in the talent contest on the cinema stage at the Saturday matinees.

“I was always such a shy wallflower, I never had a male escort. But Charlie solved my problem: he formed a dance band with Alan and Gordon from the church and two others. Then they booked the local village halls every Saturday night hired a bus to get us there and I was all set. The partners came and I was just beginning to gain confidence when Hitler thought otherwise. King and Country needed Charlie and Gordon more than I, it seemed. Charlie packed a bag of magic tricks to take with him when he was called up.

“Charlie’s friend, Alan Barnes disappeared from my life suddenly one afternoon when a German plane bombed Newmarket post office while he was serving at the counter. Alan was one of the thirteen people killed. With Charlie away, my sister rushed off to join the Air Force and even such a weed as me was needed. So off I went to northern regions never before seen or explored.

“Charlie ended up in Italy where with the war nearly over he entered a large talent contest in Rome alongside men like Harry Secombe and Max Bygraves. But when peace came the magic had gone forever, it would never return. Childhood had gone and with it many of those we had shared it with. Charlie found his friends had died in labour camps with the Cambridgeshire Regiment; it was hard for him to adjust to civilian life so he decided to go north. He dressed in his magician’s costume for one last photo, then packed up his magic and left for Blackpool where he got a job as a lifeguard. Once he had saved enough he set up a showroom to sell magic. One of his favourite customers was Tommy Cooper who called in when performing there in summer shows.

Although we both married in 1952 and my son was born on his birthday, there never was any Fitness children to carry on our surname. Unfortunately my children only saw Charlie when he came back for our parents’ funerals. When he too left me suddenly without a sign in 1968, I was penniless in a hospital unable to do anything.

“On my Granddaughter’s birthday one year I was invited to the party, there was the local magician amusing the crowd and I must admit I shed a tear as my memory returned to Charlie Magic.” [SCAN OF CHARLIE MAGIC, SCAN OF NEWMARKET HIGH STREET IN THE 1930S; SCAN OF NEWMARKET POST OFFICE FOLLOWING BOMBING – PERHAPS BETTER PIC IN NEWS LIBRARY]

Pat Haslop (nee Humphreys) from Bar Hill has written following Memories of 18th August. “The photograph of Newmarket Road in 1928 sent me down memory lane. Although it was taken twelve years before I was born I recognised it immediately. The plane tree was fully grown by then and was just a few feet from our front door at number 124. We lived in the flat above Traylens the butchers and the leaves were level with our windows. On the corner of East Road was a cycle shop – Flitton and Frost, next door was a sweet shop. In the centre of the road were some Gents’ Toilets. It looks a lot calmer back in those days – it’s pretty ghastly there now!” [SCAN 10456 NEWMARKET ROAD 1928 – A VARIANT FROM THE ONE USED LAST TIME]

Peggy Brutnell of Cambridge also recalls the area: “My granddad, Bob Beamiss senior worked for Arnolds Dairies in Abbey Road where the cows were kept. He used to get up at four o'clock in the morning by candlelight and go and milk the cows first, then drive them down Newmarket Road past the old men's toilet, down Walnut Tree Avenue on to the common. Then at four in the afternoon he'd fetch them back, milk them again and get the full churns ready for my two uncles, who were twins, to take them to the station and pick up the empty churns for the next day. I often went with one of them on their delivery round in a little pony trap. I lived in New Street and clearly remember the Good Friday skipping on Parker's Piece because my sister and I always had new sandals and short white socks for that very day. I could write a book about my growing up, we were poor but it was magic" [SCAN OF NEWMARKET ROAD 1963 SHOWING CORNER ABBEY ROAD - SCAN OF MILKMAN IN SCOTLAND ROAD – NOT THE ONE REMEMBERED]

More Milton Road school memories flood in

Angela Thomas, now living in Canberra, Australia recalls

"I only attended Milton Road for a very short time before the Arbury Junior School opened but, apart from the beds for infants, hymn sheets and milk monitors, my most vivid memory is of the birthday badges. I turned 6 while I was there (1955) and the birthday child got to choose a badge for the day. I had my eye on the teddy badge for the longest time and on my birthday my mum made a special trip down to the school playground so she could admire it". Angela also remembers the dreaded dental surgery which was part of the school - or was that just a nightmare? she asks. Margaret Primeau also remembers it: "I only have one bad memory of that school, when I was going to Chesterton Girls we had to go to the Milton Road school to see the dentist. That place put the fear of God into me with it's cold tiled walls and the sound of that drill. I've hated dentists ever since" while Joan Walker from Cambridge who began her schooldays at Milton Road in 1923 recalls: "the dreaded dentist arrived each year with his treadle drill – something to put you off dentists for life. There were no school meals. Some of the delicate children received sunlight treatment and daily cod liver oil and malt. We envied the boys in winter because the caretaker would put down water to make super slides for them, which we girls were not allowed to use"

For those who transgressed punishment was swift; Janet Brown from Waterbeach cannot forget being given the slipper on the hands – very painful. "Our crime: I remember it so well. The wooden desks had inkwells, top left with underneath a round hole. Some desks also had holes in the bottom right-hand corner. These were big enough for a glass marble. You dropped your marble in the top hole, having arranged books, rules, pencil cases etc inside the desk. Down, down all the obstacles and the marble drops out from the bottom hole! Unfortunately not all desks had holes and we were caught making them! With what I don't remember. There were four of us. I was the only girl"

Roger Coleman from Cambridge graduated to milk monitor in Miss Buchanan's class before he left in July 1960. "I recall the daily visit of the Co-Operative Society's Bedford 'J' type flat back lorry in the playground with the dreadful smell of sour milk on the steel milk crates. They were then moved to a lobby off the main hall, adjacent to the iron gates to the boiler room and cellar. Down the steep concrete steps you would invariably meet the very pleasant Mr Robinson, the caretaker, who would find you a box of 'Sweetheart' drinking straws. It was then back to the crates and push the straws through the silver tops of the 1/3 [ONE-THIRD] pint bottles. I have wonderful memories of this landmark 1908 building which I cannot bare the thought of being demolished. It richly deserves an imaginative new use when it finally closes its doors.

Memories 22nd September 2004, by Mike Petty

This week / NEXT WEEK / ON SATURDAY - PLEASE SELECT - one of Cambridge's best loved shops, Robert Sayle, will move from their old site in St Andrew's Street to a new temporary home in Burleigh Street. But when their old building closes it will take with it a host of memories for those who have worked and shopped there over the years.

Robert Sayle himself was born in February 1816, the eldest son of a farmer at Southery. This was a period of agricultural depression that was to boil over just a few months later in an uprising remembered as the Littleport Riots which would end with a number of fenmen being hanged for protesting at the hardship of their lot. But Robert's father was astute enough to see the opportunity to expand in times of trouble and added to his acreage.

He also sent his son to school in Ely before the lad forsook the fens for London where he learned his trade working for a firm of wholesale and retail drapers. Then daddy stepped in again, providing the money to acquire John Cooch's business at Victoria House in St Andrew's Street Cambridge where Robert opened his business on 21st March 1840.

He introduced plate glass windows, stocked up with linen, drapery, silk mercery and straw bonnets and set fixed prices which gave him a small profit but quick return. At first he lived above the shop but later moved to a house in Trumpington Road with his wife and a large family of ten children.

The rooms on the upper floors of his shop were converted to living quarters for his staff. They were strictly separated with different corridors for men and women. At mealtimes assistants sat at long tables in segregated dining rooms where meals were served by maids. In the evenings girls had to be in at nine o'clock and men by ten, but there was a reading room, a billiard room and a rowing club which was open to both sexes.

In June 1952 fire broke out in the living quarters, sending a thick pall of smoke pouring out of one of the windows on the top floor. Some twenty staff dashed downstairs and out through the shop carrying their belongings with them. One assistant, Miss Ann Todd, said: "I thought of all of my clothes and I struggled down from my room with masses of them. I wasn't going to leave them behind". As it was a Thursday afternoon there were only about 30 people in the premises at the time and staff organised a chain of buckets until the arrival of the Fire Brigade.

One of the staff employed then was Mrs Olive Turkentine who joined the firm in 1934, aged 14. In September 1981 she shared some of her memories through the pages of the John Lewis Partnership Gazette.

"Robert Sayle was the shop in Cambridge; ordinary people really didn't go there and I was terrified when my mother took me along to be interviewed", she recalled. She got the job at the princely wage of 7s.6d. [SEVEN SHILLINGS AND SIXPENCE] (37p) a week which was a lot of money for a fourteen-year old. Olive started as a cashier sitting at an enclosed till – "a bit like a budgie in a huge cage" – and a selling assistant brought the money over to her. The pace of life in the shop was sedate. Juniors were not allowed to serve but dusted, addressed envelopes and generally fetched and carried, passing the time in between by making velvet chokers which were sold to customers.

Many people centred their social life around the shop which often held parties where everybody danced with everybody else. They also staged fashion shows, as the News reported in 1926: "To the average man, a mannequin parade presents characteristics which combine to embarrass the most strongly minded. He is overwhelmed with the importance of the occasion and metaphorically 'smothered' by the bevy of beauty which confronts him. No cheque book could have been greatly taxed at Messrs Sayle and Company's two parades as the moderate prices were an outstanding factor. It was an excellent demonstration of what really can be done for a modest expenditure and record attendance marked both the morning and afternoon displays. We look forward to a parade of men's wear, when the ladies may blush in their embarrassing minority".

It was a dignified, old-fashioned place. There were floor-walkers who strolled around to see the staff were behaving properly. The buyers were like kings who ruled their departments but the customers were most important. They were treated with great ceremony and always addressed as 'Sir' or 'Madam'. Once a customer opened an account an assistant was not allowed to ask their name; if they didn't know then they had discreetly to find somebody who did.

But it could be different in Rag Week: undergraduates would come in and pretend to be serving, taking the place of assistants who had been 'kidnapped' in the market and not released until they had paid a forfeit.

Not even Robert Sayle could ride out the recession of the inter-war years; in 1934 the store was bought by Selfridge Provincial Stores and several of the senior staff left. By then Olive had moved to the handbag counter and it was there she learned how to cope with that new phenomenon, the sale, as Selfridges cleared out old stock. "When the doors opened there were people tearing towards us, like a sea". After the war she relocated to the wool counter, witnessing customers scrabbling for the short supplies, while on the stocking counter "it was more like a swarm of locusts".

Through it all service was the key. One customer ordered two nightcaps to be knitted for her bald husband. When the orders returned there was not a Wee Willie Winkie to be seen so one poor assistant had no choice but to sit up all night and knit them herself as the customer was coming in the next day.

In 1940 the store was acquired by the John Lewis Partnership, though the old name continued and 'Robert Sayle' celebrated its 150th anniversary in 1990. But times change and now the store is moving to Burleigh Street whilst a major transformation in city centre shopping takes place.

Yet the new Grand Arcade will itself reflect the heritage of Robert Sayle. For the original 'Arcade' was the name given to a series of small businesses established in the old Corn Exchange on St Andrew's Hill after the present Exchange opened in 1875. And that conversion was just one of the brainchild of Robert Sayle himself.

If you have memories of working or shopping at Robert Sayle's store, please share them – write to Mike Petty at the News [SCANS OF ROBERT SAYLE C1910 AND 1966, OTHER PICS IN NEWS PHOTO FILES, SCAN OF THE ORIGINAL 'ARCADE' – THE OLD CORN EXCHANGE ON THE CORNER OF DOWNING STREET AND CORN EXCHANGE STREET, WHEN USED AS A GARAGE IN 1939]

Possible customers? How many of these ladies brought their closes at Robert Sayle before embarking on an omnibus excursion from the Tiger Inn in East Road. The photo was found by Maurice Rolph during a house clearance at Trumpington. The ladies are obviously dressed up and wearing buttonholes but who were they, where were they off to and when was it - can anybody add any details? [SCAN OF OUTING]

Eltisley Local History Society are researching the story of their village men who died in the Great War. They are commemorated by a memorial on the lych gate and a row of lime trees, called the Row of Honour, on the village green. There is one lime tree for each man who died, eight in a line for those killed and three forming a cross near one end called the Cross of Sorrow for those who were missing until declared dead. At the end is a spruce tree called the Peace Tree. But were any of the men your relations and can you add to their story. The names are George Childerley, Harry Cranfield, Arthur and Walter Kidman, Harry King, James Payne, Henry George Sewell, Albert John and William George Smith-Chappell, Sidney and

Harry Hayden, Frank and Martin Riseley, and Herbert Topham. If you can shed any light on their story please contact Mary Flinders on 01480 880268 or write to me and I'll pass your letter on. Or come along to their meeting in the Cade Memorial Hall on the Green at Eltisley on 27th October when I'll be talking about Ghosts and Witches of Cambridgeshire, including some other village's lads who came home though their names are on the memorial. Other lads in uniform feature in a picture of Cambridge Sea Cadets on King's Parade, probably for a Royal Visit in 1948 – but can you add details. The officer on the left is Herbert Ketch and lad one from the end is Graham Race, who lent me the picture. [SCAN 100.76]

Memories 29th September 2004, by Mike Petty

This week a new chapter in the story of Cambridge transport opens with the inquiry into the proposals for a guided bus system. This would utilise the route of the old Cambridge to St Ives railway track and then on arrival at the city strike off into the centre along roads, joining the more conventional means of transport.

Surely such a multi-modal transport scheme can not have been contemplated before. Oh no? What about September 1904 – just 100 years ago?

In those days Cambridge had a traffic problem; in fact no town in England had a worse one than Cambridge in term time the News claimed in 1905. Motor cars and motor bicycles had arrived and numerous undergraduates were roaring about, knocking over cows in Victoria Avenue and causing mayhem. But cars were just for the rich. [CARTOON OF SUPER-FRESHER – RICH GRAD WITH HIS CAR AND CHAUFFEUR - 7026]

The rest of us relied on foot or bicycles. These had become essential as house prices in Cambridge were so expensive that ordinary folk could no longer afford to live here and needed to cycle in from the outlying districts – as the News contended in 1910

There were of course railway stations to bring folk from Histon, Oakington and beyond. But the station was far away from the centre of town, driven out by University concerns about the impact unregulated hoards of visitors would bring. On arrival at the station if you were in a hurry you walked; otherwise you took a cab or waited for public transport.

By 1900 Cambridge had two forms of public transport, buses or trams; both were pulled by horse. The former would roam throughout the town, the latter were more regular but constricted to those roads with tramlines running down them. The horse trams had been established in 1880 and had served the town for nearly 25 years. But there was no doubt that they were too slow, and served too few places – plodding from the station down Hills Road either to St Andrew's Street or the Market Hill via Lensfield Road, Trumpington Street and King's Parade or down East Road to their tram shed. There was a need for an extended service [SCAN OF HORSE BUS AT CHESTERTON 100t466], SCAN OF HORSE TRAM ON MARKET HILL - 'MKT']

The future in 1904 was believed to be electric power – no smelly piles of horse droppings, no motor fumes. We already had an electricity generating station on Quayside which could supply the current and a new Cambridge Electric Tramways Syndicate was established to put it all into place.

They came up with radical proposals for new tramlines down Victoria Avenue to Chesterton, along East Road to Newmarket Road, down Mill Road to Romsey and Hills Road to Blinco Grove. There would be a service to Castle Hill and along Victoria Road as far as Garden Walk.

The plans were submitted to Cambridge Borough Council who commissioned a London firm to advise them. Their report was submitted in September 1904.

They did not confine themselves to streets within Cambridge itself but looked wider, realising that much of the problem came from the surrounding area; only then it was Chesterton and Cherry Hinton from which people commuted, not St Ives and Swavesey.

One solution would have been to extend the existing tramways system to these further-flung places by running lines down Sidney Street, Bridge Street and Magdalene Street or via Trinity and St John's Streets. But they were not able to recommend such a scheme "having regard to the narrowness of the streets"; tramways would be inconvenient and would certainly meet with opposition from residents.

Although the existing horse trams ran down King's Parade these should be scrapped, the consultants recommended. The route could not be worked efficiently and, more importantly, the construction of overhead power lines for the electric trams would be unsightly. [HORSE TRAM OUTSIDE SENATE HOUSE – 100.81. CARTOON ABOUT THE ELECTRIC TRAMS - 7269]

Instead trams should be routed along Queen's Road, although even there it was likely that people would object; but 'although it is of the character of a boulevard, yet there are no properties immediately abutting on the road that would be disturbed by the working of the tramways'. In more recent times people have objected that the parking of cars along the Backs has ruined the character of the area.

But to get from the town centre to Queen's Road the trams would have to go down Silver Street. This they appreciated in 1904 was very narrow. "The character of the street is such that if a double line is constructed the tramway cars would take their turn with the ordinary road traffic, keeping left in each direction". Trams would have to take their place amongst other traffic. This problem of integrating a new system into the already-overcrowded roads is one which is likely to be debated again in the next few weeks.

Back in 1904 the debate was long and vociferous but despite the objections the majority of the council gave their support. It would be a radical system to take Cambridge into the twentieth-century.

But after all the discussion and hours of debate the scheme stumbled at the first hurdle. For before the Cambridge Electric Tramways Syndicate could implement electrification they had to purchase the existing lines which were owned by the existing horse-drawn Cambridge Street Tramways Company. They being well aware of their powerful position held out for a very high price for their principal assets. In the end they asked too much and the whole scheme foundered.

Those with long memories will have remembered that the same thing had happened back in 1898. Then the British Electric Traction Company had raised all the benefits of electric trams – they would be warm, comfortable and 'a pleasure to ride', but the opposition had then argued about unsightly lines and road obstructions.

The horse trams proprietors were jubilant, even their rivals, the horse omnibuses had gone out of business. But there was already talk of steam trams and even the prospect of that new form of transport – the motor bus. They arrived in 1905 when not one but two companies started up, competing for the same passengers, racing each other to bus stops. But they proved too noisy & too unreliable; they ran over too many dogs and frightened too many ladies on their bicycles. Within a year both companies' buses had been banned and the old horse trams, now renovated and repainted, reigned supreme. [CARTOON OF PROBLEMS CAUSED BY BUS - 5779; OPEN-TOP BUS ON MARKET HILL - OPENBUS]

It was not to last; in 1907 J.B. Walford introduced the Ortona motor buses and competition resumed. This time the trams could not survive. As revenues dropped so the cost of their tram lines rose – they made road maintenance more expensive. And now there were even more cars. On 18th February 1914 the trams made their last runs, packed with hundreds of passengers anxious to say they had travelled on these relics of a bygone age. The tramcars, horses, stables and harness were sold off. But some of the tramlines were left since with the advent of the Great War there were other things for the council to spend money on. Sections have been rediscovered during road works from time to time. [ORTONA BUS - 9177, PASSENGERS PACK THE LAST TRAM - 6937]

The tram's epitaph was written by Will Thomas of the Black and White Concert Party

Who killed the Tramways?

I said the motor bus, for there wasn't room for both of us,
I killed the Tramways.

Now the traffic could go where it wished, with nothing to guide it. Only time will tell whether a Guided Bus replaces it. [FIND MODERN PICTURE OF GUIDED BUS]

Memories 6th October 2004, by Mike Petty

The arrival of a new batch of undergraduates has seen Cambridge streets once more thronged with young men and women about to embark on their academic career. But just 50 years ago there was even more cause for excitement since a guest house in Silver Street had been converted as a temporary home for a new, third, foundation for women, New Hall.

It was not quite the luxurious existence of some other colleges: the dining hall was soon overflowing with people eating their meals in the college office whilst the cooks, striving to cope, were resorting to an old gas oven in the pantry to supplement the one in the kitchen.

The girls drew lots for the rather Spartan bedrooms and shared three bathrooms. But a rather gloomy downstairs study room was well-equipped with desks and chairs and nearby was an out-of-doors wringer of hefty make allowing the girls to do their washing and save on laundry bills

A News reporter was invited to tour their new home and was shown round by Miss Angela Holder, a petite, attractive Freshman, one of the first 16 students in residence. She, like the others, had been selected following an entrance examination designed to test logical thought and power of expression. This combination of brains and charm brought articles in newspapers such as the Iraq Times & Rhodesia Herald as well as various illustrated magazines.

The girls were photographed with books and bicycles, with the college head and college gatekeeper – who was the same person - for, as Angela explained, "You try to be in by 11pm because otherwise Miss Murray has to sit up - we can't afford a porter yet".

Miss Rosemary Murray was more than that. She was also the person who fixed any broken electrical equipment, who looked after the two college punts and tended gardens. She served on numerous outside bodies, educational councils and commissions and became the University's first woman Vice Chancellor. Her foresight and courage were praised by the Queen Mother who formally opened the new buildings on Huntingdon Road in June 1965. My appeal for memories of Robert Sayles has sent the e-mail's soaring

Jean Battelley from Babraham started work at Robert Sayle in April 1941 after leaving school aged 14. She biked 6½ [SIX AND A HALF] miles every day, except Sundays for eight shillings a week. Jean worked in the fashion workroom with over twenty girls and later went into the showrooms fitting clothes for customers. Jean stayed there over 32 years and enjoyed every moment: "It wasn't the money that kept us there, but the good company. I am still friends with many girls I worked with", she adds

Patricia Cooper (nee Fortin) from Rushden writes: "I was employed by Robert Sayles' from the Autumn of 1960, initially as a junior apprentice hairdresser. The salon was largely made up of private cubicles. There were at least ten stylists and a good number of juniors. My first job each morning was to check the appointment book to see how many perms and colours there were to be done as each customer was offered a coffee. In order to facilitate this I had to work out how much milk was required to be collected from the canteen. On arriving, one of the ladies would take the top off one of the churns of milk and with a measure, would pour the milk into a large jug. At the back of the salon and down some stone steps we had a little room where a dear lady called Mrs Gooch spent each day feeding the used black and white towels into a small washing machine. In the summer we hung the washing out to dry on the flat roof and waved to anyone who happened to look up"

Christine Stockdale (nee Summers) e-mails from Kettering: "I left school in July 1963 aged 15 and started work as a junior. There were fourteen of us, thirteen girls and one boy. During our two weeks induction the girls that were going onto the sales floor were given the traditional grey and white striped shirts and grey skirts. We were taught that the customer comes first and you give them your undivided attention. As juniors we spent a few months in different departments; I spent mine in Haberdashery, the Coat department with Mrs Piper, upstairs in the office with Miss Little and then Gloves and Handbags. My final destination was the little counter just inside the door by the stairs down to the basement; we (Averil Auker and myself) sold handkerchiefs, artificial flowers umbrellas and bridal veils. Our wages started at £3.5s and we worked a five and a half day week for that. Thursday afternoon was the time we had off. The older juniors were very friendly and you soon found your own group to hang around with. I can still remember their names & would just like to take this opportunity to wish them all well wherever they are today"

Both Francis Wayman from Bourn and Patrick Doggett from Milton Keynes recall their father and grandfather working for the firm. Francis writes : "The fact that Robert Sayle learned his trade in London would explain why my grandfather George Henry Doggett left London to work for, and later become company secretary to Robert Sayle, a position he held until the store was bought by Selfridges and he was 83. My father, Frank Doggett also worked for Robert Sayle as head of accounts until 1940 when John Lewis acquired the store". Patrick recalls: "Grandpa (George Henry Doggett) was a tall upright man with a neat white beard, he commanded respect wherever he went. He worked in the Counting House, at that time at the front of the shop behind a glass partition. This was later moved upstairs at the back, overlooking the yard. My particular memory is, as a very small boy, being taken to see the visit of King George V and Queen Mary to Cambridge in October 1934. I was perched on top of one of the display cabinets in the front of the shop (where the flowers are in the 1966 picture), from which I got a lovely view of the royal procession. I also remember the carpet cleaning plant at the bottom of the yard, where the carpets were stretched over a large wooden drum, and brushed clean amid clouds of dust, and a lot of noise". [SCAN OF ROBERT SAYLE'S 1966 SHOWING WHERE PATRICK SAT TO SEE THE KING]

Doreen Bacon's tribute to her brother, 'Charlie Magic' has triggered memories across the country. Alan Maskell, secretary of the Pentacle Club writes: "A couple of weeks ago you featured magician Charlie Fitness and last week I caught up with a couple of magicians who knew Charlie. They were interested to see the article having fond memories of him. Charlie is well remembered for his magic studio, which was upstairs over his wife's hairdressing salon in Blackpool. It's thought that she did the better business! The magician appearing regularly at the Tower in those days was George Wallman and when he had his holiday Charlie would stand in for him and do the show. However, the one thing Charlie is really remembered for is an idea he had. He reasoned that magicians, like many entertainers, used to have a lull in February as people recovered from Christmas and prepared for Spring so he chose February as the ideal month to stage a one day magicians convention in Blackpool. It was an idea that really took off and next year sees the 53rd such convention which, now-a-days, lasts for three days and the Blackpool Magicians Club claim it to be the world's largest magic convention - and all from someone who nearly turned his back on the art!" [SCAN OF CHARLIE MAGIC]

My discovery of a bill from Victoria Road furrier, Mr W. Rothwell has brought a letter from his son who still lives in Cambridge. He tells me his father was born in Bury, Lancashire before moving to Cambridge in 1949; he retired in the mid 1970s and passed away in February 1991. Dennis Gifford writes: "I moved into Victoria Park in 1957 and well remember Mr Rothwell's fur shop; it went on until furs became unpopular". Allan Davis of Alibaba's hair studio for men recalls: "In 1989 I was lucky enough to buy Mr Rothwell's old shop, although it had been empty a number of years. When I moved to Victoria Road to open my first hairdressing salon in 1972 I took over the old barber's shop on the opposite corner of Albert Street. This had been run for the best part of the 20th century by a Mr Rolph and then on to Brian Mcquage – maybe some will remember these old barbers"

More memories were jogged by Maurice Rolph's picture of a group of ladies outside the Tiger pub on the corner of Bradmore Street, East Road Cambridge. Mrs J. Patman from Chesterton saw her mother, Mrs Patten, and her aunt amongst them together with the landlady of the Tiger, Dolly Birnes, who apparently bought the buttonholes. Amongst the others she can name are Mrs Hipkins and her daughter, Mrs Philpot, Maud Pagecroft, Dolly Philpot and Mrs Needham. Ann James from Balsham spotted her 'aunt', Victoria Foreman and her mother. They had been evacuated from Dover during the war and lived with Ann's family in Norwich Street. "Aunt Vic was a lovely lady who worked at Woolworth's all her life, getting a job in the Cambridge shop before returning to Kent in 1946", she tells me. Robert Rollings also has an interest in the picture for it shows his father's mother who passed away when his dad was just 13 years old, together with her sister. [SCAN OF OUTING]

Memories 13th October 2004, by Mike Petty

The current furore about the lopping of conifer trees beside the railway line at Gt Shelford reminds Eric George of the tall hollyhocks that used to grow along the back of the platform in the 1920s. As a lad used the station when travelling to the Perse Prep. He recalls: "Going to school in Cambridge was quite an experience for an eight year old and for the first few terms I went by train. Going was straightforward as every train that stopped at the down platform took you to Cambridge. On one occasion my parents and I were going to Cambridge and arrived at the station just as the train was pulling out. The Station Master saw us and called to the signalman to stop the London Express which was due to pass through in a few minutes, so that we could get on.

“The railway played a big part in our lives, not only as a mode of transport but as it ran only about two hundred yards west of our house it was very much part of the scene. The up line had a siding often used by coal trains on their way to London when they had to back off the line to allow passenger traffic through. By night however they usually had a clear run and we would hear them rumbling along in the small hours. From our bedroom' windows we could see the King's Cross or Northern line where the expresses were pulled by 4-4-2 Atlantics. The bend on that line just after leaving the Liverpool St. line was very tight and engines often made a characteristic clanking noise while negotiating the curve.

“In Granham's Road near the level crossing stood Abberley House whose grounds went back into the angle between the two lines. It belonged to Mr Marsh who used to train horses for King George V and who used to wave to the Royal Train which not infrequently passed on its way to or from Sandringham. It was said that the King used to wave back. I sometimes stood with the crossing keeper, who had to keep the gates closed some minutes before and after the Royal Train passed. In those days Shelford station had a considerable staff including the Station Master, a booking clerk, a goods foreman, a trolley man, several porters and enough signalmen to cover the whole twenty-four hours. I must not forget the horse which as well as pulling the trolley for local deliveries was also used for minor shunting duties around the goods shed. As well as using the train for passengers most of the fruit and flowers went by rail to markets in London, Birmingham, Glasgow, Leeds or wherever the best prices ruled at the time.”

One of his favourite lessons at the Perse Prep was gardening. “Once a week a period was devoted to gardening, the school having a fair sized allotment plot behind Bateman Street and which is now part of the Botanic Garden. As far I recollect a pair of boys shared a plot of about twenty square yards with perhaps one shrub and a few perennials already there, leaving room to grow a few other things. It must have been about that time that I persuaded Father to let me have a similar plot at home where I remember growing Aquilegias and Purple Sprouting Broccoli from packets bought from Woolworth's.”

This early interest took root and after the war he completed his degree in Botany at Downing College before launching into an academic career that was to see him become Curator of the Cultural Collection of Algae and Protozoa and travel the world before retiring in the 1980s. Now living in Cambridge he has collected together his memories, ‘Many Decades’ for his family and friends.

Someone else interested in things botanical is Sheena Macfarlane who is seeking information on her grandfather Harry Banks who used to run the Plough & Harrow on Madingley Road in the thirties and forties. She has been searching the News archives on the website (www.cambridge-news.co.uk) and came across a Memories article from 19th June last year. It featured a photograph of Harry together with his father and mother, Ernest and Laura Banks that Megan Timbrell had sent from Bristol. Now Sheena is trying to find the answer to a family conundrum – one member of the Banks family worked at Kew Gardens and developed a rose. But she doesn't know the name of either. It would mean a lot to her to be able to go back to Kew Gardens and see if they are actually growing the rose he developed. If you can help then e-mail sheena_macfarlane@hotmail.com or drop me a line

Christopher Kirk from Northallerton, Yorkshire would also appreciate your help. He writes: “My mother tells me that when she was a girl living in Histon in the late 1920's Chivers would hire a train for a trip to the seaside. All the organisations would go along, including the churches. At that time my grandfather Earnest Setchell was caretaker at the Baptist church and Reg Barnes was Sunday School superintendent. Apparently Reg always took a movie camera with him to film events of the day and then in the following winter would provide a film show to recall their adventures. I wonder if any of that film still exists?" If you can help contact me and I'll put you in touch.

Village chapels continue to play an important part in many people's lives as they have for generations. William Hitch who now lives in Durham. He writes: "In the 1930s a new Haddenham vicar decided to upset most of his congregation and almost all of them left the Parish Church. My Mum and Dad and me were asked if we would like to go to the Methodist Church rather than go nowhere at all. So my parents accepted and we became Methodists and were made most welcome. When I grew older and left school, I pumped the organ in the morning and Ron Sulman did it for the evening service. Talk about sweat! Your arm was going like the clappers to keep enough wind in the pipes. The organists were Mabel Freeman (later to become Mrs Demaine), Florrie Chapman (later to become Mrs Morton) and Mrs Charles Bester. In the summer they wore pretty frocks and picture hats and looked very smart. I enjoyed the Sunday School Anniversaries, Sunday School trips, Harvest Festivals and the Wesley Guild at Ely. The preachers from the Circuit were Mrs Stevens from Stretham and Bob Green from Wilburton who would always start his sermons with "We will now endeavour to evangelise the inevitable". I shall always remember Arthur Freeman who used to sit in front of me at chapel; he loved singing the hymns and, if there were a good few verses, he would lean over to me and say, 'You take over now, Bill', but he would always join in the last verse when he had got his breath back. Such stalwarts showed us an example and would somehow shape our lives for ever, which would stand us in good stead for the difficult days that lay ahead". Now Valerie Bloy has recorded his reminiscences together with those of other members of the congregation of Haddenham Methodist church, past and present in a new publication 'Haddenham's Heritage', copies of which are available from [SCAN OF HADDENHAM HIGH STREET & CHAPEL]

Many memories were jogged by Maurice Rolph's picture of a group of ladies outside the Tiger pub on the corner of Bradmore Street, East Road Cambridge. Sheila Diaper (nee Birne) writes from New Milton, Hampshire, to say her parents, Dorothy and Sam Birne were the licencees at that time and thinks the picture was taken of the ladies darts team outing to either Gt Yarmouth or Southend. Most of the ladies came from three adjacent streets, Bradmore Street, where the Tiger was on the corner, South Street and Broad Street. All have now been demolished and replaced by Anglia Polytechnic University. Dorothy is fourth from the right on the front row. She thinks it was about 1949-50 but Ann James from Balsham is sure it must be earlier. She spotted her 'aunt', Victoria Foreman and her mother who had been evacuated from Dover during the war and lived with Ann's family in Norwich Street. "Aunt Vic was a lovely lady who worked at Woolworth's all her life, getting a job in the Cambridge shop before returning to Kent in 1946", she tells me. Robert Rollings also has an interest in the picture for it shows his father's mother who passed away when his dad was just 13 years old, together with her sister

Mrs J. Patman from Chesterton saw her mother, Mrs Patten, and her aunt amongst together with Mrs Hipkins and her daughter, Mrs Philpot, Maud Pagecroft, Dolly Philpot and Mrs Needham. M.W. Summerfield writes from Haddenham to say the lady on the far right, front row is his grandmother Florrie Summerfield and this is confirmed by Lesley Barham from Chesterton who can supply many details. She writes: "Florrie was married to Walter Summerfield and they had a greengrocer's shop on the other side of East Road. Before then they were based in Fitzroy Street where Costa Coffee is now. Florrie died in 1948 and Walter in 1954. [SCAN OF OUTING]

Another picture to have got readers pondering is that of the group of Sea Cadets in King's Parade, Cambridge. Mary Cox (nee Lynn) recognised her late brother Maurice Lynn in the front row on the left of the officer. He spent many years in the Sea Cadets firstly as a cadet then going on to become Commanding Officer of the unit after serving for two years National Service in the Royal Navy as an electrical artificer. He passed on these skills at the Cadet's Riverside Headquarters and, with everybody helping, restored an old boat that he used to take cadets down river to Ely for a long weekend. Marice was also recognised by Don Jeffries of Bassingbourn who joined the Sea Cadets in the 1950s. Robert Ling was also on parade together with Graham Rayner and has lent me a picture of the two of them marching with their rifles. He tells me the Sea Cadets were based at Milton Road School where the boiler house doubled-up as the armoury. [SCAN OF SEA CADETS]

Now Ivan Westley from St Ives has lent a picture of 104 Squadron of Cambridge Air Training Corps. He's the corporal in the front row but cannot remember anything else about the event. It was certainly before he joined the Fleet Air Arm in the Second World War. Can you help jog his memory [SCAN 100.80]

Many apologies for the wrongly-captioned picture in last week's 'Memories' when Queen's College was described as the first home of New Hall! Fortunately at least the Blue Plaque people got it right and unveiled their plaque on the right building further along Silver Street. Memories 20th October 2004, by Mike Petty

What started as a mystery picture of a group of ladies outside the Tiger Pub in East Road Cambridge has prompted numerous letters so that now most of the faces have been recognised.

We know it was the ladies darts team and that they were off on an outing to the seaside. But what was the bus they travelled in?

The answer to that should be easy, because Paul Carter has just compiled what must be the definitive book on Cambridgeshire buses up to 1950. It even has a list of bus numbers identifying the make, who bought it, when and when it went out of use.

Turning again to the photograph I can only make out part of the registration number which seems to read '177'. Paul's list includes CF 8117, a Chevrolet bought new by Norman's of Exning in 1928 and acquired by the Ortona motor company in April 1930. There were many such small operators based in local villages. They included Whippet, Harston and District, Drayton's motor service from Barley, Heydon and District, Mansfield's Brown Buses from Burwell, Barker's of Fenstanton and Jabez Cornwell Parnell's 'Haddenham and District' based at Stretham.

So is it a Chevrolet? I scan the numerous pictures in the new book. There are pictures of Leyland Titanics, Gilfords, Bedfords, Dennis and Albions, but no Chevrolets. There is however a picture of a bus that looks very similar to the one that carried the darts ladies. It has the same little lamps illuminating the destination board, the driver's window opens across the middle in the same way, the registration number is in the same place and the radiator looks the right shape. The caption records it was one of twenty saloons received by the Eastern Counties Omnibus Company in 1947. This ties up with what people think is the date of the picture.

Suddenly it seems there is a vast amount to appreciate about the humble bus and it is easy to understand the enthusiasm of people like Derek Carter, born 1920, whose dad drove them. He recalled: "I grew up with the buses and I've never lost my interest in them. As a small boy I loved to stand and watch them coming out of the garage. I remember seeing one once with flames coming out from the engine - I suppose the petrol had caught fire. I also used to sit on the steps of the Bank on the corner of Hobson Street and Sidney Street and watch the buses while Mother was shopping in town. I liked riding on them too and I can remember going out to Girton Corner. It was a cold day for riding on an open-top double-decker and my nose was as red as a rear light by the time we got there."

Richard Covill of West Wratting remembered Claude Long's Saloon Bus Service whose small fleet included a Chevrolet. He recalled: "I travelled on the school bus from Westley Waterless to Cambridge from 1932 to 1937. The bus ran empty from West Wratting to Burrough Green, and the driver would usually hoot as he passed my house. That was my signal to get out of bed. It would turn round at the rectory in Burrough Green and wait for any latecomers. I caught it on its way back.

Mr Long was a very nice man, short and dark with a moustache, and he was a bit of a joker. He sometimes drove the bus, and he would entertain the passengers by playing the latest songs on a harmonica. One day we had a learner driver (no L-plates!) and we met a steam-roller near the old school in Brinkley. The bus went into a ditch and tilted over to about 45 degrees, but the steam roller pulled us out"

In those days buses had conductors. One of them was Gladys Hughes (nee Caston) who was called up for war work in 1941 when aged 18. She recalled: "It wasn't easy working in the blackout. We only had one very dim light in a cylinder, rather like a cocoa tin, which we could slide along the ceiling of the bus on the end of a wire. It didn't always stay there when the bus was full of servicemen. They often paid their fares with half-crowns instead of pennies, even though I always called out to them to 'scrape the edges'. The buses were often packed, especially the 'cattle truck' single-deckers, but most of the passengers were wonderful. I called them 'my public'!

"Once I was on the 101 in Cambridge. There were lots of 'boys in blue' (injured servicemen) staying at Chesterton Hall and a crowd were waiting at the stop. One had both his legs in plaster and could hardly move. It took me and four of his mates to get him onto the platform, and I told him to stay there, be my 'unofficial assistant conductor' and ring the bell when I called out. This worked until we got to Bridge Street, where I got down to help another passenger off the bus. For some reason my unofficial assistant conductor rang the bell and the bus set off without me. I had to run right through the town centre as far as the University Arms Hotel before I caught it".

Another conductor, Laddie Holland, also has memories of wartime: "One night we met a big crowd off the midnight train at Royston station who wanted to go to Bassingbourn aerodrome. I said 'Pile them all on!' When we got to the camp I counted 119 passengers get off the bus. I thought I felt it swaying about a bit on Kneesworth Hill!"

Now Paul is seeking similar memories from the post-war days to include in his second book on Cambridge buses, taking the story from 1950 to the present. His present book is full of fascinating facts and stories but inevitably there are gaps. If you can help to fill them, or have pictures or information on any bus operators that may have escaped his attention, then write to Paul Carter at 3 Woods Green, Wadhurst, East Sussex, TN5 6QN or drop me a line.

Terry Holloway from Marshalls has e-mailed to put Ivan Westley's mind to rest after more than 60 years. Ivan sent me a picture of himself in 104 (City of Cambridge) Squadron of the Air Training Corps but couldn't remember where and when it had been taken. Terry has turned to the Squadron's records which shows it was September 1943 when Air Marshal Sir Patrick Playfair was the annual Inspecting Officer. Also in the picture are Flying Officer A H G English, Flight Lieutenant A H Chapman (who was the then Commanding Officer), Air Commodore J B Bowan and Mr A G G Marshall - now Sir Arthur - on the extreme left hand of the picture [SCAN ATC]

Mike Nathan e-mails: "I was interested to see a photograph of the Plough and Harrow on Madingley Road in last week's Memories. My parents ran the pub from 1963 until it was knocked down and replaced by the new building. I have been trying to find a photo of the place for ages, even the Cambridge Collection don't seem to have one."

Angela Nunn, nee Flitton, can add details to the Newmarket Road bicycle shop recalled by Pat Haslop (Memories 15th September). She e-mails: Flitton and Frost's bicycle shop was run by my father, Bill Flitton and his partner Chris Frost. They sold BSA and Raleigh bikes plus spares and repairs. Father built and serviced the clowns' large small and silly cycles for Bertram Mills and Chipperfields Circuses. He was also one of the cycle engineers for the Milk Races. They were one of the first businesses in Cambridge to sell by hire purchase. The sign in the shop window said " A BOB A DAY RIDE AWAY" - seven shillings a week for hire purchase on a bicycle.

Memories 27th October 2004, by Mike Petty

Matthew's grocery shop in Trinity Street Cambridge is remembered for being upper-class. It closed in 1964 after the chairman and managing director, Bernard Matthew announced that it was no longer possible to operate profitably under the existing trading conditions. "Rather than lower our standards of personal service, we have decided to close the department", he said

Matthew and Son's grocery business had started in 1821 and provided a high-class service supplying a variety of goods to the academic community. It sold items such as candles and oil lamps, china and glass, as well as a milk saucepan to a young Trinity undergraduate, Austen Chamberlain (later Chancellor of the Exchequer). An advertisement in the Cambridge Chronicle for December 1922 emphasised the wide range of commodities sold – china, hams, mince pies, cigars and all the things necessary for a happy Christmas. By 1936 they were offering eight different sorts of tinned sardines, 14 varieties of 'real' cheese including Stilton at 1s 9d (8p) a pound. There were wines and spirits, cakes and biscuits.

But the shop sold more everyday items too – washing powder, cleaning powder and cheese spread and to maximise sales they needed a good window display. The shop had a specialist in that department, Walter Bedford, who had previously run the Bottisham Stores with his brother James for a number of years before moving on to another shop at Commercial End, Swaffham Bulbeck.

But it was during his spell at Matthews that Walter had his best opportunity to exercise his display abilities. He designed a prize-winning window to mark the showing of the film 'Annie Get Your Gun' at the Central Cinema in November 1950 but his proudest moment was probably in September 1951 when the store won first prize in a national competition run by Messrs Thomas Headley, the Newcastle soap manufacturers.

The brief was to design a floor or counter display featuring at least three of the firm's brands. Walter took up the challenge to promote the new super soapy Oxydol which got whites whiter than any other soap, dreft [NB LOWER CASE 'D'] for the softest and brightest woollens, Mirro for the most sparkling of sink-tops – and he threw in Fairy soap for good measure.

It brought the firm publicity and a cheque for £250 but it brought Walter words of praise from the Managing Director, Bernard Matthew: "The credit for the display goes entirely to him" he said. [SCAN OF THE PRIZEWINNING OXYDOL/dreft/MIRRO DISPLAY]

All this is a long while ago, but the achievement has been recalled by Ros Cullum of Waterbeach who has also lend me several pictures of his other displays.

Many of the commodities such as Ryvita, Vim or Kraft Salad Cream are still familiar. But in one photograph of customers queuing for service there is a display of 'Monty' washing powder and tins of Wilsons' Macedine. Does anybody know what they were? [SCAN OF CUSTOMERS INSIDE SHOP – CAN THIS BE PRINTED LARGE]

One of Matthew's specialities was a range of teas and coffees, one of which features in another of Ros's photographs. This side of their business is still continued at a stall on Cambridge market run by Michael Matthew, the great-great-nephew of the founder. Michael started his stall in December 1983 proudly displaying the 1922 advertisement and even today a tangible reminder of the old firm can be seen – one of the wooden boxes that once contained some of their delicacies.

Eric George, whose memories I featured in Memories on 13th October, has dropped me a line to point out that the Perse Preparatory School was in Bateman Street, and not the main building that I featured. The News took a picture of the street [IN 1967 – PLEASE CHECK THE DATE ON THE BACK OF THE PHOTOGRAPH OR JUST PUT ‘1960S’- PHOTO LEFT ON ROS’S DESK SATURDAY]] just after it had been made ‘One Way’ only. Even then such restrictions did not – apparently – apply to cyclists!

An appeal from Christopher Kirk from Northallerton, Yorkshire has proved successful. He was trying to track down some films of Chivers excursions that were taken by Reg Barnes in the 1920s. Now Maurice Beeton from Histon has written to say that he has preserved several of them and placed copies in the East Anglian Film Archive. Not only that but he used to live next door to Christopher’s grandfather Ernest Setchell who was caretaker at the Histon Baptist church.

Peter Holmes from Willingham e-mails: “Last week’s ‘Memories’ reminded me of the time when I worked for the Eastern Counties Bus Co. at Newmarket Road as an apprentice Signwriter for a mere £1-15s a week. I enclose a photo taken in spring of 1956; I am the young chap right at the top on the left but am unable to recall any names. The Bus was renovated by us and I believe it did go to Ipswich. Perhaps there is still somebody there from over 48 years ago?” [SCAN 100.87 OF BUS]

Hannah Bainbridge has added to the memories of Cambridge’s Milton Road School with a tribute to her mother. She writes: “Due to my father suffering from cancer my mother obtained work as the caretaker of the Infants’ School in the 1920s. During the school summer holidays every child’s desk had to be scrubbed and all the floors thoroughly cleaned. This was hard work for a woman, but she was assisted where possible by my two brothers. The caretaker of the Big school was Mr Andrews with whom my mother had a good working relationship and I remember him taking my brother and me down the cellars there to look at the boilers.

“My mother used to earn a few extra bob by washing up after whist drives and if we were lucky she would bring home a few fancy cakes, which were a treat. My father died in 1932 and eventually my mother had to give up work, due to developing eczema on both arms, which we thought were caused by a certain powder she had to spread on the parquet flooring. She was then in receipt of the magnificent sum of ten shillings a week widow’s pension, but with no child benefit”

Anne Brown (nee Wilkins) from Histon also attended Milton Road School. She was there from 1937 to 1944 when she was in Mr Leach's class. She can remember the names of her schoolmates from 60 years ago, including John Attle, Joan Austen, David Cator, Ruth Marsh, Norman Rotherham, Victor Sharp and Michael Winter.

Joyce Pryke (nee Lawrence) from Willingham also attended that school and later the Chesterton Senior Girls School and remembers running across the Cambridge Town Football Ground to the air raid shelters. Later in the war she helped out at the Leys School Hospital where her sister, Margaret, had to spend some time with a kidney infection

Mrs Label Law from Longstowe asks: "Does anybody remember Pembroke College examination hall being an annexe to Addenbrooke's Hospital? My father was in there after a hernia operation. Anstey Hall at Trumpington was a recuperation home for the army. I was a 'clippie' on Eastern Counties in 1945 and remember soldiers, some with crutches, boarding my bus at Brookland's Avenue and going to Maris Lane. Needless to say I didn't collect any fares from them!"

Memories 3rd November 2004, by Mike Petty

The new Cambridge edition of the Monopoly board includes local place names instead of the Trafalgar Square, Old Kent Road or Mayfair of the London version. Most of them are well known, but one important square, that occupied by the Lion Yard shopping precinct, is headed 'St Tibb's Row'.

But who, what or where was this, and why should it have been included instead of the somewhat more obvious 'Petty Cury'.

According to Ronald Gray's book of Cambridge Street-names St Tibb is short for St Tibba, a relation to an ancient king of Mercia, who was buried at Peterborough in the 900's. She was the patron saint of falconers and St Tibb's Row used to lead to Falcon Yard, which was roughly the present main entrance to Lion Yard from Petty Cury.

Today the name relates to that uninviting bit of road that runs from Downing Street past the back of what used to be Robert Sayle's towards the underground loading bays of the new shopping precinct.

It originally ran down to Alexandra Street and Post Office Terrace giving access to a number of properties including the Young Men's Christian Association and the Vicar's Building. This was probably the largest single building in Cambridge, except for King's College Chapel, & was erected in the 1870s to house the very poor who were crowded into the rotting galleries of the Falcon Inn. But these new dwellings were too expensive for the poor and part of the building was taken over for Arliss' printing works until 1971 when it moved out after 97 years.

Another building which catered for the destitute was the former workhouse of St Andrew the Great. This was erected about 1829 and after Poor Law reform in 1836 was used for the reception of about 30 married couples and aged women. It was sold two years later when it was bought by a shoeing smith. It was photographed by the Cambridge Antiquarian Society in 1911.

In 1900 the Row was also home to The Cambridge Gazette which started up as a rival to the Cambridge Daily News with an eight-page paper with innumerable editions, up to date in every respect. In 1948 Mr H.C. Bruce of New Fletton, Peterborough, a former News employee recalled: "When the 'Cambridge Gazette' started their new plant in St Tibb's Row they also came out with a fine new yellow cart with rubber tyres. Every time we went out with our tall red cart with iron tyres and poor old mare they could beat us, because they had a fast trotter. They got to the newsagents first for some time and our returns began to increase, but with a little ingenuity on the round at night we managed to get and keep the lead. I got those papers to the agents before the 'Gazette' and had less returns to parcel up for waste paper". The Gazette was doomed to failure and was formally wound up in May 1902.

Like much of the area the old St Tibb's Row was swept away for the Lion Yard redevelopment and will undergo further change for the Grand Arcade. But do you remember it; now that it has been immortalised on the Monopoly board game it surely must mean something to somebody!

Christopher Harris has contacted me from Cambridge. He writes: "Again recently your fascinating column made mention of the Plough & Harrow public house on Madingley Road. I wonder, however, whether you or any reader has knowledge of another public house which once existed in the Madingley Road? The Cambridge Street Directory for 1901 refers to a Brewery located at Gravel Hill Farm and presumably associated with it a public house with the mysterious name of "The Man Loaded with Mischief" run at that time by William Cornwell. Both continue to be mentioned in records, although by 1907 Gravel Hill Farm contains only the Old Brewery. The public house continues until 1911 under the occupation of John Henry Hazlewood, but by 1912 the property is no longer occupied. By the time of the Spalding's Directory of 1927/28 it has disappeared from the records. It would be fascinating to know more about this house and about its splendid name."

In a letter to the CDN about 50 years ago Mr F.W. Saunders of Histon recalled that it was a well-known rendezvous for summer evening walks by Cambridge people before the days of motor cars and even before bicycles were common. At the rear of the house was a tea garden and a brewhouse from which was brewed beer to supply the Lion Hotel in Petty Cury. Later the 'Mischief' came into the hands of Messrs Bailey and Tebbutt of Panton Brewery, Cambridge. After the lapse of the licence the pub was demolished and a house built on the site for the Chief Constable.

A.E. Reeve, the prolific Cambridge historian, added to the debate by recalling that the pub had a very famous inn sign depicting a man bowed down by a woman seated on his right shoulder, holding aloft a bottle of gin, while a monkey sits on the other side. It was based on a work by William Hogarth though the Cambridge sign was painted by Richard Hopkins Leach. It is now in the Cambridge Folk Museum. There was another version over the door of the pub itself. In a letter to the News in October 1979 the late Anthony Leach (himself remembered fondly as a teacher) recalls that it was one of a number of Cambridge subjects his great-grandfather painted. They included oil colours of a cricket match on Parker's Piece, a fenland scene and a view of Castle Street showing the ruins of Cambridge castle in the background. But where are they now – and do you have others? [SCAN OF OUTSIDE OF MAN LOADED WITH MISCHIEF C1910, THE INN SIGN AND THE SIGN ABOVE THE DOOR]

Thena Kendall (nee Heshel) seeks your help. She writes:

“Does anyone have any memories of the Shrubbery school in wartime Cambridge? I was briefly at the school for two terms in 1941 when it was still in Hills Road. My family had only arrived in England as refugees from Nazi occupied Austria shortly before the start of the war, and were living in pretty straitened circumstances when we got to Cambridge. We had come to get away from the blitz - we were unaware at the start of 1941 that the worst of the blitz to which we had been subjected in London was over. I was still very young & have very little recollection of any lessons - beyond having to learn to write in exercise books that were carefully ruled so that letters had to fill the space between the lines with upward strokes and loops neatly inscribed above and below. I also still own a needle book which I made at the school with the felt cover rather awkwardly decorated by my inexperienced hands - but it has lasted for over 60 years.

“I seem to remember spending quite a lot of time doing country dancing, but maybe the circles I recall had something to do with the Brownies in which we were all enrolled: a lot of English life and customs were still rather confusing! My warmest memories are of my two friends Hazel Palmer and Monica Piggott with whom I lost touch when we moved back to London in the summer of 1941. I also recall a very Big Boy, Patrick, of whom I was rather in awe!

“I cannot name any of the teachers, but I seem to remember that the school consisted of two interconnecting large rooms which were entered by doors off the main hallway. I would be delighted to hear from any contemporaries who have better memories of the wartime Shrubbery school.” If you can help please write to me.

Recent articles have prompted Peter Holmes from Willingham to e-mail: “Last week’s ‘Memories’ reminded me of the time when I worked for the Eastern Counties Bus Co. at Newmarket Road as an apprentice Signwriter for a mere £1-15s a week. Another mystery has been solved, thanks to Laurence Peers from Fulbourn. Dr John Grantham is researching the history of the gardens at Anglesey Abbey on behalf of the National Trust. He knows that during the Second World War an armoured unit was based at the Abbey and thanks to Richard Ayres the former head gardener he knows where about in the gardens they were established. But he does not know just which unit it was. Laurence says it was the Northamptonshire Yeomanry - he was a boy living in Lode and remembers them well. The Northants later took part in the D-Day landings and fought in tank battles in Normandy. His family kept in touch with a member of the unit during this time

As the last of the Guy Fawkes bangs dies away so we prepare to remember not November 5th but November 11th, Armistice Day.

There are only a few days in between and in the past Cambridge University Undergraduates were never slow in commemorating Gunpowder, Treason and Plot with what they termed a 'Rag' – though to other minds it seemed more of a riot. Bonfires would be built on Market Hill, Parker's Piece or any other unguarded part of the town and garden fences, wooden market stalls or anything else combustible commandeered to feed the flames. It was a time for students to be arrested, the police station to be attacked – and it was all in the name of good fun. At least it was for the undergraduates and the town youths who supported them in their over-exuberant celebrations.

Older residents saw less of the fun and more of the mayhem. They remembered other, more violent, explosions experienced on the field of battle in a war that had been meant to end all wars. When it was their turn to commemorate they wished to do it in solemn dignity. They did not want their remembrance to be turned into another excuse for violence.

Thus when in 1921 the University undergraduates asked whether they might be allowed to participate in the 'Poppy Day' collections, raising money for the Earl Haig fund, there was understandable reluctance. How could students be trusted to do it with appropriate respect? But in a leap of faith it was agreed and so the Poppy Day Rag was born. It proved a success and over the years thousands of pounds was raised.

But there could still be apprehension when the two events coincided, as they did in 1954 – 50 years ago. That year the paper for Saturday the 6th November had two stories to report. One was of 'The Fifth', the other of the Poppy Day collections.

The night before had been exciting. There had been 5,000 people crammed on to Market Square, shouting screaming, pushing and laughing. A learner-driver learned not to venture into the city centre that night: his car was bodily pushed backwards for fifty yards, until police intervened to rescue him. Things turned less peaceful when at nine o'clock there was a general exodus into Sidney Street where fireworks were thrown and there were boos and hisses as police led the perpetrators away. University 'Bulldogs' pounced on a couple of youths, only to have to let them go after they denied being students. A dustbin lid was repeatedly sent shooting up into the air after giant thunderflashes were placed under it, causing Teddy Girls to squeal at every explosion. On and on it went, until Mother Nature intervened sending rain to cool tempers and drive revellers home. There had been five arrests and numerous reports of thefts of policemen's helmets

But this was just a normal bonfire night – in fact it was 'Quiet and Peaceful', according to the police.

Next morning there was absolute chaos in the city centre where the flashing beacon on the corner of Petty Cury had disappeared the night before. Saturday traffic was held up whilst Dick Turpin galloped through the streets on his mount, Bonny Black Bess and a Far Eastern expedition crossed Sidney Street from Boots to Millers Radio Shop. It was not helped by a somewhat younger-than-usual 'policeman' who directed all the traffic into Downing Street whether it wanted to go that way or not, or by a 'Vice-Chancellor's' parade walking slowly down the centre of the road complete with pick-axes and shovels. There was an invasion of Martians, a flying bedstead and a slave market outside the Guildhall where attractive young ladies could be bought for three-halfpence and some of the demure ladies from the new New Hall college turned out as 'St Trinian's' girls. Add in all the other activities and Cambridge was really a place to avoid unless you were prepared to contribute a few coppers to the Poppy Fund. Then a few days later peace descended as Armistice Day was commemorated with due reverence.

The rags continued with parades and decorated floats until the 1960s. But then some colleges began to boycott the event and people became less tolerant of flour bombs, rotten tomatoes, water pistols and eggs. In 1967 the 'Poppy Day' rag was held for the last time. Although the rag was revived in 1969 it was held in February, not November and the link with Poppy Day was broken.

Do you have memories or snaps to share of Bonfire Night or Poppy Day – write to Mike Petty at the News

At any large gathering there is always the chance of an accident needing treatment from those trained in First Aid. One such was Roy Chamberlain from Foxton who served with the St John Ambulance Brigade and whose photographs record some of the events he attended in that capacity, including an incident at a scramble just after the war [SCAN 101.10] and the Brigade in action [SCAN 101.14]

Roy was not accident free himself; he fell from his bike when the chain came off at the Pye Sports in July 1944 – though fortunately it was in the slow cycle race. This spoiled his winning streak as he had swept all before him in that event at the Wings for Victory meeting at Shepreth in May 1943, repeating his achievement at Croxton Park. His prize was a cycle lamp – though being wartime he was not allowed to show a light after dark! [scan 101.11 – SLOW CYCLE RACE]

Roy was a versatile athlete: he could run forwards, backwards, do the high jump and long jump. He treasures a picture of the Cambridge Railway Orphan Fund show and sports which took place on Coleridge Road recreation ground on 29th July 1939. He competed in the 100-yards race, when he came 5th in his heat, and the 880-yards which he did not finish. [SCAN 101.12 Roy Chamberlain (no.13, LEFT) competes with W. Hayden in Railway Orphan Fund 100 yards race July 1939]

But it did not put him off. Roy had joined the Pye Radio Athletics Club in May that year and came to the peak of his form during the war, winning the 100-yards at the Foxton August bank holiday show in 1943. He repeated his success at Shepreth's "Salute the Soldier" week in June 1944 when he completed the treble by winning the Obstacle and Potato races as well and earning three half-a-crown stamps. Sadly that was the peak of his dashing career, he was down to second at Fowlmere later that month and came in fourth at the Pye Sports Day in July.

These achievements might not rate in the highest echelons of athletic endeavour but Roy has kept photographs of the meetings, which provoke wonderful memories of the competitive fun of amateur sports days.

The photos of Matthew's, the high-class store in Trinity Street (Memories 27th October) have brought back memories for various readers who have told me what 'Wilson's Macedoine' was. Jim Longstaffe from Duxford says it was small diced vegetables mixed with salad cream, a bit like sandwich spread but thicker. Gayle Wade explains that Macedoine is the French word for a mixed vegetable or fruit salad, and macedonia is the Italian word for fruit salad. Charles Taylor from Great Wilbraham remembers it from his early days in the grocery trade just after the war. It was a popular choice at the time as there were very few vegetables in the shops, apart from peas. Pat White from Fulbourn remembers that it tasted horrible. Joyce Bailey (nee Butler) of Cambridge recognises the assistant behind the counter selling it as John Ginn. [SCAN 101.21] She writes: "I joined the firm in 1932 as cashier in the café (the happiest days of my life). When the war broke out I was transferred to the main office as it held me from factory work. We had very poor wages but a lot of fun. All the elite came in. I remember Blunt in out café, also Enoch Powell” She has lent me a picture of the bakery staff taken about 1937 [SCAN 101.08]

Shirley Rowberry from Cambridge writes: “I read with interest your article "Long-lost name pops up in Monopoly game" on Wednesday 3rd November, as I used to work with my father in the former St. Andrew the Great workhouse. My father was a bookbinder and worked at the Cambridge Bookbinding Company in Tibbs Row. He started there upon leaving school and apart from a break during WW2 he worked there for well over 60 years before retiring well past his retirement age. In fact I still have a copy of an article that the CEN published about him several years ago. I have very fond memories of the building because even after I ceased to work at the bookbinders I always popped in to see my dad on a Saturday morning when I was in town. He would make me a cup of tea and always had an interesting book to show my sisters and I. Seeing the picture really brought back fond memories for me”. [SCAN 580 – ST ANDREW THE GREAT WORKHOUSE]

Memories 17th November 2004, by Mike Petty

The Guildhall occupies a prime site in the centre of Cambridge; it is home to the City Council, its Mayor, officers, staff and associated facilities. But, councillors are now wondering, could they maximise its commercial potential by converting some of the ground-floor space to shops?

In the distant past councillors were not slow to exploit such a prominent site. The historic engravings of Market Hill show what is generally remembered as the old Town Hall. But the building that fronted on to the Market Hill was the Shire House, built in 1747 for the use of the county authorities. It contained two assize courts on the upper floors while underneath was an open colonnade where market stalls were set up.

The Town Council had let the County have the site for a peppercorn rent, provided that they could use the building for their business when the courts weren't in session. The town also had the income from the rent of the stalls and the cellars underneath.

Then in the 1780s the Town Council commissioned Cambridge architect James Essex to design them a new Town Hall. It opened on 25 May 1784 but did not feature a grand elevation because it was almost invisible behind the Shire House. It can just be glimpsed in the background of one of the old prints. [SCAN 70.38 - 1800 PRINT SHOWING SHIRE HOUSE WITH GLIMPSE OF THE TOWN HALL BEHIND IT TO THE RIGHT]

When a new Assize Court was built on Castle Hill in 1842 the old Shire House was handed back to the Corporation. The council occupied both buildings – Town Hall and Shire House – and bricked in some of the arches to provide extra space for offices. [SCAN 18109 - TOWN HALL FRONT C1900 SHOWING SHOPS TO RIGHT]

There the situation remained until the 1930s when the Corporation decided it needed a new Guildhall, unifying the whole site. They also wanted extra space and so expanded to take in a number of shops and other buildings that fronted on Market Hill and around the corner into Peas Hill. The shops were demolished and in due course offices and a new courtroom replaced them. [SCAN 5707 SHOWING FRONT OF SHOPS FROM CORNER OF PEAS HILL TO TOWN HALL – WITH MEAT HANGING OUTSIDE THE BUTCHER'S SHOP; SCAN 5689 VIEW OF EAST SIDE OF PEAS HILL BEFORE NEW GUILDHALL; SCAN 8705 – THE SAME VIEW AFTER BUILDING OF GUILDHALL]

So if some of the present Guildhall offices do actually return to shops then history will have repeated itself. But it is unlikely that we will once more see the same types of traders that were there 100 years ago. In 1904 the shops on Market Hill housed Isaac Beale a toy dealer, Palmer the tailor and Lawrence and Rose, butchers. The east side of Peas Hill was home to Jennings the cheesemonger and provisions merchant, Rose the butcher, G.P. Sennitt poulterer and game dealer and Pollard the confectioner. They were small traders of the kind driven out of central Cambridge in recent years. There was also Whitmore's wine merchant, Weatherhead the bookseller and Harris the jeweller – but perhaps we have enough of these already.

Time will tell – but what do you recall of these or of the other traders on the opposite side of Peas Hill?

Various readers have shared memories of St Tibbs Row. Alan Betterman from Cambridge writes; “St Tibb's Row has many happy memories for both my wife and I. I started work at Easter 1947, aged 14, as a telegram boy for the G.P.O. and was based at the rear of the main Post Office. In those days there were more than 30 messengers on cycles and later that year we took delivery of BSA C10 motorcycles. In 1949 my wife Marina left the Coleridge Girls' School and started work as a junior telephonist in the exchanged based at the top of the same building. We met and did a lot of our courting in St Tibb's Row. The messengers' clubroom was over the top of a shop in Post Office Terrace, close to Ramsey and Muspratt's photographers. Many evenings were spent there or at the YMCA on the corner of Alexandra Street, playing snooker in the basement”. Kenneth Bright from Cambridge also remembers the Toc H club in the car park at the back of the Lion Hotel (does anybody have more memories of this). Alan Bates worked as an Estate Agent from 1942, collecting rents from the flats in the Vicars Building which were about 7/- (35p) a week. [THERE IS A PICTURE OF THE ST TIBBS ROW SIGN AND BUILDINGS BEYOND IN THE NEWS LIBRARY FILES]

Peter Burbage from Coton has responded to Thena Kendal's plea for memories of the Shrubbery School in the 1940s. He writes: “I was at school at this time. It was run by Mr & Mrs Fulton and two of the teachers were Miss Mason and Miss Pauley. Some of the pupils were Barbara and Jack Steppings, Daphne Start, Claris Hayward, Wendy Oliver, Arthur Barton, Nelly Rayment and Maurice Childay. I remember one afternoon the air raid sirens went; it was a very cloudy day and as we were making our way downstairs from the first-floor classroom we heard an aircraft and looking out of the window I saw a German bomber below the clouds. He then released several bombs on Mill Road railway bridge. The school had no playing fields but we had the pleasure of Parker's Piece for our P.T. and games.”

The omnibus saga continues

Richard Haughey writes: “I refer to Peter Holmes photograph of the Eastern Counties Omnibus Company that he helped repaint in the spring of 1956 (CEN November 3rd 2004). The bus in question was not an Eastern Counties vehicle but a former double decker staff bus of the Histon based Chivers & Sons. This vehicle was one of a number they owned and operated to collect fruit pickers and factory staff. It was a 1929 Leyland; it being purchased by Chivers in 1937 and put to work at their Huntingdon factory collecting the factory staff from the March area. The bus operated some million miles while with the company. Prior to the vehicle being taken off the run, the company was approached by the British Transport Museum at Clapham in London, who were seeking such a vehicle to add to their collection. Chivers was very keen to donate this vehicle and it was sent to Newmarket Road for refurbishment and repainting. After the official handover, DR 4902 was displayed in London. Later it passed to the Science Museum and is now on display at their Wroughton site just outside Swindon.” Richard has sent a picture of it taken in September 2004. [SCAN 100.87 – THE CHIVERS BUS BEING REPAINTED AT MARSHALLS IN 1956 SCAN 101.23 THE BUS NOW IN A MUSEUM]

Rodney Dale from Haddenham thinks that the shortish chap in the front row might be Ted Higgins. Rodney was a bus enthusiast as a lad: “After school, I was wont to creep in at the back door of the Eastern Counties bus garage in Hills Road, and revel in the noise and smell of the great monsters being revved up in the repair bays. That’s how I got to know one of the mechanics, Ted Higgins, who explained about bus construction and maintenance, and on occasion spirited me on board to go out with him on a test drive ('crouch down until we're clear of the garage, and when we get back').

Mabel Law from Longstowe writes: “Seeing the open stairs bus brought back memories of my time as a ‘clippie’ on the 105 route from Drummer Street to Strangeways Road. I wasn’t very keen on going upstairs whilst the bus was moving and held on to the rail for dear life!” Mabel continues: “Does anybody remember the only gas bus which was used during the war. My sister Margaret Ambrose (nee Northrop) was a clippie on it and her driver was Harry King”.

Marion Rusted from Lt Abington writes: “I read with great interest (and some nostalgia) about Gladys Hughes, a bus conductress. She was a wonderful lady on the 101 bus when I was at Paston House in Bateman Street – now St Mary’s. I was at school until 1948 and when Gladys was ‘on board’ by day was always brightened by her wonderfully cheerful nature. She was so smart in her uniform with a black beret worn at a very jaunty angle. Everyone received a helping hand from her, particularly older people who needed assistance getting on and off the bus. I remember too that when she put a new ticket reel into the ticket dispenser that we children got the remaining paper reel” [PICTURE OF GLADYS IN NEWS LIBRARY FILES – WE FEATURED IT IN MEMORIES 20TH OCT]

John Taylor from Haslingfield recalls another transport initiative from the 1930s that might solve some of the problems facing the Post Office these days – letterboxes fixed to buses. He writes: “The project was introduced, at the request of the Postmaster General, in the late summer of 1933. In the area around Cambridge, the only villages to benefit from such a service were Cottenham and Histon on Eastern Counties route 104. The letterbox was provided to give them a late collection facility since the village boxes were cleared in the afternoon. The box was brought daily from the Post Office and attached and locked on the bus that left Cambridge at about 6.30 pm. For its return journey (i.e. Cottenham to Histon to Cambridge) the bus departed at 8.15 pm and the letterbox was available for the posting of mail en route. The bus arrived at the Cambridge Bus Station (Drummer Street) at 8.50 pm and the letterbox was removed by Post Office officials for conveyance to the sorting office. The service was in operation every day except Sundays and Bank Holidays and was guaranteed to catch the regular up and down mails and be delivered in practically any part of England by the first post the next day”. It seems the box only remained in use for a few years but there does not appear to be any record of its withdrawal.

Memories 24th November 2004, by Mike Petty

Today's newspaper headlines are recording disputes over travellers who now wish to become settlers. Similar debates have been aired regularly in the papers of the past.

In November 1898 Cambridgeshire County Council considered a report on the conditions that then obtained among gypsies and dwellers in vans and tents. These people, the report claimed, lead an insanity life, they are the frequent carriers of disease, often disturb the peace of the localities in which they pitch their camps, and their children contrive to evade the provision of the Education Act and are brought up in the most gross ignorance. It is clear that something ought to be done. How is school attendance to be enforced on children who never acquired a local habitation. The evils that call for remedies are so real that it is eminently desirable that as far as possible to do so, the gypsy should be brought within the pale of the ordinary law

One way to prevent problems was to ensure that the travellers kept travelling. It was an issue being tackled just 100 years ago, in December 1904. The News then reported:

A party of Macedonian gypsies, apparently coming under the designation of 'undesirables', are being chased from one county to another as vigorously as civilised government will permit. No -----county wants them, no county will have them. Hertfordshire police have pushed them on to the Essex police and today the Cambridgeshire police are putting them over the boundary where the same process will be repeated. Being pushed from pillar to post tries even the Macedonian philosophy and the gypsies are becoming 'more annoyed and disagreeable every day'

At Stump Cross Police Superintendent Everitt of the Linton division received charge of the forty-old wanderers who are being pushed in the direction of the coast whence they will probably be shipped to the Continent. The Superintendent, assisted by PCs Bugg and Huckle obtained horses to drag the alien caravans into Cambridgeshire and continued in charge until the Balsham crossroads were reached where Deputy Chief Constable Whitechurch of Newmarket, Inspector Sampson of Bottisham, Inspector Gobbett from Suffolk and two police constables were waiting.

It became necessary to find fresh motive power. The police searched in vain for horses and they then hit upon the expedient of pressing into service one of Messrs Covill and Sons' traction engines. So the motley crowd with their caravans and tiny ponies proceeded on their weary way. By the time the village of Six Mile Bottom was reached darkness had fallen.

There is in that place a comfortable little hostelry called the 'Green Man' which the gypsies found much to their liking. The landlord offered his foreign visitors gifts of loaves of bread which they 'graciously acknowledged' and ate. Apparently they are imbued with a spirit of reciprocity for having eaten the landlord's bread they purchased some of his good whiskey and rounded off the meal with sips of spirits to keep the cold out.

The idea of being drawn along by a traction engine greatly delighted the wanderers who crowded into their caravans and very contentedly made the journey into Newmarket where they camped for the night on the Heath within a few hundred yards of the border with Suffolk. Next morning the engine with the vans attached recommenced its journey.

The progress through Newmarket was marked with several amusing incidents. Some of the party visited the International Stores and 'lifted' a ham and tin of coffee, but these the assistants recovered. A pair of boots was carried off from a bootmaker's shop and some tin mugs were removed from one of the local ironmongers. A public house was visited, a glass of whiskey and a glass of gin was called for and a penny tendered in payment.

The whole of the party had swarthy complexions and none appeared to bear the stamp of poverty on their faces. Of clothing they had very little and this was clearly illustrated when a boy and girl were engaged in a free fight near the Tower Clock. Those of the party who walked did so at their leisure, in fact they appeared reluctant to leave the town and allowed the vans to get some distance ahead.

Superintendent Whitehead accompanied the party as far as the Red Lodge which is just outside the Cambridgeshire boundary and the Suffolk authorities continued with the procession, their intention being to dump the vans on land at Brandon in Norfolk.

Everybody in Cambridgeshire breathed a sign of relief, Newmarket returned to normality. But that town had made too good an impression and next day the gypsies were back!

To many the life living under the stars, is one that has its attractions. In November 1976 News reporter Kate Green made the acquaintance of one such 'gentleman of the road'. Dick Barratt, she wrote, is a gypsy, a Romany, a traveller, a hermit, a woodland philosopher, a loner. He must be in his fifties, with his full head of nut brown hair, startling sailor-blue eye and his teeth black stumps in an angelic grin.

He has eaten smoked salmon and caviar -from the bins at Stansted Airport. A gentleman of the road in every sense, he doesn't steal, beg or live off the State. He doesn't swear, spit, smell or go unshaven. He treats himself only to the odd tippie of cider. He has charm, dignity, a great sense of pride- and trusts no one. The village children call him 'Flower Power' - not so much because he's gentle and peace loving, but for the wild flowers in his many hats. Winter and hot summer long he wears the same number of layers in a never-ending variety of costumes from his rag pile

In his permanent but makeshift camp a few yards from the thundering highway he makes the occasional stranger welcome against a cacophony of barking dogs.

Dick's dogs, well-fed and clean instantly obey him and guard him fiercely. With scrap collector's pram and black dog he walks a regular beat on the Newmarket-London A11 from Widdington to Stansted. Sometimes he goes as far away as Cambridge or Chesterford. He collects rags and scrap from householders, lay-bys, ditches and tips. His hands are scarred by rusted metal and broken glass. He gleanes the left-over picking, the windfall apples

His permanent camp was treacherous with mud as the night frost melted and the morning sun found the gaps in his makeshift tarpaulin, cardboard and polythene tent slung from the trees. Rainwater, gathered in the dip of the tarpaulin roof, is his reservoir. Inside, on his rug and rag bed, he has no standing room and kneels to his paraffin lamp and heater. His ancient fridge is unwired but keeps the wasps, mice and rats away from the dog biscuits and groceries he buys in the village store.

His nearest neighbour is a former councillor and her husband. When they were burgled of a lifetime's personal collection of small treasures Dick moved his camp nearer the big house to guard them. In turn they worry for his health in winter, his safety at night and send him over a Christmas dinner. But both sides in this curious and amicable arrangement have an enormous respect for each other's privacy. He has never been in their house. They never go beyond the boundary of his woodland territory.

Dick cares nothing for time and a good deal for his three dogs & his friend Queenie. She is a distant relative, in no way his wife. She lives some distance away in her own caravan. She's not well. Her legs give way as she tries to push her pram up the earthwork ditch and she falls helpless in the mud. Barelegged and plimsolled she shivers non-stop by the hot ashes of his wood fire. They share cigarettes, food and company for a while each day.

Dick is tough and wiry; if he gets a cold he lets 'germ fight germ' and he's unafraid. But Queenie is vulnerable to illness and bullies. Hooligans twice tore apart her caravan while, terrified, she hid. They threw the contents of the old van, including a bundle of rags, on to the flames. The 'bundle' was Queenie rolled in her bedding. Three days later she returned, black from head to foot. All she could say was "I've been on the fire." It transpired that her attackers were fellow-travellers who'd thought the caravan was empty and took it away. Later they replaced it.

"I've always been a loner", Dick said. "I don't like crowds. You only need enough to get by. You're worse off on £60 a week than two or three - people want to live off you. The world is full of greed and jealousy."

Dick and Queenie are the Odd Couple, the dropouts, the orphans of the storm, Kate concluded. They're out in the cold. They belong to no one.

But where are such travellers to set up their final camp and can they adapt to that strange way of life which other folk consider 'normal'. That is a question for the future to resolve.

Memories 1st December 2004, by Mike Petty

I WROTE THIS LEAD STORY BUT THEN SPOTTED AN ARTICLE IN SATURDAY'S PAPER ABOUT THE EXPLOITS OF A CAMBRIDGE BURGLAR. SO I HAVE COMPILED AN ALTERNATIVE STORY ABOUT A FAMOUS BOUT OF BURGLARIES 200 YEARS AGO

Just weeks after the scaffolding has been removed from the buildings along King's Parade another of Cambridge's more attractive properties, Cintra House on Hills Road is to undergo a major refurbishment. But once more the exterior will look just the same when it's all over.

The Open University moved into Cintra House about 25 years ago and now the interior is beginning to look a little tired. So to clear the way for the builders they are moving into a temporary location in Betjeman House a little further up the road for nine months.

Open University architectural historian Colin Cunningham, who lives in Cambridge, has researched the history of the building. It was conceived as part of a grand development leading to the station and built in the early 19th century. It was given a new façade between 1860 and 1865 by Cambridge architect John Edlin. He appears in local directories for about 10 years and then vanishes so it is difficult to trace his origins in greater detail. Nor was the architect a member of the then recently formed RIBA with offices in King's Parade. Colin thinks he may have lived in Cintra House, Shelford; or that the building may be named after Sintra in Portugal.

Cintra House was originally part of a terrace and there would have been a number of doors corresponding with the current windows. It was built in two sections, and you can see the join in the wall, Colin points out. Over the years it provided homes to many people including at least two Cambridge University academics, the Rev Joseph H. Gray, Fellow, Dean, & Lecturer of Queens' college and Thomas McKenny Hughes, Woodwardian Professor of Geology and Fellow of Clare.

The building has had other educational connection. In 1905 it became the first Cambridge base for Cheshunt College. This had been founded by Selina, Countess of Huntingdon in 1768 after six students at Oxford University had been expelled for having Methodist sympathies. Her new foundation was for pious godly young men to serve in the ministry and took its name from the town in Hertfordshire to which it moved in 1792.

With the outbreak of the Great War Cambridge prepared for the inevitable casualties and convalescent hospitals were established to nurse the wounded back to health. Three large empty properties in Cintra Terrace were placed at the disposal of the Cambridge Women's Voluntary Aid Detachment. The rooms were swept and scrubbed and the girls travelled around Cambridge collecting furniture, going out with a handcart to bring in mattresses, coal-scuttles and all the other essentials. It was the first of several such Hospitals, with others in villages such as Fulbourn, Cottenham, Whittlesford and Willingham.

By the 1920s it housed the Bird Bolt Hotel which may have been used by commercial travellers, in the 1940s it was the address of the Simplex Dairy Equipment Company which made milking machinery. More recently it has been a nurses' hostel; and a block of luxury flats, in one of which lived Sir Hamilton Kerr, MP for Cambridge.

There were plans to demolish Cintra House in the 1970s but the façade was saved and will still play its distinctive part in the Cambridge streetscape once the current changes have been complete and the Open University is back in place, Angela Schofield the Regional Director promises.

But what do you remember of this most decorative of Cambridge buildings? [SCAN OF CINTRA TERRACE IN THE 1920S, SCAN OF CINTRA HOUSE FRONTAGE TODAY]

ALTERNATIVE LEAD

GRIMSHAW AND KIDMAN, CAMBRIDGE BURGLARS

Saturday's News featured the activities of a burglar who targeted Cambridge University buildings having 'graduated' from Oxford. But despite the distress he caused his victims he really had nothing on Cambridge's own home-grown burglars of 200 years ago, Richard Kidman and William Grimshaw.

After an early life of petty crime Kidman became a skilled clock maker and turned to plumbing and glazing, which gave him ready access to college buildings. His accomplice Grimshaw was a chimney-sweep and for four years they conducted a series of robberies which defied the vigilance of the police and kept the whole of Cambridge in a continued state of amazement and alarm.

The first robbery that Kidman and Grimshaw committed took place in August 1796 at the treasury of King's College where the college plate was locked up for the summer. Using his clockmaking skills Kidman took a copy of the key, pinched the silver and locked the door up again. It was weeks before anybody knew it had been stolen. Later Grimshaw used false keys to let himself into the buttery at St Catharine's college and made off with the booty, repeating the exercise at a Fellow's room at Trinity College.

Then Kidman cut keys to the great iron gates at the back of Trinity College and let himself in. He left with a sack so full of silver that he could hardly lift it. A robbery of this magnitude caused a great alarm. Bow Street Runners stopped every cart on the turnpike road to London and police searched Kidman's house. They found tools of all sorts and came away full of admiration for his skills as a clockmaker! He was a good bricklayer too, for the high constable actually leaned up against a wall in the cellar behind which he'd just bricked up the college silver!

Despite all their efforts the police could not find a thing. Grimshaw and Kidman became bolder. Emmanuel College lodge was robbed, then the Combination Room at Caius followed by the butteries at Christ's where they stole various silver pots and other articles. But they were disturbed while breaking into the buttery at Emmanuel College and fled leaving their booty behind. By now William Grimshaw was getting cheeky. He broke into three private rooms at Trinity by getting down the chimney he was employed to sweep and carried off the treasure in the soot bag.

But all the while they were planning their biggest ever robbery, an enterprise which required all their courage and skills to accomplish. One night Kidman and Grimshaw broke into King's College. They got hold of a copy of the key to the outer door to the chapel and let themselves in. Once inside they worked on the interior locks though these being antique were a real challenge. It took a week, returning each night, before they had cracked all the locks except one. But by now Grimshaw had had enough – he said 'that the place looked so awful, that he trembled every time as if he had the ague', and his panic communicated itself to Kidman. They gave up the attempt and left empty handed.

A few days later Kidman went back, cracked the last lock and found a treasure chest. He picked it up, shook it, then panicked and put it down again, letting himself out without taking anything. Then he picked up his courage again and went back once more. This time he brought out silver coins and a locked box containing gold and silver. The robbery of a chapel caused outrage and every college increased its security. It didn't prevent the pair removing sackfuls of treasure from Gonville & Caius College, though it took six weeks of undetected nightly raids to accomplish.

Stealing was one thing, disposing of the proceeds another and this proved more of a problem as the robbers and their fence squabbled. But they got away with it and after a while people stopped talking about the great plate robbery. Then on 24th January 1801 there was another burglary, when the house of an Alderman was entered and a considerable quantity of plate stolen. The old suspicions were immediately rekindled. Police searched Grimshaw's house in Newmarket Road but found nothing. They then arrested and interrogated Kidman; after a week he cracked.

Back went the police to William Grimshaw's house, this time they decided to pull it down, brick by brick. As they did so they revealed hidden cavities containing the Alderman's silver together with various items of college silver he'd not disposed of.

The trial took place at the County Assizes. Grimshaw made no defence. The judge sentenced him to death at which William broke down, begging for mercy and bringing tears to the eyes of the jurymen. It was no avail – too many colleges had been robbed to allow for any mercy in this world. He was hanged at Cambridge castle on 18th March 1801. His accomplice was transported to New South Wales for life, but was back in Cambridge within seven years. He settled down to his old job as clockmaker and died in January 1832

More old buildings have been recalled by News readers.

Alan Betterman from Cambridge writes: "I was very interested in your article about family-run shops next to the old Guildhall. My grandfather owned and ran a butcher's shop at the corner of Petty Cury, his wife was the chief cashier, her brother was manager and his younger brother was a butcher. The shop was run by him from the latter part of the nineteenth century until he retired before the Great War. His advertisement in the Spalding's Street Directory of 1880 states 'By appointment to their Royal Highnesses the Prince of Wales and the Duke of Cambridge', so he was able to display the Prince of Wales' feathers on the front of the shop." The shop was later replaced by Sketchley's cleaners before that whole side of Petty Cury was razed for the Lion Yard redevelopment [SCAN 101.69 SHOWING CORNER OF PETTY CURY AND GUILDHALL STREET 1902.; SCAN 5132 SAME CORNER OF PETTY CURY 1972; SCAN 101.70 DETAIL OF BUTCHER'S SHOP

Pat Haslop (nee Humphreys) from Bar Hill says her memory was jogged by Angela Nunn. "Her letter about the cycle shop right on the corner of Newmarket Road and East Road stirred a lot of thoughts. It always looked a very busy shop, the doorway and windows always had cycles or parts hanging from them. [SCAN101.64 CORNER OF NEWMARKET ROAD AND EAST ROAD SHOWING CYCLE SHOP 1963] Angela and I were both in the same Brownie Pack and at one point were sixer and seconder together. We both went on to become Girl Guides; our meetings were held in St Columba's Hall in Lower York Street. Our Brown Owl was Miss Easton who lived at 12 Stone Street and organised willing Guides and Brownies to push her to and from meetings in her very heavy wheelchair. She must have been very trusting to let us youngsters push her down there, but boy was she heavy to go up the slope!"

Returning to East Road Pat recalls: "There was a place called Todd's Scales and next door to them a public house. Its sign hung on a tall white post and was an upside-down magnet. I was told that if I walked underneath it with a metal hat on I would be drawn up there by the magnet. Wherever I was going to get a metal hat from I'll never know, but I suppose there were a few about just after the war". Do you know the name of this pub, she asks, and can anybody tell me more about Todds Scales when they were in East Road

One man who probably does is Mr D. Runham of Cambridge; he wrote following a picture of the Working Men's Club on East Road. "It certainly was a memory-jogger. The shop next door was Bill Kemp's barbers where I had my hair cut in the late 1950's (for a D.A. & Quiff). He had a heavily bandaged infected foot and would hop across the road to the Club for a Guinness while cutting hair, so you sat with half a hair cut till he returned. I have cut my own hair ever since, so saving a lot of one-and-ninepennies as it was then (8p). I enjoy your pages in the News. I am now delivering them – PS I was born in Cambridge in 1942"

Mrs G. Deas from Milton has lent a picture to jog the memories of many people who may now be grandparents themselves. It was taken at a Cambridge baby show in August 1947 when her son, David, won first prize – that's them on the left on the front row with David standing on her lap. But who were the other bonny babies? [SCAN 101.29]

Such shows were an important part of the entertainment scene; there was one at the Balsham Conservative fete held on Empire Day that year along with a fancy-dress competition, a goat show and a Punch & Judy performance. Show. The star attraction however was a Penny-Farthing bicycle which could be ridden – if you dared – for a small charge

But life was not much fun in 1947. Ladies of the Cambridgeshire Federation of Women's Institutes sought an assurance that there would be an improvement next year in the distribution of ration books. One member said their village was one of several which had to go to Bourn to collect their ration books. "Imagine what happens", she said, "when the inhabitants of all these villages advance on the centre in the two days allowed". She quoted an instance of one mother leaving a young baby in the house while she queued from 10 o'clock till 4.30 in the afternoon before then having to travel three miles home.

Nor was he a member of the then recently formed RIBA with offices in King's Parade. Colin thinks he may have lived in Cintra House, Shelford; or that the building may be named after Sintra in Portugal.

My researches show that Edlin was almost chosen as the architect of Cambridge's new Corn Exchange in 1868. He submitted designs for a building in what was described at the time as the Grego-Italian style somewhat similar to a German railway station with a square lantern roof. His scheme was praised by the famous Victorian architect Alfred Waterhouse who himself did much work in Cambridge, including Gonville and Caius and Pembroke college. Edlin's designs would have cost half of that of the rival design that was shortlisted but he lost out to Richard Reynolds Rowe, whose building still stands.

Cintra House thus remains his main Cambridge legacy. Over the years it provided homes to many people including at least two Cambridge University academics, the Rev Joseph H. Gray, Fellow, Dean, & Lecturer of Queens' college and Thomas McKenny Hughes, Woodwardian Professor of Geology and Fellow of Clare.

A few weeks ago I featured the 'Man Loaded with Mischief' inn sign designed by Richard Hopkins Leach and sought information on any of his other work. A cutting was soon speeding across the country to Hayes in Middlesex from which his great-great-grandson Frederick McLean Leach replies. He e-mails: "You ask the question, 'where are they now?' The answer is they are with me." He has send scans of three of the pictures, including a family portrait showing the artist himself. Another shows Cambridge Volunteers parading on Parker's Piece in October 1848 and the Gatehouse of Cambridge Castle painted in 1840. [SCAN OF CASTLE GATEHOUSE IN 1840]

The Castle gatehouse was later demolished for the County Assize courts, where the Shire Hall car park now stands. The courts are themselves now just a memory. But to one man they are a vivid memory. Charles Sharp from Barnwell writes: "I first set foot inside the imposing old Cambridge Assize Courts more than 70 years ago, when I was in short trousers and still attending St Andrew's school in Chesterton. My parents explained that as a special treat we were going to Castle Hill, where an open day had been arranged at the nearby county jail which was due for demolition to make way for a New Shire Hall. My first impression was one of disappointment. There was nothing that looked remotely like a castle, just a large piece of land and grim looking buildings with unusually small barred windows. Outside one of the main buildings was a long queue waiting to see the condemned cell and the gallows, which, we were informed were in regular use up the beginning of the First World War [SCAN OF GAOL]

"Some visitors were also invited to look inside the neighbouring and at that time fully operational Assize Court building. It had a very impressive colonnaded frontage behind which was a splendid courtroom typical of its period. Intimidating. No wonder the accused always appeared lonely and scared to death. This was where death sentences were still being passed, but no longer carried out. A uniformed officer explained briefly how British Law was conducted and pointed out where the presiding Judge, Counsel and what, with surprising grace, he called the 'Gentlemen of the Press' sat.

"I have often thought that if there was a defining moment when I first began to take what my poor mother in years to come clearly regarded as an unhealthy interest in crime and punishment this was it. In the event it was not until I was in my last year at the Central School that the Headmaster, the marvellous 'Jock' Livingstone asked whether I had decided on a career and then enquired 'Have you considered being a newspaper reporter?' I hadn't as a matter of fact, but he explained that Morley Stuart, Editor of the Cambridge Daily News, had a policy of recruiting journalism apprentices from each of three local schools in turn - the Perse, County and the Central, whose turn it now was.

"I considered myself the rank outsider of the four applicants Jock sent for interview. To the astonishment of my parents, not to say my own utter amazement, I was chosen. Within a matter of months I would become a regular visitor to that fine old building I had first seen as a six-year-old in short trousers. Now as a young teenager, I would find myself sitting on those well-worn benches polished by the trousers of what that police officer a decade earlier had been gracious enough to describe as 'Gentlemen of the Press'. In truth you felt like a parrot perched in a church a pew, bolt upright writing on a ledge hardly wide enough to support a notebook let alone turn out finished copy. In the next three years a whole new world opened before my eyes. There I received another education far above anything I expected. All on account of the newspaper you are holding in your hands." [SCAN OF ASSIZE COURTS ON CASTLE HILL WHICH STOOD ON WHAT IS NOW THE GRASS VERGE IN FRONT OF THE COUNCILLORS' CAR PARK]

Justine Clarke from Llanelli, Wales, is researching one of her ancestors, another great Cambridge illustrator, John Sebert Clarke who was living in East Road in 1881. His father was a builder but John became a 'Press Artist' producing dozens of sketches which were featured in Cambridge newspapers. John's journalistic career started with the 'Cambridgeshire Weekly News' at the beginning of the 1890s & he returned to them in January 1897. The Cambridge Express featured his sketches of Cambridgeshire churches most weeks from 1892 and 1896. They proved so popular that they were published in two volumes entitled 'An artist's rambles in Cambridgeshire'. His work also appeared in the 'Ely Diocesan Remembrancer' as well as every edition of Spalding's 'Handbook, diary & almanack' between 1900 and 1917. He covered a variety of topics from an advertisement for Kidman's builders and contractors of Sturton Street showing their yard and details of individual aspects of their work to the opening of Mill Road Library in 1896, an important facility for the residents in the area. [SCAN OF MILL ROAD LIBRARY AT OPENING]

But little has yet been discovered about the man himself. Both he and his wife described themselves as "artists" and lived in several houses in Cambridge. The final entry in the street directory seems to be in 1907 when he appears as a builder and decorator with a workshop in Blinco Grove. Justine would be interesting to learn more of this most prolific of Cambridge illustrators but an intensely private man. If you can shed some light then please write to me and I'll pass it on.

Memories 15th December 2004, by Mike Petty

John I'Anson from the Castle Hill area of Cambridge has written to me following the recent death of a dearly-loved and well-remembered lady, Gwen Challis formerly proprietor of one of Cambridge's best-loved fishing tackle shops. He writes: For myself and many others the memories of Gwen and her son Terry recall countless untold acts of friendship and happiness in her fishing tackle shop on Newmarket Road, Cambridge, now sadly long gone.

John originally paid tribute to Challis' shop when it closed down around October 1968. Then with Bill Fincham (who wrote a 'Fenman' column in the News) he recalled what the eye once saw: the sign at the side of the window with its gaily-painted Mill Pool scene; angler, great leaping pike its jaws champing angrily at the plug bait between its teeth and the name "Challis and Son" above the shop

But Challis' was not just a shop where an angler went to buy something, it was a shop where friends were met and made, and Mrs Challis and her son Terry would be there behind the counter. Back in the 1960s she recalled that it had been in June 1938 when the shop opened. At the start there were very few customers; fishing was not nearly so popular and neither was time or money available for it.

Anglers of those days -who were often a laughing stock- had to make their tackle last and of the rods then bought there was mostly a demand for those of whole bamboo in the middle and butt sections and of lancewood or greenheart in the tip. They tended to be stiffish in play and nothing like as efficient as split cane. A split cane rod was an absolute luxury for an angler to buy

The newer type of metal reels were just making an appearance. The most widely-used type of reel sold were of walnut with a brass backplate. Floats were mostly celluloid or quill and there was not much variety. Lines were of plaited silk and hook casts of either gut or a gut substitute that came from Japan

A handful of eyed hooks could be had for a penny, maggots cost five shillings (25p) a gallon but not many people used a lot of them. A fishing licence cost one shilling (5p) and an angler could join any of the local clubs for about two bob (10p). There were also miles of free water in and around Cambridge.

Once the war was over business and tackle began to pick up. Rods made from tank aerals were all the rage for a while and customers' needs for reels were met by the production by the shop of the 'Cambridge Pembroke' and 'Cambridge Trinity' reels which were made of aluminium. Then came fixed spool reels; Mrs Challis sold her first two just before the beginning of the freshwater season of 1948, one of them to Hank Gentle who was still using it 30 years later.

The whole face of the fishing tackle manufacture began to change with the appearance of monofilament lines and tied hooks. With new methods of production prices began to fall and soon there were plastic floats, plastic tackle boxes, nylon nets and hollow steel rods. Next came fibre glass rods which by the 1960s had completely captured the sea-fishing market.

With the boom in angling the shop altered from its former front-parlour smallness to a bigger, brightly-lit, tackle-packed showroom, but they still sold some of the old items of tackle alongside the new. It was no wonder that generations of anglers mourned the closure of the shop at the end of the 1960s. Do you remember it – or have you other anglers' tales to share [SCAN OF ORIGINAL ARTICLE – TRY TO ESTABLISH A DATE FOR THE ARTICLE BY ASKING LORRAINE IN THE LIBRARY AND THEN CHECK FOR NEG; SCAN 5926 ANGLERS AT ELY STATION NOVEMBER 1963].

Jean Clements from the Arbury area has already written with a fishy tale: “My husband and I have many memories of the Kite area, one of them being the children’s fishing match run by the Albion fishing club. Word went round the school when the tickets were available, then there was a rush to the side door of the Falcon pub (now the Boat Race) for them. On the day we assembled on Parker’s Piece where double-decker buses were lined up around two sides of the Piece. Then it was all aboard and we went to St Ives. After a good day we had tea in the Corn Exchange then home for the prize-giving. One year I caught the longest eel with my dad’s second-best rod and was given a tin of sweets. It was a very special day”

Recent Memories articles have prompted Miss Mary Rayner from Cambridge to write me a most interesting letter on a variety of topics, including shops. “Matthew’s was a lovely shop; you could smell the ground coffee in Trinity Street; I remember going in with my mother. The when the art of serving groceries was slower and more complicated than it is now. The grocer would put sugar in stiff blue paper bags, twiddle it around very quickly with string and tie it up securely. He would also make stiff blue paper cones and pour dry goods into them. They had lovely wooden counters and the further you went back down the shop it got quite dark. I remember on the top of the store cabinets there were big jars, black with gold stripes with numbers on them. I think they held various types of tea. I wonder what happened to them – and to the lovely coloured glass lamps like Chinese hats which used to be suspended from the ceiling by metal chains before Woolworth’s was modernised. In MacFisheries in Petty Cury there was a huge counter of some sort of stone with the fish for sale on top; it was supported by big, square legs and below the counter, edged by these legs was a large glass aquarium with real goldfish swimming in it. I had to be nearly dragged away from looking at it”.

It was easier getting to central Cambridge in those days, Mary recalls: “Buses would drive down Petty Cury and quite often get stuck in the traffic; people used to get out and walk. [SCAN OF BUS SQUEEZING DOWN PETTY CURY c1965]. It was much better when buses were staffed. After the war for some time some of the conductors were ‘displaced persons’; one had very black hair and was quiet, another was real fun and used to call out the bus stop names, pronouncing them the wrong way or with the emphasis on a different part of the word. We used to look forward to him being on!” [SCAN 6378 CONDUCTORS AND BUSES CAUGHT UP BY TRAFFIC JAM IN MARKET STREET 1965]

One of those conductors was Marion Desmond, nee Henderson, who now lives in Lanarkshire. She moved to Cambridge in 1954 and lived in Pembroke Street with her sister who worked in the Bun Shop pub before becoming landlady of the Hat and Feathers, Newnham and the Wheatsheaf on Castle Hill. Marion meanwhile became a conductoress with Eastern Counties, where she met her husband; they married in 1958 and lived in the Vicars Building in St Tibbs Row for seven years. She writes: “I have very happy memories of that area. The telegraph boys with their motor bikes, the YMCA – a lively place with table tennis during the day and music in the evening, the noise of the printing press below us, the Corn Exchange – we had it all” - including a pigeon who would sit on the windowsill and keep watch over the Lion Yard car park”. Ian Alexander from Dry Drayton has contacted me since he has a vivid memory of being with his mother one Saturday morning and going to a china shop which he thinks was on the corner of Market Hill and Peas Hill. He writes: “I’m not sure this was possible as I was born in September 1934 but can remember the present Guildhall being built. However the memory is so vivid that I have to relate it. We went into the shop to purchase a new chamber pot and this had to be wrapped up sufficiently to disguise what it might be. I can remember that there had to be several tries before my mother was satisfied with the result. From there we doubtless went to the fish stall on Peas Hill to get a pint of brown shrimps from the man who came from King’s Lynn each market day. That was our regular Saturday evening tea.” I think this might have been Barrett’s china shop on the corner of Great St Mary’s Passage, but do you have other suggestions [SCAN 6883 BARRETT'S CHINA SHOP ON CORNER OF GT ST MARY'S PASSAGE, 1930s]

Jean Potter of the Coleridge area of Cambridge was quick to supply an answer to a question puzzling Pat Haslop. Pat had remembered that there once was in East Road a sign resembling a magnet, and had been told that this would have pulled her up the street if she passed wearing a tin helmet. But Jean says that it was not a magnet at all, but a horseshoe advertising the fact that her uncle, Percy Day who kept the Britannia pub was also a blacksmith and wheelwright. Many local tradespeople took their carts to them for repair.

June Atchison from Chesterton agrees, adding that the Britannia was on the Working Men's Club side of East Road. She found her memory jogged by the mention of several of the other old companies in that part of the city. Terry Reynolds from Over writes he still has a set of the original scales stamped with the name of his grandfather, Fred Reynolds the sweet-seller. He always had his scales serviced by Percy Todd at his scale works.

Memories 21st December 2004, by Mike Petty

Christmas isn't what it used to be in the old days; but then it probably never was. 100 years people were reflecting on some 'good old customs' that had gone, though not all of them were lamented. This is the article contributed by a 'Special Correspondent' to the Cambridge Daily News on 24th December 1904. [SCAN OF MAN READING A NEWSPAPER]

[START OF THE 1904 ARTICLE]

Christmas was wont to be a very merry time at Cambridge – more merry than wise. For a fortnight before and a fortnight after the fatal day there was a continual round of junketings, and sleep was much less thought off than pleasure. We do ourselves very well now in the way of social enjoyment but the former riotous 'keeping' of Christmas has gone.

One of the old customs is still lamented by the public, if not the tradesmen of the town: "Show Night". All Cambridge and his wife and family used to turn into the streets and every shopkeeper did his best to make a good display of his wares and catch the public eye by some novel form of window dressing.

The chief objects of attention were the butcher's and poulterer's where the carcasses of prize beasts and prize poultry were exhibited in prodigious quantities whilst the proprietors dispensed hospitality to their customers in their private offices or parlours. [SCAN 8824 – CHRISTMAS DISPLAY AT HASLOP'S SHOP SILVER STREET 1892; SCAN 6972 DISPLAY OF MEAT OUTSIDE SEBLEYS BUTCHERS, BRIDGE STREET, 1890, SCAN 8833 MEAT OUTSIDE TRAYLEN'S BUTCHERS NEWMARKET ROAD]

Too much emulation brought 'Show Night' to an untimely end. In their endeavours to beat one another the butchers killed more meat than they could get rid of in the ordinary way and losses followed. Then sentimentality came on the scene. Some people professed to regard the exhibition of carcasses as barbarous, 'unworthy of nineteenth-century civilisation' and the like and so 'Show Night' died out with it went a great deal of harmless enjoyment and useful social intercourse. With it also vanished the art of the butcher's dresser' of which the present generation knows nothing; whilst old residents will agree that neither the taste nor the care once shown in window decoration at Christmas time is now to be met with. 'Show Night' provided a considerable fillip to trade and there has been some talk of the advisability of reviving it.

Another and less defensible feature of the old-time season was the Christmas draws and raffles. Almost every public-house had its Christmas draw, and private ventures in this direction were often publicly advertised. The shares were a shilling each and the prizes would vary from a suckling pig or gigantic turkey to bottles of spirits or a dozen cigars. The great thing was to produce as many prizes and as few blanks as possible, and it was marvellous how successful some of the proprietors were in effecting this. Of course it meant a time of roaring trade for 'the house' and no doubt if there was a little loss on the draw it was made up in other ways. [SCAN WHEEL – MEN OUTSIDE THE WHEELWRIGHT'S ARMS, EAST ROAD]

Besides the draws there were the raffles which were not confined to licensed premises where however the basin and the dice-box (the dice used to be thrown into the basin) were to be found in almost every parlour, and mine host would exhaust his stock of fine cigars and choice wines and spirits in bottles.

Small shopkeepers, with scarce an exception, stimulated trade by raffling off Christmas trees or other attractive goods and raffles for stands of wool flowers, musical boxes, cases of stuffed birds, live rabbits and the like were held in many private houses. There was much speculation at these times. If all the shares had not been taken up the balance would be raffled for, and when the major trial of luck began there would be much competition to tempt the thrower of a high number to sell his chance. Both the draws and raffles were conducted quite openly and without the least fear of police interference. Cambridge was said to be one of the last towns in England to abandon these practices, but it is many years ago since they were extinguished by gentle, albeit firm pressure.

During the Christmas fortnight the waits were nightly at work, not a complete and noisy brass band such as is the twentieth century idea of waits, but a quartette [SIC] or at most a sextette [SIC] of players, and as each one was an expert with his instrument, the result was very far from being displeasing, even though one was awakened from one's slumbers by them. The names of Large, 'Si' Barker, Dring, and others will be remembered in this connection. Cambridge at the time under notice possessed a very considerable number of skilled handbell ringers and bands of these would supplement the waits during the Christmas week, the music of the bells having a pretty effect on the silence of the night.

Christmas Eve was a bustling and joyous time. People did not use to travel about at Christmas as they do nowadays, and the railway companies offered no inducements to do so by way of excursions. The streets were full of re-united families, and the greetings of old friends meeting once more were to be heard on every side. The singers at Great St Mary's and St Andrew's churches entered into the spirit of the season, and from the belfries Christmas hymns and carols were played on the bells, a good old custom which has been revived of late years by the Rev Mgr Scott at the Catholic Church. Business was continued until a late hour on the old-fashioned Christmas Eve, and was brisk too, far more so than is now the case.

So much for the ante-Christmas observances. Now a word in conclusion as to those which came after the festival. The custom of tradesmen giving Christmas boxes to their customers has dropped almost completely out of use, due to competition and the close profits of the present day. But less than a quarter of a century ago the tradesmen would send round small presents to his regular customers, special lines being stocked for this particular purpose.

'Beef Eatings' were great institutions during the week following Christmas, and consisted of free meals provided by mine host at the hotel or inn to the persons who frequented his house. A massive round of cold beef and a liberal supply of pickles formed the general menu, though at some places much more liberal provision was made. The guest paid for his drinks.

Men who are still in the prime of life can remember when all of these customs flourished vigorously, and their retention was fought for as pugnaciously as if the well-being of the State depended thereupon. Scarcely one now survives, and the changes in residents at Cambridge are so frequent that there are probably many who have never even heard of these things. The disappearance of most of them is no great loss: the disappearance of some is a distinct gain.

What may be regretted is that the vanishing of many of the old customs in which Cambridge was once so rich has been attended with a considerable loss of the good feeling which used to exist between all classes of the townsfolk in the presence of a common interest and common tastes. We want more rather than less of these links nowadays and then we should enjoy greater prosperity, greater content and broader views. Of a certainty we should have fewer attacks made upon the purse of the ratepayers for the furtherance of the designs of ambitious individuals or foolish faddists.

But the Christmas of 1904 was not one that many would look back on with nostalgia; times were hard for many people, as the News reported

The probability of distress in Cambridge some weeks ago, before the wintry weather came to give a keener edge to hunger and a more painful and sharp reminder to the poor of their inadequate resources in food and clothing, was widely discussed but was felt to be unduly magnified. The Town Council vetoed a proposal to supply aid to the unemployed. But Miss Wilson of the Nursing Institution on Newmarket Road began to undertake the provision of free dinners to which the children of poor parents resort for their midday meal of soup and bread. "We give the children as much as ever they can hold", she said. Boys in pitifully ragged garments and decrepit old women and little girls with starvation all too plainly written on their features come with jugs to take soup home to those unable through illness or lack of clothing to come themselves. [SCAN OF LADY AND TRAMP]

Help for those in need was offered by 'Share-our club' nights. Often these clubs were organised by public houses and working men were encouraged to pay a small sum weekly – perhaps sixpence or one shilling. For his investment a man got eight shillings a week sick benefit if he fell ill during the year with the residue of the funds shared out amongst members at Christmas. But even these were not always the kindly institutions they claimed. In 1903 a wife sued one club who had refused her husband payment since he was not being given medicine by the doctors and so could not be 'on the club'. When she told them that he was beyond medical care and dying they brought forward their 'share-out' night by three weeks, distributing the funds the day before the man died. This ensured that there was nothing left to pay towards their old subscriber's funeral expenses and the widow's plight evoked much sympathy in the days leading up to Christmas.

By contrast I hope that your Christmas is merry and bright and if you have a few moments to reflect on 'the good old days' I should be very pleased to hear from you.

Memories 28th December 2004, by Mike Petty

The post-Christmas headlines have been dominated by stories of controversial plays, earthquake & floods. All these have also occurred in the Cambridgeshire area over the years.

The theatrical story that perhaps most closely echoes the current controversy in Birmingham was acted out in Cambridge way back in 1597. It was part of the continuing drama of relationships between the University and Town.

At the time the undergraduates were feeling grieved over some supposed wrong they had suffered. But rather than continue they fight they elected to bury the hatchet by inviting the Mayor and Corporation to enjoy their hospitality at Clare Hall – later renamed Clare College. [SCAN OF CLARE COLLEGE FROM THE RIVER, 1814]

The centrepiece would be a new play that they had written themselves, with the assistance of one of the councillors, Miles Goldsborough. It was billed as a ‘merry comedy’ entitled ‘Club Law’, and would be performed in English, so that the townsfolk could understand it.

To make it a grand night out the councillors had been encouraged to bring their wives and it was a distinguished gathering that took their carriages to the front gateway of the college. In due course all assembled in the room set apart for the play and, in the spirit of friendship the guests were allowed the best seats, right in front of the performers, with their hosts either side of them.

As the play commenced it was soon obvious that all was not what they had hoped. For the actors were dressed in the councillors’ own best clothes (which the students had borrowed) and so well impersonated their habits, gestures, language and expressions that it was hard to decide, which was the true townsman, the one on the stage or the one that sat watching.

Increasingly councillors became annoyed but they could not make a dignified exit – or any exit at all – for they were hemmed in by the students alongside them and had to wait impatiently until the ‘comedy’ was over.

Once safe in their own Guildhall the councillors made an official complaint to the privy council about the undergraduates’ libellous behaviour. This taxed the ingenuity of Queen Elizabeth I’s ministers who did not wish to offend either party. They came up with an ingenious solution: they would come to Cambridge to see the play themselves and make their judgement. And to be sure they appreciated the points that caused complaint they insisted that the Mayor and corporation join them and watch the play a second time.

But the councillors had no wish to be lampooned again, for much of the mockery was too near the truth for comfort. So the matter was allowed to drop.

Earthquakes have also made the news over the centuries; ancient chronicles record a great earthquake in 974 with others in 1048 and 1075. This was followed in August 1089 by a tremendous earthquake all over England which made the buildings jump up and settled down again. There were others in 1133 and 1165 which was concentrated on East Anglia, knocked a man down and caused the church bells to ring. More followed in 1231 and 1343.

There were two in 1750, one in August the other September, the first of which passed over whole breadth of the fens near Ely, whilst Cambridge felt the shock in 1896.

Two more recent examples came in August 1926 when earthquake shocks of unusual severity were felt on a Sunday morning. In Cambridge people were awakened by the rattle of windows, crockery and furniture and residents of a house in West Road were aroused from sleep by the oscillation of their beds while a lofty wardrobe continued to shake and its contents to rattle for some time. Railwaymen on night duty said the telegraph poles rattled and the windows of signal cabins shook. Several residents of Huntingdon felt three tremors.

Then in June 1931 the weather went mad. It was a strange day in Wisbech with brilliant sunshine followed by a terrific hailstorm, the heaviest in living memory. Then in the dead of night people in the town were awakened by the rumbling of what sounded like heavy traffic passing along the streets and the sound of crashing crockery and falling pictures

Kings Lynn felt the tremor, which left pictures swaying and caused the roof of Barnard's fruit shop in High Street to collapse. Many people left their home in night attire and the roads were alive with affrighted residents. March noticed two distinct tremors: the tower of the town clock shook violently causing the bell to ring incessantly. A Gorefield motorcyclist claimed that the road heaved like the swell of the sea and only with difficulty could he keep on his bike while the signalman at Emneth heard the noise and thought the mail train must have fallen through the bridge over the canal at

Elm crossing. [SCAN MARCH CLOCK TOWER WHICH SHOOK AND OF WINDMILL AT GOREFIELD]

The 1931 earthquake was later followed by floods in August in which 14 people died. But the most violent of local storms was that of 1953 when a very high North Sea tide overwhelmed sea defences, causing great damage with loss of caravans, and more significantly loss of life, in the area around Kings Lynn and Hunstanton. Certainly I remember being told about it when our family went for our annual sea-side holidays over 40 years ago. This Christmas lunchtime, as I sat on the Hunstanton cliffs for 'docky' and watched the sun reflecting on the sea, these events of 50-odd years ago seemed incredible to imagine. Yet next morning the news came through of the disastrous events in the Indian Ocean showing how quickly 'normality' can become overwhelmed by tragedy.

One building always in the headlines at Christmas is the great chapel at King's College, Cambridge. It has been filmed and photographed from many angles, but few can have seen it quite as clearly as

Felix Goody. He got quite used to the scene when he worked replacing the lead on the roof of Clare College Old Court. He tells me: "The lead was originally put on in 1471. I stripped it off to be sent way to be recast and then replaced by me. The amount involved was 52 tons". [SCAN OF CLARE COLLEGE ROOF]

Following my 'Memories' piece about Christmas-time butchers, Jo Edkins has e-mailed a splendid photo of a butcher, Joseph Redfarn, in Mawson Road, Cambridge. Redfarn also had a shop at 15 Gwydir Street in Victorian times. Jo runs a website about Gwydir Street <http://www.colc.co.uk/cambridge/gwydir/> and would welcome any other information about the area. [SCAN OF REDFARN'S SHOP IN MAWSON ROAD]

My picture of a bus in Pett Cury (Memories 16th December) has brought a letter from Mr & Mrs Doggett of Fulbourn; they write: "Sometimes it seems like only yesterday you took your life in your own hands as you walked down Petty Cury pavements. It was interesting to see the 105 bus edging its way past Dixons camera shop but what was even more interesting on closer examination was to see our sister-in-law, Mrs Shirley Williams, now of Oakington, pushing our niece in her pushchair. We can therefore advise that the year was 1968". Nick Richardson from Bar Hill has also been researching the picture and has spotted that the number plate on the lorry shows it was registered in 1969. [PETTY CURY BUS PHOTO]

Mrs E. Cream from Gwydir Street has memories of Cintra House when she was a schoolgirl in the 1920s. She recalls: "I was taken to choose a winter dress from the 'Gown Shop' (my name for it as it was rather grand) in Cintra House. My parents belonged to a clothing club; a set amount was paid weekly and goods purchased from chosen shops. A Mr Nicholls called at the house with his bulging suit case taking orders and delivering goods. I remember him measuring my brother for a suit, material being chosen from his swatch of patterns. But I went to this rather grand house for my dress; a stately lady, perhaps Mrs Nicholls, looked after my mother and me. I remember the dress was brown, stiff and scratchy, with embroidery on the bodice and small red buttons" [SCAN OF CINTRA HOUSE]

Mrs A.C. Brown of Chesterton seeks help. She writes: "I was much interested in the memories of Poppy Day because by my grandfather, W.G. Clark, used to sing at the Cambridge War Memorial for the Armistice Day celebrations. He was a sergeant in the 26th Cyclist Battalion, Suffolk Regiment and left the army in 1919, having been in it right from the start". She wonders if anybody has a photograph showing Sergeant Clark in full voice. If you have let me know and I'll put you in touch.

Memories 2005

Memories 5th Jan 2005 by Mike Petty

Its that time of year when quaint country traditions such as trundling a plough around villages and seeking 'donations' to ensure that cherished front lawns are not defaced are once more in the news.

But most of our country way of life has been lost. One man who has spent the last 40 years attempting to record East Anglia's oral traditions is Neil Lanham from Helions Bumpstead near Haverhill.

As a youngster, he didn't take much notice of the country ditties his mother Ruby would sing as she went about her work. Neither did he put much store on the tales she told at gatherings of all kinds. She would 'hold court' at hatchings, matchings and despatchings (christenings, weddings and funerals) with people hanging onto her every word as she related stories from the past, punctuating them with 'howsomiver'. She would take the part of all the various characters with dialogue 'So I said to him...'and 'He said to me...' It seemed no problem for her to convert an adventure into a story, in fact she could not tell it otherwise. But to Neil this was normal: after all, she was his mother and she'd sung songs and told stories for as long as he could remember

She was exceedingly superstitious, Neil recalls: "We were never allowed to say 'goodbye' only 'cheerio' or 'farewell' and she would always kiss the gatepost when home from a long journey. Furthermore, having worked with old horsemen, she would tell of their belief in the witchcraft of charming horses with frog's bone, milch, and secret oils. When my sister, Audrey, was born with cats fur across her face (mother had put her hands on her face whilst carrying Audrey when a cat was killed on the road) mother knew that the only way to be rid of it was to rub a little of her own spittle on it night and morning, which she did and it went. She told us of this and how she had learned it, together with a good many more 'non-medical' cures, from Granny Griggs, the old village midwife. She had seen ghosts and was a strong believer in their presence."

Many his mother's stories were about horses and often from the hard days in agriculture of the late 1920's and early 1930's when 'If you hadn't got anything boy, you were lucky because you did not have to worry about it, for sooner or later you would lose it.' In these tales of no money and having to eat from a table and chairs with the bailiff's stickers on them she was sharing the experiences of life through a conversation rich in imagery, Neil now realises.

His mother also sang, but years ago everyone used to sing or whistle, he recalls. But then, back in the early 1960s, Neil visited the first Cambridge Folk Festival and, somewhat to his surprise, found he recognised words to songs a group called The Watsons were singing. "I was sure I had heard mother sing it, but how could she have seen books on folk songs or heard any folk records. The 'old goat' cannot possibly know any folk songs I thought. I was of course wrong and very wrong. She did know them: they had been passed on to her from earlier generations".

They were our heritage, Neil realised and then began to appreciate how these traditional links to the past were disappearing and would soon be lost forever. Sayings like 'Over Will's mother's way', 'Half the lies you hear ain't true' and literally thousands more expressions that tripped off the tongue of 'illiterate' people were being forgotten in the modern technological age.

Tragedy struck when Neil was only five, his father died. But his uncle Tickles Alleston from Kersey took him under his wing on a farm which had no electricity, only hand-pumped water and external sanitation. He had hardly ever been off the farm but, like all 'long headed men', had an acute awareness of the things around him.

"He was, by his own admission, 'As sharp as a bag of chisels' and 'As artful as a wagon load of monkeys', Neil remembers. "He would be down the Cart Lodge on a Monday morning with the men when they were having their breakfast, where he would get the gossip and tell it to us, embroidering it with expressions of imagery. Then by the time he went down to his local pub on a Thursday night, the tale would come out as a yarn and be filed in his head for years to come to make a point or a truism - all with humour.

"He also made his own songs as he rode the tractor, all from experiences. Like 'Three dows flew from the creach (three pigeons flew from a spinney with a watercourse running through it)', 'Pig feeding calypso' and 'When you are awfully light on the trigger' inspired by a dose of the 'backyard trots' during the blackberry season."

But more important than his stories were the strange little sayings like 'Don't you make a nais boy (keep quiet about it) or, No bumming boy (it's the truth). "He would come out 'Cold enough this morning boy for a suit of sleeved weskits' or 'You can hang round a long time, boy, with your mouth open before roast chicken fly in' and 'It is not what you know but it's knowing what you don't know, boy, that counts'. He would use local words like 'dinge', 'dag', 'hazeling', 'sludder' and would even make up his own words as he went along. He'd make it sound muddled up on purpose to make you think but it gave you the all important imagery."

All this had a profound effect on Neil: "We are all born into orality - the world of the spoken word and not the written one. Young children learn speech from their parents' influences and carry with them for life. It is the cultural identity of the individual but more so of our region and our nation, and it is being lost"

So for the past 40 years Neil has been trying to keep alive this great East Anglian heritage in song, storytelling and dance. He first went around to public houses where the old boys gathered to talk and sing. John Hobbs of Stetchworth would sing of the adventures of the watercress girl, while at the Batsons Arms, Horseheath Fred Moss the roadman relayed the naughty adventures of the German clock winder and the whole company including the landlord would join in the 'Thrashing Anthem'. At the Three Horseshoes Shudy Camps Cicily Bradnam would oblige with 'Old King Cole' or 'When the Old Dun Cow caught fire' and others followed in hilarious small community self entertainment. Neil listened, joined in and most importantly made tape recordings of their chat and chaff, recordings that he has now produced as a series of CDs and videos

But as the old men stopped singing so Neil started and with horseman Jack Tarling who is now in his 80s continues to sing traditional Suffolk songs in local pubs along the Cambridge, Suffolk and Essex border areas. They are often joined by other friends including old sailor Bill Dolby, Andrew Stannard, and two men versed in the tradition of the horse, farrier Roger Clarke of Stoke-by-Nayland and well-known farmer Tony Harvey. Together they perform songs, step dance, stories and country banter. "We are selective about where we go, usually small rural communities with the purpose of reminding people of their heritage and keeping the oral traditional alive" explains Neil. Proceeds go to charity, especially the Suffolk Horse Society.

Neil is still searching for people who have retained the story-telling traditions and have a tale to tell. If you know of anybody he would be pleased to hear from you; visit his website – www.traditionsofsuffolk.com or write to Neil Lanham at 'Ivy Todd'. Roy Chamblerrlain of Foxton – himself a mine of local information – recalls another singer; he writes: "Does anyone remember seeing Jimmy Young in the Pye canteen when he was starting his singing career. He sang 'Too Young' and other songs during a lunch break. In another programme the artistes included Forsyth Seaman and Farrell", He thinks they could have been 'Workers' Playtime' radio programmes.

Music of another kind is recalled by Dennis Doyle in his excellent new history of the church of St Mary the Virgin, Great Shelford. Dennis joined the church choir back in 1927 then it comprised at least 12 boys and 10 men. Their music might have been heavenly but the choirboys were not angels and had to undergo a bizarre initiation ceremony. This consisted of the new member being left alone in the vestry whilst the others disappeared in the darkened body of the church. Suddenly, the upper part of the vestry window slammed down open, whilst through it was thrust a hand and arm dripping with wet brown mud, accompanied by a ghastly scream or groan. The new boy, usually frightened to death with this sight and sound would run screaming into the dark church listening to the hoots and laughter of all the other members who had once themselves been "through it". Then in Dennis' younger days there were some old cottages near to the church whose front doors opened on to the path with heavy iron door knockers conveniently placed for mischievous choir boys to bang loudly. This mischief was reserved for autumn or winter Friday nights around seven o'clock when the boys were on their way to choir practice. Not long after, an irate occupier of one of the cottages would come storming into the church, declaring loudly what would happen to any boy or boys he could catch in the act. The vicar in his usual reply would say how sorry he was, he would have severe words to say to any boy proved to have been a culprit, and that it would not happen again. Dennis says he long lost count of the number of times it did! [SCAN OF SHELFORD HIGH STREET IN 1920S]

Travelling shops were once a common sight in Cambridgeshire; one man who remembers them well is David Crouch from Swavesey.

His father, George Thomas Crouch, started at Swavesey as a hardware dealer in the 1920s. He bought a horse and wagon with a paraffin tank and made compartments to hold brushes, mats and rugs, soaps, soap powders, washing soda, clothes lines & pegs. There were baskets of crockery of all sizes from dinner and tea plates to pudding basins, milk jugs, sugar bowls, and numerous other things. Stored on top were brooms and mops, coal scuttles, dollies and dolly tubs for washing clothes. Then having spent all his savings to pay cash for his first load of paraffin the wagon was ready for the road. As the horse and wagon trundled from house to house people appeared with their empty cans and inspected the goods for sale before the wagon moved on to the next house. When they found that he provided a regular reliable service business increased

He soon developed a set routine. On Monday mornings the round started in Gibraltar Lane and School Lane through to Station Road, Swavesey before going on to Over village. Tuesdays round was the remainder of Swavesey, usually finishing earlier to give time to restock the wagon and price up stock ready for sale. Wednesday it was Fen Drayton and Conington, Thursday Boxworth and either Knapwell or Lolworth. Friday was the only day of the week when he was not on the road. This was the day when he offered a furniture removal service and there was always someone who was looking for a second-hand piece of furniture or a roll of second-hand lino. [SCAN NEAR OVER CHURCH SHOWING CLEAR EVIDENCE OF HORSES!]

The horse was an important part of the operation. The first was a lovely black mare named Polly who went on the rounds so many times she knew exactly where to go and where to stop. Sometimes they would pause at a public house at lunchtime to give the horse its nosebag containing its midday meal known as a 'sifting'.

There were problems with the weather. In wintertime when the roads were all snow and ice, they would have the horse's shoes tapped and threaded to take frost studs. Even so when they came across slippery places on the roads they had to sprinkle sand down before they dare continue the journey. Then snow would build up on the iron rims of the wheels and make the four wheeled van very hard work for the horse to pull. In the summer time when it was very hot the opposite would happen and wet tar would be picked up on the rims until there were lumps as big as teacups

They had three horse-drawn hardware vans over the years. The second one had belonged to a Mr Harry Cooper, a hardware and furniture dealer of Balsham, whose family opened the Cooper furniture shop in Newmarket Road in Cambridge. [SCAN OF COOPER'S HORSE-DRAWN CART c1910]. In 1938 the third van had belonged to a Mr Hewson of Fenstanton who was retiring. It was taken to Fullers, Wheelwrights, of St Ives to use as a pattern for a new van but the workshop was burnt down and the new woodwork destroyed. The only option was for Mr Fuller to restore and repaint Hewson's van with Crouch's name on it. The van had been in an accident and one of the parts that needed replacing were the wheels. The only ones they could find that were the right size came off a London horse drawn fire engine.

David helped his father work the rounds with horse drawn vans until 1948. Then when he passed the driving test they bought a second hand Morris 25cwt flat truck. They were sorry to see the horse go, but times were changing and to remain competitive they had to update. Now they built up regular rounds in eleven villages as well as Cambridge. In the late 1960's paraffin sales peaked at between 30,000 and 40,000 galls a year. In the wintertime the demand was so great they were often still selling paraffin in Cambridge as late as eight o'clock in the evening. But by 1980 sales of paraffin were dropping, Shell stopped making

"Pink Paraffin" and bottled gas was taking over. In 1986 it was time to call it a day. [SCAN OF MOTOR VAN FROM GUYHIRN NEAR WISBECH]

"Looking back we had some good times and over the years we got to know some wonderful people", says David. He treasures memories of riding home on a winter afternoon after a busy day. Then unharnessing the horse, feeding & bedding her down for the night before walking across the yard hungry, opening the back door and being greeted by a glowing fire in the kitchen range. There was his mother with a lovely rabbit pie with thick crusty pastry on top, to be followed by an apple pie and custard - what more could one ask for.

But there is one mystery he still puzzles over: After the last horse-drawn van was decommissioned his father sold it to a Mrs Henn of Grange Road Cambridge. She fitted it out to live in and used it to travel around the countryside. Some years later she gave slide shows and talks to W.I. meetings about her travels. He would love to know if it is still on the road!

David Crouch's recollections form just part of a collection of writings by members of the Swavesey History Society, now published as 'Memory Lane'. They include reminiscences from around the country, reflecting just how diverse a community Swavesey has become. The booklet costs £3.50 from Ann Shepperson at Boxworth End Farm, Swavesey

It is just 25 years ago that Cambridgeshire lost one of its greatest authorities on traditional folk dances. In January 1980 Dr Russell Wortley had been performing with the Cambridge Morris Men at their annual Plough Monday celebrations when he collapsed and died. The other members of the group compiled an appreciation of the man who I will always remember for his skill on the hammer dulcimer that he would play at his home at Little Thetford. [SCAN OF RUSSELL WORTLEY – THERE ARE PHOTOS OF HIM IN THE NEWS LIBRARY TOGETHER WITH PICS OF MORRIS DANCERS; SCAN OF CAMBRIDGE MORRIS MEN 1967]

Russell's first encounter with traditional music in the Cambridge area was around 1938 when he made the acquaintance of Jimmy Broadway of Bourn who, in his younger days, had fiddled for a set of Molly Dancers somewhere in the Fens. In his old age, Jimmy's showpiece was the tune called Pop goes the Weasel, the "Pop" being vigorously plucked.

The next traditional musician he met was a dulcimer player, Will Lawrence of Comberton, who he heard playing at the Institute Hall early in the War, providing entertainment at teas for the old folks. Will had been a builder's labourer and, besides playing the dulcimer, he used to make them. They were something of a family tradition for he had a cousin Herbert at Thriplow who also played. The two would sometimes go off in the summer on pushbikes, dulcimers slung over their shoulders, and tour the village Feasts, playing in the pubs and dancing booths. If they paid their way, all well and good. If not Will would not hesitate to sell his dulcimer for a couple of quid and build himself a new one from an old piece of furniture next winter. One of Herbert's dulcimer is now in the Cambridge Folk Museum [SCAN OF ENID PORTER, FORMER CURATOR OF THE FOLK MUSEUM, WITH THE DULCIMER, SCAN OF DULCIMER]

Then there were the various bands who played for dancing at many of the village feasts. These were held on specific dates in each village and usually lasting a week. A dancing booth was taken around by horse and cart; it consisted of a tent and sectional board floor with a small platform for the four-piece band, usually made up of fiddle, concertina, drum and harp. One was led by Herb Reynolds on the concertina with his half-brother Charlie Huntlea on the harp. Charlie was a cab-driver living in the East Road and Herb lived in Cambridge Place off

Hills Road. His particular achievement was to play concertina and harp simultaneously, pumping the former on his lap with his left hand while vamping the harp with his right.

One of the outstanding players in Cambridge was Harry Huntley who made his living as a street musician but died young. It was from Harry that Russell gained much of his information. During Stourbridge Fair (once one of the most ancient trading fairs in the country) Harry used to join Herb and Charlie with his whistle on the upper floor of the Oyster House in Garlic Row where there was a room for dancing. He was a brilliant whistle player and Russell made tape recordings of him playing marches, hornpipes for step-dancing and also describing some of the tricks of the trade which he picked up from "roadsters" or tramps who played in the streets for a living. [SCAN OF OYSTER HOUSE]

Dr Wortley's researches show that Cambridge had its share of traditional musicians until well into last century. But do you recall any of them and can you add to the wonderful record that Russell compiled.

Memories 19th January 2004, by Mike Petty

This week demolition starts in preparation for the new Grand Arcade shopping project which will transform much of central Cambridge between Downing Street and the 'old' Lion Yard redevelopment – the one we all remember fondly, the one that officially opened in 1975

Many of those original shops that we recall with such nostalgia – the Alley Boutique, the Golden Egg – have been consigned to the history books as the Lion Yard has evolved, kept pace with the times, expanded. And of course much of the precinct will remain to delight citizens for some years to come. [SCAN OF LION YARD FROM PETTY CURY 1975 SHOWING GOLDEN EGG]

But one much-awaited monument to the 1970s will be replaced. It was the first part of the new scheme to be unveiled: the Lion Yard multi-storey car park replacing the rough plot of land that previously served for parking. It is several years now since last I actually used it but I recall with nostalgia how I used to crawl along in the queue of cars, admiring the architecture of Pembroke Street and Downing Street before reaching the corner of Corn Exchange Street itself and finally glimpsing the entrance to the promised parking place. [SCAN OF CORN EXCHANGE STREET BEFORE CAR PARK 1965; SCAN OF CARS WAITING TO PARK AT THE OLD CAR PARK]

Remember how you had to hold the car back as the entrance ramp sloped down, how you watched with excitement to see which of the two lanes to move into as the barriers got nearer – provided of course that both were working. The elation when you were rewarded with a ticket from the machine and managed to actually get it safe inside the car.

Then which level should you choose. If you spotted a space in that first level, the basement one, should you try and manoeuvre into it, aware as you did so that you were holding up lines of impatient motorists, each fuming at your inability to park first time. Or should you go on and take your chances that there would be a space further up. Was it Level Four that gave you the easiest way out, just down the ramp into the precinct – I've forgotten already! I used to prefer going even higher to Level Seven. Very few people realised that from here there was a passageway – decorated with a brick lion – that was dubbed 'Confusion Alley'.

It led through to the upper walkway and the magnificent Heidelberg Garden, that oasis of calm and floral magnificence dedicated to Cambridge's German Twin Town. How fondly I remembered looking down on it from the windows of the Library's Cambridgeshire Collection when it was on the third floor and watching the skateboarders and drug-takers who seemed to appreciate it far more than the shopworkers who occasionally took their lunchtime sandwiches amidst the scraggy shrubs. [FIND PHOTO OF HEIDELBERG GARDEN IN NEWS FILES]

My most vivid memories of Level Seven and 'Confusion Alley' date back to the late 70's and revolve around an Eaden Lilley's van and Thomas Stearn the Cambridge sporting photographer.

Thomas and his wife started their business about 1867 in the premises at 72 Bridge Street that the firm was to occupy until 1970. He was soon taking his camera outside the shop, undertaking commissions from the University, especially of sporting occasions. His sons Walter and Harry joined his business. Walter was himself a prominent sportsman and expanded this side of the work, becoming better known in University sporting circles than any other townsman.

During the Second World War Stearns continued to record the local scene, now including military groups, but things became especially difficult after a bombing raid centred around the Union Society building sent shrapnel fragments that scarred the walls of the buildings near their shop. The firm decided to send their glass plate negatives to be processed in Brighouse, near Leeds for the duration of the hostilities. Later they restarted their developing and printing in Cambridge before merging with Eaden Lilley's photographic business in 1970. I visited their old premises shortly before they were vacated, to find room after room packed tight with negatives. In those days when the Cambridgeshire Collection was still confined in a small cupboard-like room at the back of the Wheeler Street library there was nothing that could be done except walk away and try not to notice as thousands of images were quietly removed, presumably to the tip. [SCAN OF STEARNS PREMISES IN BRIDGE STREET – PERHAPS PHOTO IN NEWS LIBRARY]

Later came the news that at least the negatives sent to Brighouse had survived, though now they were in the way there. So it was that through the kindness of Eaden Lilley I joined one of their photographers on a van journey to the Midlands. We duly arrived to find white cardboard boxes – black with dust – each containing a number of large glass-plate negatives. These we carried to the van until the floor was covered and the springs started to sag. Finally all were loaded and it was time to return.

But it had been a long and tiring day for both myself and the driver and I certainly would happily have dozed except for the fact that the weight of glass in the back seemed to be lifting the front wheels almost off the road. Eventually we reached Cambridge quite late and drove into the Lion Yard carpark. Then it was up to Level Seven.

Opening off Confusion Alley is one of the emergency fire exits for the new Central Library and just inside is a book hoist for conveying material up to the third floor. So with the help of the Library caretaker the boxes were offloaded on to a trolley, trundled into the library and eventually hoisted up to the Collection.

It was time to thank the driver and send him on his way. There was just one snag. The van keys had disappeared, perhaps removed by some miscreant intending to return and steal it later. As we waited for the police to arrive we noticed a car behaving very suspiciously; it had come up to Level Seven then backed into the parking space just alongside the ramp – that single spot that nobody notices. The constable took down the details and strode off to investigate the mystery vehicle, his torch ready to illuminate that dark recess. He came back with his face beaming – it had not been a villain but one of his police colleagues with his girlfriend. And their car's sagging springs had not been caused by too many negatives – at least not until the beam of the torch had interrupted their activities!

In the end the van had to be left where it was, the doors securely tied up with string. Next day it was retrieved, hopefully before the overnight parking fees gave way to what even then were considered extortionate charges. Even when it first opened in July 1972 its prices had been pitched to discourage those who wanted to park their cars for any length of time. Thus whilst parking for the first hour was 5p, with 15p for two, 25p for three and a horrendous 35p for four it would surely be only the richest motorist who would stump up the monumental sum of 75p for a whole days parking!

The car park was later expanded and will continue in a much-reduced capacity while the Grand Arcade scheme is implemented.

So that is my abiding memory of the old Lion Yard Car Park; doubtless you have others – perhaps of that giddy decent down the circular ramp, perhaps of being interrupted one night by the flashing of a police torch! If so then please share them. [FIND PHOTOS OF THE LION YARD CAR PARK FROM NEWS FILES]

Memories 25th January 2005, by Mike Petty

The news that cyclists may soon once more have free reign to ride throughout the Cambridge central streets has brought concern from people fearful of the danger this may cause to pedestrians.

This is by no means been the first time that such sentiments have been expressed. In August 1857 there was a letter of complaint about two undergraduates on a double velocipede running down a child watching a Punch and Judy show in Barnwell. The attack on ‘this dangerous and ever-growing evil' prompted another correspondent to describe the machines as ridiculous and immoral - whenever he met one he went 'as close to upsetting it as possible ... I long to send it and its lunatic piped propeller to immortal smash'

By the 1890s police were cracking down on offending cyclists using the kind of 'dirty tricks' that motorists now complain of. At the annual dinner of the Cambridge Wanderers Cycle club in December 1897 Mr G. Edwards, the Captain, admitted that not all cyclists were angels. There were men who went tearing about, whistling down the street, ringing their bells and expecting to have the whole street cleared for them. There was another class who went for a ride in the country and had a sort of liking for riding on the path. [SCAN 8842 – CAMBRIDGE WANDERERS CYCLE CLUB MEMBERS 1904]

But the police were being underhand, he continued: Had the chief constable put a constable in the road in proper uniform no one would have complained. But he had to go and put a man in plain clothes to capture the people. He was sure that the chief constable had a rise in his salary for the smart capture of cyclists

Various restrictions were put in place and then removed. In 1904 cyclists were allowed to ride on various paths over the commons but by 1908 the council were considering banning them from Senate House Passage. And when the first one way restrictions were introduced in Market Street and Petty Cury in 1925 there was one category of traffic that could go against the flow as they have done legally or illegally ever since. But people have always broken rules as pictures in the News files demonstrate with infringements at Bateman Street in 1968 and Trinity Street in 1992. [SCAN 102.35 CYCLISTS GOING THE WRONG WAY IN BATEMAN STREET 1968; SCAN 102.33 BREAKING THE RULES IN TRINITY STREET 1992]

As early as 1913 cyclists were seeking their own dedicate routes and came up with various suggestions. One correspondent in September 1923 observed: "Sir - During the time that Silver Street, Cambridge, has been closed for traffic, some hundreds of persons have used the Mill Lane and Sheep's Green to Newnham mill path. This opens a solution of the problems of relieving Silver Street of a great number of bicycles, especially during the dinner hour. I would like the Corporation to consider widening the wooden bridges, lessening the gradients, covering in the outlets of Newnham mill, and improving the cobble stones in Mill Lane, in order to encourage cycle riders to use this way"

The campaign reached a crescendo in March 1979 when the Mayor of Cambridge, Coun Alec Molt, faced 300 chanting cyclists outside the Guildhall and signed their petition demanding better provision for cyclists. Led by a Panda car they took a 15-minute tour of the city centre streets before returning to Peas Hill to hear councillors' views. Their priorities included cycle lanes on the Huntingdon & Madingley Roads and a contra-flow cycle lane in Downing Street. Since then a network of cyclways have been established including a bridge over the railway near the station. [SCAN 6853 CYCLISTS PROTEST IN PEAS HILL 1979]

But even cyclists need somewhere to park. This has again caused difficulties: "The pavements are full of parked machines whilst college courts are empty, a News editorial of 5th March 1910 observed, adding "it will be 20 or 30 years before the problem is solved". Perhaps they were a trifle optimistic.

In September 1949 the issue was being aired once more. The News commented: An author once remarked that Cambridge was unique for the manner in which its population parked their countless bicycles – 'Cambridge wise' he called it. Local inhabitants adopt an air of supreme nonchalance, when, with a careless flick of the foot, they balance their machines on the edge of the pavement, suspended on one pedal - and not much of that. Our reporter saw two cycle accidents within five minutes. In one case a cycle fell against a double-decker bus as it passed, and in the other a machine toppled over when there was nothing near it. In both cases the cycles were damaged. In order to reduce kerb parking to a minimum, the council is endeavouring to provide all possible facilities for cycle parking clear off the highways.

In this they seem to have been successful – when did you last see a bike parked at the edge of the pavement? [SCAN 102.34 CYCLES PARKED WHEEL TO WHEEL IN SIDNEY STREET 1964, MAKING IT DIFFICULT TO GET THROUGH THEM TO CROSS THE ROAD]

City councillors themselves faced the problem of what to do with their own bikes while they were attending meetings. In May 1951 they considered reserving a number of cycle racks in the Guildhall for themselves. But the Mayor remarked jokingly: “The next thing will be that people with cars will want parking spaces reserved”. Of course one person who does have a reserved parking is the Mayor with a chained-off space on Peas Hill.

Another is the University Vice Chancellor. However when Miss Rosemary Murray occupied that post in 1976 she found that the quickest way to travel on official business around the city was on two wheels but found herself squeezed out of the few cycle racks provided at the Old Schools. So she was given a “V-C-Only” cycle stand.

The problem of riding without lights has also been a major concern. In December 1922 P.C. Cudworth told Cambridge magistrates that he was on duty in Victoria Road when he saw defendant riding a bicycle without a front light. He stopped him and asked him where his light was. Defendant said it had just gone out and he was going to light it. He then dismounted from the bicycle and witness noticed he showed signs of having been drinking. Defendant took a box of matches from his coat pocket and attempted to strike one. Witness then noticed that the lamp on the machine was an electric one. This aroused his suspicions!

But why has Cambridge gained its reputation as cycle city. Without doubt the University regulations of the 1920s that prevent undergraduates using motor cars was one big factor. But there is another. The News of 90 years ago was adamant, there were so many bikes because house prices were so high that ordinary folk had to live far from the centre and needed the machines to get to work.

Memories 2nd February 2005, by Mike Petty

The news that Her Majesty the Queen boarded an ordinary train to take her from King's Lynn to London last week bring to mind an earlier royal rail episode that proved a somewhat more stressful journey.

A prolonged spell of hard weather in the 1870s prompted a debate as to which was the quicker means of travel between Littleport and Ely. There could surely be no doubt – the speed of the steam locomotive could outdo any other form of transport, even a man on skates. Or could it?

For along this stretch of track the railway and river run alongside each other and the ice was hard enough for skating. A wager was laid and details were settled, the railwaymen promising not to tell the driver of the train what was to take place. The chosen fenmen was waiting at Sandhill Bridge, Littleport as the 12.30 from King's Lynn pulled in to Littleport station. Then a whistle was blown and the race was on.

The speed skater had a series of pacemakers to lead him along and was spurred by the sound of the train that seemed always to be gaining on him. But then as he neared the final stretch under Queen Adelaide Bridge he saw that the ice ahead had been sabotaged: ashes and clinker had been thrown down by some railwaymen anxious not to lose the race. Desperate not to be beaten he picked his way through the obstacles, got back up to full skating speed and reached the winning post – the railway bridge at Ely – with thirty seconds to spare.

Railway officials were most apologetic about the failed attempts to nobble the race, but the fenmen were not to be placated. They would have their revenge. Which is where the Royals come in. For the Prince of Wales was making his way back to Sandringham by train that very evening.

During the afternoon relays of skaters were seen heading off from Ely towards Littleport, all carrying lanterns as if to light their way through the darkness. Others boarded the train as it arrived at Ely station.

A short distance along its route the locomotive driver noticed a red warning light on the track and stopped to investigate. There was nothing to be seen so he continued, only to find a second and then a third. They seemed to be very similar to those lanterns that the fenland skaters had carried with them earlier. It was when the train came to an unscheduled stop at yet another light that His Royal Highness lost patience; his voice could clearly be heard by the lads hidden nearby, asking if 'This blasted train was ever going to get him to Sandringham'.

One trusts her Majesty had an incident-free return without hitting the headlines! [SCAN OF STEAM TRAIN AT ELY; SCAN OF PHOTO OF LITTLEPORT STATION IN SNOW c1900; SCAN OF SKATING AT LITTLEPORT 1891]

Mrs Marlene Lask of Stapleford has lent me a photograph of 'The Man's Shop' in Burleigh Street taken in the 1950s. It was owned by her parents Pauline and Jules Goldwater who settled in Cambridge after their marriage in 1929. They also opened 'Pauline's Dress Shop'

(the London Stores) in Fitzroy Street. The shops were very popular with very modern and up to date fashions bought in London. Both shops continued in business until her father died in 1968. Were you amongst their customers? [SCAN 102.16 OF MANS SHOP, BURLEIGH STREET 1950s]

More details have come to light of a picture of Redfarn's butcher's shop that I featured in Memories of 29th December. Linda Monk has e-mailed to say that Joseph Redfarn was her two-times great uncle and the shop was at 18 Mawson Road. It's a private house now, but you can still see the lintel which used to be the top of the shop window, the cellar window, and the arch above the door next-door. [SCAN OF BUTCHERS SHOP 102.11]. The old picture was taken by a photographer named

E. Hilton who had a shop in East Road just before the First World War. I have a file on photographers but know very little about this one can anybody tell me anything more about him or do you have any other of the pictures he took?

Can you answer a question that has been puzzling Geoff Leyshon. He e-mails: "I sat in the Dobbler's Arms in Sturton Street last night and the picture on the wall of Harry Cable's shop at No.6 stirred my curiosity. It was the stylised "Fleur de Lys" marks on the door and window lintels, which seem to be present on most houses of that area, built around 1900. After over 50 years of seeing it, I got round to pondering the significance of the mark and realised I hadn't a clue what it was for. Crazy really, as I was brought up in the East Road area between 1950 and 1962 and this mark was on most of the houses around me. Can you enlighten me? Anne Anderson e-mails following mention of Cherry's Stores in my 'Looking Back' snippets from 1980 in which I reported how customers had said goodbye to the couple who had run the shop in Norwich Street for 34 years. Lionel Cherry and his wife Kathleen had taken it over in 1946 and built up a business which, in days when petrol was cheaper, offered a free delivery service to Newnham and Arbury. Anne writes: "Cherry's Stores is now my home! Various members of my family, at schools locally, bought items at the shop (I did too after moving to the area in 1976). I moved in March 1984 - and continue to love it. In the deeds the house is Number 26 Norwich Street, rented from Trinity Hall by Robert Sayle, who installed two spinster ladies to sell haberdashery! The house is now 70-72 Norwich Street, which shows the infilling that has taken place since it was built in 1864."

Mrs Mary Denny from the Arbury has written following to say that her memories were jogged by Dennis Doyle's book on Great Shelford church. She writes: "My parents, Mr & Mrs John Cook and I were evacuated to Great Shelford Vicarage to live with Fred William Jeeves, the minister, in 1939 when I was three. I remember a large house and beautiful gardens with a tree on which my brother cut 'MC L PC'"

Memories 9th February 2005, by Mike Petty

Paul Staniforth from Norwich has written to seek your help with information on gasworks, and particularly the one at Ely. He writes:

“The 50th anniversary of the closure of the Ely Gas works will occur in 2009. To commemorate the event I am writing a history of the company. My father Claude Staniforth was the manager, secretary and engineer of the Ely Gas from 1933 until 1957. Salted away in the loft of the family home I have discovered many old papers to do with the business and along with a small selection of photographs.

“The Ely business was founded in 1835 by George Malam a gas entrepreneur extraordinaire who along with his three brothers founded 43 works through England. Little is known of the original financial backers but it is recorded that like so many new gas works at the time the Ely works was in financial trouble after only a few years”.

It was bought out by a national 'holding' company - County and General Gas Consumer Company but that too was in major financial trouble by January 1868 when it found itself in chancery for failure to pay its coal suppliers. But then the Ely town crier went round announcing that the sale had been postponed; the city's works were profitable so a consortium offered to buy the local works. They would offer £6,000, the Londoners wanted £9,000 - but one could build a complete new works for £7,500 ... the wrangle continued. Eventually the works were bought by the new Ely Gas Company financed largely by local shareholders. That company struggled through uncertain times, with several national coal strikes, and two world wars before its financial fortunes changed spectacularly and it became an extremely profitable enterprise only to be nationalised by the government in 1949. [SCAN 86.487 ELY GAS WORKS C1900]

Paul continues: “Before my father died I persuaded him to write his memories realising they would be a valuable piece of social history. These together with my own recollections of being taken as a small boy aged 5 to 11 around the works on many occasions have inspired me to write a full history of the undertaking. I must have been one of the few schoolboys in Ely who could dismiss their Mother's instructions to keep themselves clean by saying that I was off to the 'works' with my Dad to go in the retort house or climb on the top of the gas holder. Yes it did smell terrible but as an inquisitive boy I was captivated by the machinery, what it did and how it worked and not whether I came home with grubby trousers smelling of the gas works.”

This problem of smell and dust was one which afflicted residents near the Cambridge Gas Works too. In June 1954 the News reported that people could not open their windows without getting smoke on their bedding and furniture and could not hang out their washing. The problem was solved two months later, as a correspondent remarked: ‘Sir - The best part of our charming city of Cambridge is the Abbey Estate as during the past few weeks No.1 Retort House at the Gas Works has been out of commission. No dust; No smoke; No fumes; No hauling lumps of coke out of your eyes. All is peaceful. Washing can be hung out free from grit and blacks and you can see the spire of St Andrew's church nestling among the trees. Delightful – but how long will it last? – J.E.S.’ Sadly for residents it was soon back in production. [SCAN T1747 – WASHING WITH CAMBRIDGE GAS WORKS IN BACKGROUND; SCAN 89.65 AERIAL VIEW OF CAMBRIDGE GAS WORKS, NEWMARKET ROAD IN FOREGROUND, 1950]

Paul has enlisted various experts, has delved into the Ely Gas Company records in the Cambridgeshire County Archive and gone up to Glasgow University which holds the files of Woodhall Duckham who built the vertical retort which Ely citizens will remember towered above the adjacent housing situated on Station Road.

But he is particularly keen to add to the book any memories people may have and trace relatives of the stokers, fitters, and main layers. If you recall visiting the works to buy gas mantles or coke on a Saturday morning to supplement the rationed supplies of fuel or remember that very distinctive smell of town gas, Paul would like to hear from you. Did you witness the frequent occasions when the road would be dug up to trace and repair a leaking main. And did you know that the works almost caught fire, not once but twice? What a bang that might have been!

You can write to Paul Staniford at Chestnut House, Hill House, Road, Bramerton, Norwich NR14 7EE or phone 01508 538195

Other places had their own gas works: Soham's long dark and dreary streets had been metamorphosed into pleasant and safe thoroughfares in January 1849 by the coming of gas lights. Melbourn Gas Company was formed in 1865 and next year Bassingbourn organised a public dinner to express admiration at the brilliant and beautiful light supplied by their new works. 1867 saw Littleport begin to raise the £2,000 required to light their streets this way and in 1868 it was Haddenham's turn. Sutton tried to establish a works in 1870 but at the meeting there was a lack of public spirit which caused the newspaper to comment that "the inhabitants of Sutton will be quite safe from the horrors of gas explosions during the present century"

The worry of explosions was always present, in January 1870 March had suffered a strong smell of gas in the High Street for a considerable time and the unpleasant odour had penetrated into adjoining houses to the great annoyance of inmates - and an unhealthy atmosphere. It was particularly worrying as a few months before the entire front of Mr Burrows grocery shop had been blown 50-60 feet across the road following an explosion caused by a gas leak. It had come from a bad joint made by the ironmonger who had installed the supply - and by the repair man going looking for the spot with a lighted candle. [SCAN 86.974 MARCH HIGH STREET FROM MARKET 1930S]

More recently Royston was devastated by a series of explosions and fires in March 1991 after a new gas main was connected wrongly sending a surge of gas with 15 times more pressure than usual into the domestic supply. Police sealed off the town and trains stopped on the main line for fears that sparks from the overhead power lines could cause further devastation as a heavy cloud of gas hung in the air and gas appliances sprung leaks or burst into flames. Plans were made to evacuate 25 homes in Green Drift after an explosion in a terraced house shattered windows. Another huge explosion rocked Greneway School where the caretaker saw flames billowing from ventilation slots in the boiler house. The kitchen, hall and changing rooms were damaged in the blast and music teacher Adrian Jacobs led 40 children to safety.

As police with loudhailers toured the streets warning people to turn off their gas appliances some 250 engineers were called in to make checks on some 5,000 homes, shops and businesses. It was an operation that would take all night, and the fitting of new gas meters to every premise would take even longer. Once the immediate situation was stabilised the clearing up could begin. It was to be a long job. Five weeks after the explosions some people were still without heating, cooking or washing facilities, everywhere redecorating and repairs were being undertaken. . Old photographs often show gas lights; a good example of this is the earliest street scenes of Cambridge taken by Arthur Nichols in the 1860s. [SCAN OF MARKET HILL SHOWING A GAS LAMP 1860S] Now Peter Lofts has digitised the original glass negatives and is staging an exhibition in the Lion Yard Lending Library at Cambridge from tomorrow, 10th February. Peter has worked in collaboration with Chris Jakes of the Cambridgeshire Collection which houses thousands and thousands of negatives taken by successive photographers at the premises in Post Office Terrace, including the work of Ramsey and Muspratt who operated a successful portrait studio for over 40 years. If your ancestors had their pictures taken in those ancient studios then Chris probably has the negatives and can supply you with prints. And Peter Loft's modern reproductions show that the skills that were once the preserve of the darkroom can now be emulated by modern computer technology

Mrs A.C. Brown from Chesterton has lent me photographs of an old party boat named 'Prince Albert' which was operated by Logan's boatyard at the turn of the century. The figure-head of the boat is a very fearsome Waterloo soldier, sword at his side, pointing ahead. But how long did it operate and what was its motive power, she asks.

My brief research has revealed an advertisement for the boat which appeared in the Cambridge Graphic in 1900 by which time it was owned by Askham & Sons. I believe it may have been a companion to the 'Victoria' which was described as the 'Queen of the Cam' in the Cambridge Chronicle of 3rd August 1844. This was used by the Conservators of the River Cam on their annual trip to Clayhithe in 1900, an event also featured in the Cambridge Graphic. It was powered by horse for the article – one of the humorous features in which that weekly but short-lived paper excelled - reads: "Five bells sounded and above the commotion of casting off could be heard the voice of the captain of the good ship Victoria shouting instructions through a megaphone – the speaking tube apparatus being out of order. At length the gentleman in charge of the equine motor ordered his steer to 'Come 'ee wut'". This mention of horse power is amplified later in the article when the Commissioners made their return journey in the boat now decorated with fairy lamps and enlivened by a pyrotechnic display. "Things went merrily until Baitsbite when some one let off an immense bomb ... The horse had not been trained to artillery, the tow-line parted and we were left in mid-ocean, a hopeless wreck. However in a short time the horse was persuaded to alter his mind and brought us safely to land with all the dignity and grace that marks that noble species". But does anybody have similar information on the Prince Albert? [SCAN 102.55MRS BROWN'S PICTURE; SCAN 102.61 ADVERT FROM CAMBRIDGE GRAPHIC SCAN 8941 RIVER CAM CONSERVATORS PREPARE FOR AN OUTING]

Sarah Thwaites needs help in researching information about Italian prisoners of war who worked on fenland farms. She had an Italian 'uncle' who worked for a long time on farms around the Haddenham area & is trying to compile some accurate historical data for her creative writing project at APU. You can contact her at email@sarahthwaites.fsnet.co.uk or write to me and I'll put you in touch. Malcolm Cousins from Haslingfield has sent me a picture for you to identify. But she's not exactly sure when the club started – was it 1955 or 1956? They're also anxious to track down any surviving 7s with VE or CE registrations and would like as many pictures or old movie films as they can find. Edward Beaumont e-mails from highleasfarm@w3z.co.uk seeking information on a Cambridge photographer named Alfred Goshawk who was living at 15 Pulling Terrace, Mill Road in 1881. There were other photographic Goshawks at Harrow on the Hill and he has some references to a family of the same name in the Chatteris area. Do you have any pictures taken by him or can you add further details please.

Answers have come in thick and fast to previous readers' enquiries. A couple of weeks ago Andy Cooper sent in two mystery pictures of a party that he found amongst his family pictures. Quick as a flash Ted Northrop from Cambridge phoned to say they were taken at the 90th birthday party of his grandfather Fred Cooper which was held at the Saxon Cement Club works club in Coldhams Lane. Fred had been an engine driver when young and then a road sweeper in the Cherry Hinton. Mrs Bobby Cooper e-mailed to confirm and added the date as 1949 [SCAN OF FRED COOPER'S PARTY]

Denise Warren has contacted me to say that she may be a descendent of J. Redfarn the butcher of Mawson Road whose picture I have featured. She writes: My father Harry Payne Redfarn, was a butcher all his life, working for Eastmans, and then Dewhurst, and I remember going to work with him every Sunday morning and while he did his bookwork I used to weigh tins of fruit on the scales in his shop, and indeed played shops. Memories 23rd February 2005 by Mike Petty

The other morning I was sitting at my computer wondering what to write for this week's Memories when the telephone rang. It was a lady from Norfolk Federation of Women's Institutes: would I give a talk at Wymondham in October? No problem – that's what I do. Could I talk for an hour – yes. Without slides ... - yes (just about). To an audience of 600 ladies? So I said yes and thought - surely they're joking, or I am! Time will tell.

At least I can start as I usually do: "Those of you who read the Cambridge Evening News – and I'm sure you all read the Cambridge Evening News (pause for comments) – because it's delivered to your house free every evening (pause for 'oh no it isn't, not in our village'). Oh yes it is – on your computer". I then go on to say how each evening I look back at the news of 100, 75, 50 and 25 years ago – and how that old news often reflects the headlines in the current paper – showing that some stories go round and round.

In March 1905 the News carried an article about the unexpected arrival of a foreign potentate. Cambridge was already full of dignitaries with many eminent personages returning to the University to take part in a debate on the Greek Question in which the Prime Minister had become personally involved. They were voting whether Greek should no longer compulsory be for those seeking admission to the University.

Then at two in the afternoon the Mayor, Alderman Spalding, received a telegram to say that the Sultan of Zanzibar (who was in London for the coronation) would arrive at the station in two hours' time and would appreciate an escort around the ancient town and its colleges.

What was he to do: the reputation of Cambridge hospitality was at stake for a visit of royalty 'even of more or less obscure regions' was a matter of some moment. The chief constable was an authority on the orient but was out of town, the University was involved in its own turmoil so it was up to him. He despatched a carriage to meet the visitors - not the official Mayor's coach but the omnibus from the Lion Hotel with one of the hotel waiters as escort.

The Royal party in turbans and flowing white robes descended in majesty from the train but of the Sultan himself there was no sign; his retinue explained that he had been detained in London for an audience with the King. The entourage was escorted to the Mayoral parlour but the party preferred to visit a Bazaar then in progress in the Guildhall - whose worthy stallholders (including one who had spent some time in Zanzibar) were delighted at such wealthy visitors- but disappointed when they spend not a halfpenny. [SCAN 6987 OF CAMBRIDGE GUILDHALL DECORATED FOR THE ESPERANTO CONGRESS OF 1907 – MORE SPEAKERS OF A STRANGE LANGUAGE]

Then came the tour; they were escorted to King's, Caius and Trinity where as the porters bowed low the Prince fell to his knees articulating his praise for its architecture in a language that none (including the interpreter) understood. These were the only word he spoke - except when he stumbled and stubbed his toe - then it became apparent that some words were the same in English and Zanzibarian

After three-quarters of an hour it was time for the visitors to depart and with many salaams they set off for the station. Crowds who'd gathered to watch their departure learned something of the mysterious ways of the Orient when the Royal party suddenly dashed to a couple of hansom cabs, and disappeared at speed towards Hills Road.

Next evening a representative from the Daily Mail travelled to Cambridge with 'exclusive' news - it had all been a marvellous undergraduate hoax by members of Trinity College headed by William Horace de Vere Cole who was to go on to establish a reputation as the Prince of Practical Jokers. [SCAN OF TWO CARTOON POSTCARDS OF THE ZANZIBAR HOAX]

But it came as no surprise to the Editor of the Cambridge Daily News. For just two weeks previously he had reflected on an incident in 1873 when elaborate arrangements had been made and not only the Mayor but University officials and Volunteer band had paraded to the Station to welcome a non-arriving Shah of Persia. It was an article that had obviously caught the eye of 'The Sultan' at Trinity College. But the Mayor also read the paper carefully and had been right in his caution. [SCAN OF HEADLINES OF THE ZANZIBAR STORY 4TH MARCH 1905 TOGETHER WITH A SCAN OF A READER'S RESPONSE TO THE EARLIER PERSIAN HOAX THAT WAS CARRIED IN THE CDN ON 4TH FEB 1905]

Then in March 1965 the rumour started again only this time the Shah was supposed to be arriving by a Heron of the Queen's flight at Marshall's airport. Quite what his itinerary was nobody really knew - perhaps a stroll along the Backs, a visit to King's and Trinity, and then round off the stay with a pint of beer and game of darts at the Queen's Head, Newton. Some believed it and a crowd of a hundred waited outside King's College chapel. Others did not including the Sunday lunchtime regulars in the village pub. But this time it as for real as the thirty-pound boost to the pile of pennies being collected to improve the Village hall testified. [THE VISIT WAS REPORTED IN THE NEWS OF 8TH MARCH 1965 – CAN WE FIND A CUTTING AND/OR PHOTO TAKEN AT THE TIME]

There was more uncertainty in February 1979; when Saturday shoppers on the first day of Rag Week saw the damp grass of Parker's Piece covered with prayer mats, heard kneeling students reciting from the Koran as they faced towards Mecca, and watched their procession through the streets they well might wonder whether this was just another money raising stunt. But again it was for real: a political demonstration by Iranian students Calling for a blessing on the efforts of the Ayatollah Khomeini to overthrow what they described as an "unjust, irresponsible, inhuman and cruel regime" of the Shah of Persia. Only the future will tell what headlines from Iran will be carried by the News in the months to come.

Memories 1st March 2005

The news that the cricket pitches on Parker's Piece, Cambridge may no longer be maintained prompts various reflections. The story of this most famous of Cambridge's open spaces is well known – how it was acquired by the Council in 1613 in exchange for land they owned at the back of Trinity College, the college's cook Edward Parker then being a former tenant of part of the land.

In its early state Parker's was a rough piece of ground, rutted with the ridge and furrow of early agriculture and hoofmarked by the horses which were ridden around it. It was surrounded with deep ditches, one of which then caused the death of undergraduate Laurence Dundas in February 1818. After a drinking session at St John's College he had decided to make his way across to the Barnwell area of town for the company of the various young ladies who plied their trade in that area. He was so drunk he got lost crossing Parker's Piece and fell into one of the muddy ditches. It was only knee deep and he managed to struggle out of it, but then he fell back. He decided it would be easier without his gown, then his jacket and then took everything off except for his pantaloons and his stockings – but he'd pulled them down to his ankles so he couldn't move. He was found him next morning sitting in the ditch in eighteen inches of water. The coroner decided he'd died through exposure to the coldness of the night, and that it had been caused through being drunk.

The most famous event associated with the Piece is doubtless the massive out-door meal given to thousands of people to celebrate Queen Victoria's Coronation in 1838. The picture of tables spread across the grass is one that is reproduced time after time. But there was an earlier feast back in July 1814 when some 15,000 people assembled to watch as 6,000 of the poorer classes were entertained to a public dinner. It was, they claimed a 'unique event' and proved the inspiration for the one that was to follow 24 years later. The meal was to celebrate the return of peace after the Napoleonic war, but we celebrated peace too soon and the Battle of Waterloo was to follow the next year.

In 1831 the Town Council was approached by a Mr Dupuis of King's College and gave permission for an area of the Piece to be levelled off for a cricket ground for the use of both town and gown. Further improvements followed until in May 1832 it was good enough to stage a cricket match between Cambridge University and the Town.

The University had beaten the Marylebone club previous week and had strengthened their squad with eminent players including the Honourable F. Ponsonby, considered by many the best gentleman batter in England. They were confident of their success but they reckoned without the skill of a certain Mr Fenner whose bowling took vital wickets and amassed 27 runs in fine stile before being caught. The second and third days were badly interrupted by rain and the match came down to the final over with the town needing just eight runs for victory but being robbed by a dubious umpiring decision! The University continued to play their matches on Parker's Piece until Fenner opened a ground of his own a few steps from the boundary in 1846.

Pictures of the Piece in those distant days are scarce but recently Ric Leach has shown me a copy one of the original paintings made by Frederick Richard Leach in October 1848. The building in the background is the Town Gaol that was erected in 1820 and finally closed in April 1878. [SCAN]

Two major events occurred on Parker's Piece just 75 years ago in March 1930; one we remember the other we seem to have forgotten. The former was the opening of the Hobbs Pavilion, named after the famous cricketer John Berry Hobbs who made nearly 200 centuries in his first-class cricket career, playing for England between 1907 and 1930. His story has been told time and again and will doubtless be repeated in the weeks to come [PERHAPS FIND NEWS PICTURE OF HOBBS PAVILION?]

But the other headlines of March 1930 were of a major demonstration on Parker's Piece which attracted thousands of farmers. The meeting was originally intended to bring together workers in East Anglia but interest had become so wide that nearly all the agricultural counties in England were represented. They passed a resolution protesting against the increase in unemployment amongst agricultural workers and urged that unless effective steps are at once taken then nothing but calamity faced the industry. Memories 9th March 2005, by Mike Petty

'Cambridge housing shortage' is one of those stories that comes round and around. After the Second World War the problem was particularly acute; pre-fabs were introduced as a temporary measure and Mowlems erected concrete 'Easiform' houses at a cost of £1,400.

But when in 1952 Ernest Marples came down to open the 5,000th Unity steel and concrete house he urged caution on those who advocated cutting costs by reducing standards. "One has got to stop somewhere, otherwise we could be building little pigeon houses with one room upstairs and one down", he warned.

Despite it all by 1954 there was a 15-year wait for council houses and nearly half of new buildings were set aside to re-house people living in some 1,250 'slum' dwellings.

The Mayor urged the erection of large blocks of flats in the newly cleared areas rather than taking acres of agricultural land. But in February 1955 a plan was unveiled for the site of some County Council smallholdings and poultry farms on the north of the town separated from Milton Road by a line of houses.

In September 1955 the first house was completed on the new Arbury Estate. Monkman, the builders, took out an advertisement to emphasise the speed of their construction. They had started building on the 1st June and the house was occupied 17th September.

Other people took much longer to complete their dream home. Several families responded to an advertisement for ordinary people who were prepared to co-operate to build their own houses. The Cambridge Self-Build Society acquired plots in the barren fields and allotments off Milton Road. Soon however the landscape was changing as roads were laid and plots pegged out. The men bought a second-hand cement mixer some scaffolding, some spades and the various bits and pieces needed to build a house. This included floodlights so work could continue long into the night as Essex Close started to rise. It was one way of beating the housing shortage.

Not all residents relished departure to pastures new. Their small houses might be over a century old, with a blank wall at the back, inadequate ventilation, lavatories or drainage. But they were in the New Town or Fitzroy Street areas with their local amenities and community spirit; the new Arbury was seen as bleak and unwelcoming.

The 1955 plan included provision for shops, schools, a pub, cinema and two churches. The cinema did not materialise but the church did. For a while the congregation met in individual houses but then an army hut was bought for their first building. In July 1957 Princess Margaret came to lay the foundation stone, returning nearly 20 years later for a service to celebrate its completion. Other facilities have followed including schools, adventure playground and community centre.

As the houses mushroomed and new phases expanded towards Kings Hedges Road some thought it less of an estate than a New Town but without the facilities of a new town. An CEN editorial of December 1968 described it as 'an urban wilderness, a dormitory suburb with no life of its own'; others termed it 'slumburbia', 'like a prairie' and 'completely soulless'

Twenty-five years ago in 1980 Sallie Purkis sought the views of local people to compile a study of the area; some of the children who contributed wrote: "It is a friendly place... I love Arbury and never want to move away"

But how many have indeed stayed and what memories do you have of Arbury.

Now the Cambridge Institute of Continuing Education is planning a new project to bring the original Arbury Is Where We Live up-to-date with free weekday morning events at the Meadows Community Centre in May 2005.

The project needs contributions from everyone, whether you have lived in Arbury all your life or are new to the area, whatever your age or background. It needs people who can help with memories, people who can help with stories, people who can describe what Arbury is and has been like. It also needs people who can help with photographs, people who could help to take videos of places mentioned in the stories, and people who can or would like to learn how to make a DVD.

At the end of the project all contributions – spoken, written or on video - will be put onto a DVD with a free copy given to all participants, however many sessions they attended: one, some or all.

So if you can help make Arbury Is Where We Live 1980 – 2005 a comprehensive record, warts and all, then contact Sue Pemberton on 01954 280399 or e-mail rsp26@cam.ac.uk. It promises to be an interesting way to spend some time and at help to put your own slant on the history of this most important area of Cambridge.

Memories 16th March 2005, by Mike Petty

It is hard to think of Newmarket Road as Cambridge's entertainment centre.

But it once housed a full-time indoor Circus on Auckland Road where Lilliputian people, wild cats and even Mr Edison's latest invention, the Concertphone featuring recordings of Dan Leno, attracted audiences. In 1902 it renamed itself the Empire Circus of Varieties with a programme including George Egerton, the London serio-vocalist comedian and the first appearance in Cambridge of Leno, the midget comedian. Thomas Askham the proprietor applied for a licence to perform stage plays: a dramatic performance was instructive to the working classes and tended to keep them out of public houses. But he met opposition from religious organisations who felt it would be injurious to the morals of the people. As soon as the audience came out they were 'on the Common in the dark'. They complained that the poster for one play contained the figure of a young lady almost in a state of nudity and that if a man took his wife or daughter to the vicinity the ladies would hardly know where to put their heads. The Vice Chancellor quickly banned undergraduates from attending.

As the Auckland Road theatre faded into memory another one nearby was making international headlines. All this in one of the oldest theatre buildings in the country. [THERE ARE PICTURES OF THE AUCKLAND ROAD THEATRE BUILDING IN THE NEWS LIBRARY]

That theatre owed its creation to tragedy. For centuries a major trading fair was held on Stourbridge Common; it attracted buyers and traders from around the country and various sideshows were set up. One of these was a theatre, a wooden and canvas affair that was removed once the fair was over.

Then in 1802 some villain cried out 'Fire' when theatre was packed to the rafters. Frantic screams reverberated through the darkness striking consternation into every heart, there were despairing cries, some calling in vain for husbands, others for wives, brothers for their sisters and sisters for their brothers; whilst little children crying for their parents were taken up and carried by charitable neighbours.

But not all were helping others: amidst the mayhem thieves who had sparked the panic cut the pockets from people's sides, ripped the gowns from their backs, purloined shawls and shoes and tore rings from lacerated fingers and bleeding ears. When it was all over five people had been trampled to death and the building was condemned as unsafe.

A new theatre was opened near the junction of East Road and Newmarket Road in September 1808, though not even the excellence of the Norwich Players nor productions such as the 'Merry Wives of Windsor' could revive the audiences and the building was auctioned off in 1815.

By then its replacement on Newmarket Road was already in being. The Barnwell Theatre Royal was designed by William Wilkins and lauded as 'the best provincial theatre in the Kingdom'. Crowds flocked to the comic pantomime 'Harlequin and Mother Goose' though their favourite was the tragic melodrama entitled 'George Barnwell'

The theatre could hold about 700 people in its commodious and well-arranged gallery, upper circle, private boxes, dress circle and pit. It attracted many famous Victorian artistes during its 60-year run before it was put up for auction. It reopened in November 1878 with buns and tea for 600 people – but now as an Evangelistic Mission Hall. Those who preferred their more traditional entertainment transferred to another Theatre Royal, this time in Mill Road, later renamed Sturton Town Hall, Empire Music Hall and finally the Kinema. [SCAN OF THE INTERIOR OF THE THEATRE ROYAL BARNWELL MISSION –9111]

In November 1926 the curtain rose on a new and most exciting drama. Terence Gray, the son of an Irish autocrat, ex-Magdalene College undergraduate, air mechanic for the Royal Flying Corps and Egyptologist, converted the Mission Hall into the Festival Theatre, which was hailed as the most modern and up-to-date in England.

It opened with a sensational production of the 'Oresteta' in Egyptian-style on a redesigned open stage and with new electric lighting from Germany; it was choreographed by Ninette de Valois. Over the next seven years the Festival achieved an international reputation; rising stars such as Flora Robson and Robert Donat performed on its revolving stage and seats were often hard to find. Gray installed a roof garden and restaurant- ('the view was not extensive it is true but the surroundings are novel', the News commented') and it made more money than the Theatre. Eventually however Gray's empire crumbled in conflict between his own views and those of the student critics of the 'Cambridge Review'. Humiliated by a satirical review put on by the Cambridge Footlights he left for the south of France and a new career as a horse trainer. He also married a Russian princess, became a mystic and converted to Buddhism.

The old building continued to host theatrical performances but concluded with a 'Grand Variety Season in 1940. The final celebrity to appear was a cockney comedian, Cheerful Charlie Chester – whose patter would have been familiar to those who had packed the Empire Circus of Varieties a generation earlier. In a final insult the Festival's seats were transferred to the new Arts Cinema in Market Passage in October 1947.

The building itself was rented to Pye Radio and was soon packed with boxes of boat radio sets, boxes of fuses and coils of wire; then it became a store for the Arts Theatre and gradually retreated back into obscurity. It has recently been acquired and renovated by the Cambridge Buddhist community and a few weeks ago hosted a reading by members of the famous Cambridge University Marlowe Society. The occasion was the launch of a new book by Paul Cornwell which has brought the theatre and its flamboyant creator back into the spotlight. Memories 23rd March 2005, by Mike Petty

It was 70 years ago that the driving test was introduced and since then thousands and thousands of people have learned to drive around Cambridge's crowded streets and notorious bottlenecks such as Mitcham's Corner.

One of those brave individuals who have sat alongside the novice driver as they have crunched gears was a retired policeman, Sergeant Harold Holden. He started his driving school just 50 years ago but had already been driving for 15 years before that. He was on the police traffic patrol when it first started under Inspectors Edwards and Lewis and was in charge of the department until 1946 when he passed the first-class police driver's test. [SCAN HOLDEN – ARTICLE FROM CDN 13TH APRIL 1955]

His new 'Cambridge Driving School' was to be organised on police lines using a new Ford Anglia with dual controls. He offered 1¼ -hour [ONE AND A QUARTER HOUR] lessons and reckoned the average driver would need 10 sessions to reach the standard necessary to take the test. In his experience it was easier to teach young people as they had better co-ordination and powers of observation. Harold was not the first member of his family to teach driving: his mother was one of the first women to hold a driving licence in 1908 and taught drivers during the first World War

The motorist of 1955 was aided by the publication of a new Highway Code which had its regional launch at Cambridge Guildhall that March. The new Code – described as penny-worth of multi-coloured good advice to all road users – actually cost 2½d [TWO PENCE HALFPENNY] a copy to print but was being sold at a loss. Highlight of the event was when two local schoolchildren, Gillian Layton and Peter Bowles presented the Mayor with copies autographed by the Minister of Transport himself.

It was in 1897 that the Hon C.S. Rolls, when an undergraduate, brought the first motor car to Cambridge, a four-seater single cylinder Peugeot; he was supposed to have man with red flag walking in front but would make an eight-hour dash down to London. After the abolition of the Red Flag Act Rolls imported a De Dion tricycle complete with French mechanic who unfortunately dropped the cylinder head & broke it. Rolls had made the acquaintance of Mr King & Mr Harper who specialised in making bicycles and they repaired it. In March 1905 Charles Rolls lectured to the University Engineering Society on 'The History of the Motor Car' and recalled how he frequently got into trouble through getting back to his college late at night after a breakdown. He confessed that he had squared numerous Dons by taken them out in the car though many of these runs ended in pushing the car home with the assistance of his venerable passengers.

By 1905 the News commented that it was doubtful if any town of similar size has as many motors and motorcycles running about the streets as Cambridge in term time. The main problem was undergraduate driving too fast - one crashed into a cow in Victoria Avenue. They were not the only offenders and in 1909 a taxi-driver was fined £2 for driving at the dangerous speed of 11 mph. But three years later we had got used to speed and a limit of 15 mph was being suggested in any inhabited part of the town. By 1922 the limit was up to 20 mph, though it was habitually disregarded and some people were talking of abolishing it. But the majority of road motor accidents were due to excessive speed and it was purely a matter of opinion what constituted excessive speed – said the News that April. The Cambridge Accident Prevention Council was set up to try and reduce injuries and Sergeant Holden's dog 'Jill' played a significant part in one of their films, 'Almost Human' which was shown all over the world. Two of their other productions, 'Wise and Otherwise' and 'Horse Sense' which were made in the streets of Cambridge in 1947 and the early 1950s have been produced on video by the East Anglian Film Archive, giving a vivid picture of the period and its traffic problems. Shots of cars driving down Petty Cury and accidents outside the Round Church make them well worth seeking out from the Arts Picture House. Arbury Memories:

Eileen Bernard from Cambridge writes:

"I was born in 1933 on Arbury Road, one of the last four houses before the children's play area and the Grove pub. My mother told me the house cost £600. In 1964 I bought a house in Leys Avenue almost backing on to mother's garden, the price was £3,450. My memories as a child are of plating in the cornfields, the one where they found the grave of a Roman soldier. After they'd removed the skeleton we children were allowed to stand in the grave. We picked wild flowers in the hedgerows and went for lovely country walks past farms to a stream that led to a railway crossing and continued into Kings Hedges Woods, a lovely area. One of the farmers would bring his produce on his horse and cart to sell to people in Arbury Road. We could play in the road until dusk with only an occasional bicycle coming from the allotments." Does anybody recognise these bridesmaids? They followed Winnifred Maud Jones down the aisle of Cherry Hinton church when she married Harold Herbert Parker on Monday 28th June 1926. Memories 30th March 2005, by Mike Petty Back in February I published a photograph from Mrs A.C. Brown of Chesterton of the figure-head of an old boat called the 'Prince Albert' which used to run river trips on the Cam. Could anybody tell her something about it, she wondered?

I have now received an answer all the way from Pittsburgh, Pennsylvania. Joan Hulm has sent copies of a correspondence she enjoyed from the late Bill Leach, the fondly-recalled teacher and steam-boat enthusiast who has featured several times in this column. Writing back in July 1983 Bill provided information some of which he had obtained from his father.

The boat was built by John Cross of Ely and originally called 'Prince Regent', a title first used in 1812 by the eldest son of King George III. It carried passengers between Cambridge and Ely and finding the service economically viable Cross soon added a second named 'Queen Adelaide' after the wife of King William IV, 1830-1839. The boats were about 45 feet in length, probably exactly alike, and almost certainly built of oak.

One left Quayside, Cambridge for Ely at 10 am, the same time that other left Ely for Cambridge. The journey would take at least five hours, stopping at any of the riverside public houses, of which there were many, to pick-up and set-down passengers. The boat from Cambridge made a lengthy stop at the 'Five Miles from Anywhere, No Hurry' at Upware, whilst the Ely boat made a similar stop at the 'Bridge', Clayhithe, where good meals could be had. There were no sailings on Fridays, Saturdays or Sundays. [SCAN 1463 – 'NO HURRY' UPWARE c1900 SCAN 313 – BRIDGE HOTEL, CLAYHITHE c1920]

The boats were probably pulled by a pair of horses and carried a red flag at the mast-head indicating that they claimed priority of passage over the slower cargo boats who were supposed to give way to them. Their masts were taller than those of cargo boats and the towropes were attached to the top, keeping them well above the river and the riverbank so that when overtaking the rope would pass right over the other boat without catching.

The spread of the railway network brought an end to the passenger boats as the journey could be completed in a fraction of the time. But John Cross was not finished with his boats; he renamed them 'Victoria' and 'Prince Albert' and used them as 'Party Boats'. Seats were fixed to the cabin-tops where previously passengers' baggage had been carried, sheeted-down in bad weather. They survived the competition of two steamers, the 'Otter' which towed the 'Otter Hound' and 'His Majesty' which pulled 'Alexandra'. Their trade was finally taken away by H.C.Banham's motor-driven trip-boats 'Enterprise' and 'Perseverance'. The carriage of goods by river declined rather more slowly: the steam-barge 'Nancy' ceased trading in 1913, although H.C. Banham made a romantic effort to revive the business with his motor-barge 'Nancy II' in the 1930s. Two seam-tugs 'Olga' and 'Nellie' of King's Lynn continued taking 'gas water' from the Cambridge Gas Works to Lynn where it was used in the manufacture of fertilisers.

John Cross' business was bought by Foster's Bank and the two party boats were sold, the 'Victoria' to Winter's, the 'Prince Albert' to Thomas Askham. Both were probably broken up around 1910. Bill Leach remembered one of them: "As a boy I was taken aboard the 'Victoria' where it was used for a works outing of my grandfather's firm, F.R. Leach and Sons. Down the length of the cabin there ran a long, narrow table and fixed along either side were wooden seats. The cabin seemed rather gloomy and there was a lavatory of sorts under the stairs which gave access to the upper deck" [SCAN 102.61 – ADVERTISEMENT FOR RIVER TRIPS ON THE PRINCE ALBERT WHEN OWNED BY MRS HULM'S GRANDFATHER, THOMAS ASKHAM]

As for their figureheads; Bill said that the 'Victoria' is in the Cambridge Folk Museum, but he did not know what became of 'Prince Albert' – a military man in Huzzard's uniform. This is a mystery Joan can help solve. Thomas Askham was her grandfather and the family kept it as a souvenir of their river days. She has a photograph taken in the garden of the Abbey House in 1938 after it had just been given a fresh coat of paint. But where is it now? ARBURY MEMORIES

Joyce Loten from Arbury Road has lent me some pictures of a house near the corner of what is now Campkin Road that was home to Mr Sale, a nurseryman whose van I featured last week. One shows it in July 1959, the other as it was being demolished as part of the new Arbury estate in April 1961. [SCANS]

Colin Kidman, OBE, writes: "I was particularly interested in your reference to the Festival Theatre and the late Terrance Gray. After he purchased the theatre in the early twenties a great deal of building work was carried out by our family business (Kidman & Sons Ltd.) under Mr. Gray's personal supervision. As a result of this my late father, Albert, got to know him very well and, as he used to tell me, greatly admired his knowledge of the theatre world. Among the many improvements made was the construction at the back of the stage a full sized concave shaped wall called, I believe, a 'Cyclorama'. This, together with what was at that time a very updated and sophisticated electrical installation, produced special effects which reduced the need for differing back-cloths. I remember visiting the theatre once, soon after it re-opened. I confess, however that the choice of plays Mr. Gray favoured were better suited to an academic audience rather than the plebian tastes of Cambridge residents! The programmes had inner pages which were translucent so that they could be easily read in the darkened auditorium when held up to the stage lighting. Wouldn't be great if, like the theatre at Bury St. Edmunds, the Festival could be restored to its former glory?"

Memories 7th April 2005, by Mike Petty

With the news of an impending election in the offing Mrs Dawn Telfer of Cambridge has lent me a picture which might jog some memories. It shows a visit to the Houses of Parliament made by pupils of Coleridge School in 1947. The group was shown round by Leslie Symonds, the Cambridge Labour Member of Parliament who like his colleagues was sitting in the House of Lords as the Commons chamber was still being repaired following bomb damage during the war. Were you there too? [SCAN 104.08] How many of the present Commoners will be transferring to the upper house once the present campaign is decided?

Motoring memories have been flooding in.

Beth Lane from Ely e-mails: "What memories you are stirring up! The archaeological dig on the Arbury Road which I helped with as a teenager, Mr Leach of course and now Sergeant Holden, who taught me to drive. He must have been teaching for about three years when I went to him, I was 19 at the time. Neither my mother nor myself could drive, maybe because we had never had a car! We went everywhere on bicycles, but my Grandmother had died and left Mum and Dad with enough money to start a shop in Ely.

"We decided not to move until we knew whether the shop would be a success or not. Obviously we needed transport, so a car was bought. It was a maroon Morris Oxford and mum and I went for driving lessons. Mum went to the BSM but I went to Sgt Holden. What a lovely man; he is often in my thoughts while driving, I still hear his voice saying: 'Don't swerve - hit the dog, cat whatever, but don't swerve and cause a worse accident'.

"He must have been right in thinking that he could get pupils through the Driving Test in ten lessons because I passed in nine and with no previous experience. As we used to drive around Cambridge he would point out all the changes that he had made to road signs etc and explain why. He never raised his voice, never got excited or agitated, he was always cool, calm and collected and the perfect gentleman, getting out of the car to see you into your seat and closing the door for you. He even allowed mum to come with us for my lessons to help her too! I always considered it privilege to have known him and an honour to have been taught by him, I shall never forget him, I hope that he would still be proud of me and my driving.

Roy Johnson has other memories: "I was one of Sergeant Holden's learners. I remember one incident in the days when we had to give hand signals. We were going along Chesterton Road coming from the town and before the crossing to the footbridge he said: 'Don't forget your hand signals and put the gear into the middle and apply the hand brake' I did that all the same time. He looked at me and said 'Who the hell is driving the car!' I hadn't any hands on the steering wheel – I was thinking more about the hand signals and the gears"

Rodney Dale from Haddenham also has memories of his early driving days in 1951: "It was the Easter holidays, so I entered for a driving test and did a lot of driving in a 1923 Rover 8 car I called 'Lady C'. One evening I was visited by Mickey Mansfield and Ed Wilson. They wanted a ride in the Rover, so father came along to act as the Authorised Accompanist and Mickey and Ed sat in the dicky seat. The unladen weight of the car was only about 10 cwt, so the addition of two grown lads over the rear axle had a dramatically negative effect on the brakes which I didn't discover until trying to stop at the traffic lights in Chesterton Lane. I ran into the back of another car with a mighty 'wump'. Oddly enough, instead of getting out to see what had happened, the other driver sped away like a scalded cat - 'up to no good', we concluded.

"Lady C was making a tremendous noise because the engine hadn't stopped and father's sympathetic brake application had pushed a floorboard out which had jammed the clutch pedal down. We untangled the board and went home slowly; the offside end of the front axle was severely bent. Father took it to George Lister in Abbey Road, who straightened it for ten bob.

"Someone said that to facilitate passing the driving test it would be a good idea to have a driving lesson, because the instructors knew all about the routes used, the questions asked, and so on, so I went to Marshall's in Jesus Lane and booked a couple - 7/6d each. Mr Franklin of Marshalls - who later set up his own driving school in Tennis Court Road - took me round the test routes, and questioned me on the Highway Code. Came the day of the test. No examination before or since has worried me more - I couldn't eat a thing for lunch. Another adviser had suggested that it was good practice to book a test in the afternoon, in the hope that the tester himself had had a good lunch. It was at 2.30, and went like a dream - until, in Bateman Street, we did an emergency stop. That was all right, because when the tester looked behind, you knew that he was going to shout 'stop!' However: 'Reverse into there,' commanded Mr Langford, indicating St Eligius Street, which is very narrow. As I began the manoeuvre I noted that a dustcart was coming out, which rattled me. The hind wheel went up on the pavement, so I knew that I'd failed. 'Oh bugger - Sir' I shouted, because I knew I'd failed. 'Right,' he said, 'let's go back'. We did and he asked me some questions about the Highway Code. 'Thank you very much', he said, scribbling a bit of paper to say that I'd passed. It must have been because I'd called him Sir. They don't make tests like that these days." More of Rodney's recollection of vintage motoring can be found in his book 'Halcyon Days' (Fern House, 1999) [SCAN DALE 2 – 'LADY C BREAKS DOWN AT MILTON 1951'; OR DALE 3 – 'RODNEY DALE AND LADY C 1951']

The traffic lights at the bottom of Castle Hill were the first to be installed in Cambridge but it was a controversial decision. They were intended as a money-saving exercise: in March 1929 the cost of a policeman on point duty was about £400 a year and the signals, with purchase, would be about £200 with about £25 a year maintenance and repairs. But Alderman Pollock pointed out that they were in the wrong position and felt a better spot would have been at the junction of East Road and Mill Road. He was soon proved right; according to a report in the News of 30th April 1930 the average motorist heading towards Huntingdon and seeing the stiff climb ahead of him accelerated when the green light was showing in order to get through before it changes. But a driver coming down often found his car had a tendency to accelerate of its own and tried to get into Chesterton Lane a little too fast, swinging out into the standard erected in the centre of the road. Memories 13th April 2005, by Mike Petty

I had an interesting phone call Gerald Bailey from Wicken following my Memories article about the pleasure boats that used to visit the Five Miles from Anywhere, Upware.

It's an area Gerald has known for many years and he even remembers the wooden barges loaded with artificial manure from the fertiliser works at Burwell that would come down the Lodes to join the Cam at Upware. They were towed down to Kings Lynn where they would be unloaded but then continued out into the Wash where they would anchor and wait until the tide fell. Then the bargemen would start to work filling them up with sand. It would take two tides before they were fully loaded and were towed back to the Burwell works where the sand was mixed with the fertiliser.

These barges were a remnant of a major transport industry which had formerly carried out turf and sedge from the fens and corn grown on the higher lands around Burwell. Others brought in a variety of cargoes, from nails to garments, cheese to coal that were unloaded at the Commercial End at Swaffham Bulbeck.

Gerald recalls the barges that would be moored in the fen rivers two abreast to be filled with sugar beet. The crop was not weighed: they went by the loading line on the outside of the hull. One farmer was determined to get as much of his crop off to the factory at Ely as he could and ordered his men to continue loading until the barge was filled to the top. But the tug driver refused to tow it away as it was too heavy and he would be responsible if it sank. The farmer refused to unload, the tugman refused to take it away. It was a stand-off that lasted two weeks but the boatman was king and in the end the farmer had to back down. It was a hollow victory for soon the barges were replaced by lorries using the concrete road that had been laid during the Second World War as part of the massive campaign to bring the fens into cultivation for the first time. Now the only barges to be seen are likely to be carrying gault to repair the river banks. [SCAN 28.03 - BARGES AT THE ELY BEET FACTORY 1930S] [SCAN 59.187 RIVER BOARD TUG TOWING A LINE OF BARGES 1976]

But as Alan Bloom, whose death was announced last week, recorded there was one cargo that was infinitely more precious. Writing in his book 'The Farm in the Fens' he recalls how in 1942 two Catchment Board barges moored near the Cock-Up Bridge were cleaned out, steps cut in the steep Lode banks and work had to be rescheduled so that the Land Army Girls were employed nearer the river. They were inspecting visitors.

"Every minute or two we would climb up the Lode bank to see if the party had embarked on the barge at Cock-Up. No one showed any excitement except in the stilted conversation. There had been scarcely time to get either excited or nervous. Then we heard the tug start, and out of the mizzle came the shape of the barges, alive it seemed with people. Our little group, due for presentation, shuffled into position as if we were about to face a firing squad. Within a few minutes the black soil was being trodden down by scores of feet."

The arrival of the King and Queen, together with the Minister of Agriculture, Duke of Norfolk and dozens of pressmen suddenly changed the scene from sullen bleakness to life and bustle. “Tractors roared up and showed what really went on when there was no thought of Royalty or of recognition. Land girls from Manchester showed that they knew how to dig round bog oak and drive Fordsons. Stolid fenmen down in the slub of a six-foot dyke grinned and tried hard to speak King's English when spoken to. Nothing like it had ever happened before and was not likely to again in their lifetime.

“In twenty minutes the Royal Party were on their way back up to Cock- Up Bridge, and by the time I got back there, they were saying good-bye to their hosts, the chairman and other members of the War Agricultural Executive Committee”.

But not all had gone smoothly: “Something had gone wrong with the arrangements I had made with Sid King, the foreman. He was in evidence, cap well over one eye, but our own work people, who at this time should have been lining the ditch banks and cheering, were still at work. I felt like shouting to them, but realised that they had not been told and some of them wouldn't even know now that it was the King and Queen. There would be a grouse about this when they did know! Olive Osborne from Comberton writes: “The story and picture of Mr Arthur Askam of Abbey House Cambridge brings back memories to me. We lived in the Hare and Hounds public house in Newmarket Road, near East Road corner, from 1932 to 1934. My father, James Blundell, was landlord and Mr Askam visited us as a customer, enjoying a drink and chatting to him. He mentioned that Abbey House was haunted and one day invited us to visit him there. We entered a large room overlooking the front garden; he sat by a huge fireplace and eventually pointed to a door leading to the stairs, telling us there was a ghost up there. We looked in but didn't go up. Mr Askam gave my elder brother a two-shilling piece to spend over the road at Dodd's grocery shop. We bought a bright green round tin full of toffees – what a treat! Memories 20th April 2005, by Mike Petty

The issue of public transport is one that seems always to be in the news. However just 100 years ago Cambridge seemed to have found a solution with the arrival of the motor bus.

The old horse-drawn bus had failed the previous year leaving the field free for the Cambridge Street Tramways Company with their horse-drawn trams. But motor buses were beginning to mask their presence felt with two of the London bus companies adopting motor traction in the capital.

Then in March 1905 came the exciting news that a company was being formed to provide a service of motor buses for Cambridge. They would run a 15-minute service from Chesterton, another from the Huntingdon Road district to the centre of town and a seven minutes' service from the Market Hill to the railway station. Should the venture prove successful the more outlying districts such as Newnham Croft and Cherry Hinton would be catered for. By April 1905 the Cambridge Motor Omnibus Company was in business.

But Cambridge being Cambridge it was not going to be that straightforward and almost immediately came news of a competitor, this one called the Cambridge University and Town Motor Omnibus Company. They had a problem: owing to the boom in buses there was difficulty in securing these vehicles but they had five chassis (the working parts) and the coachwork was being pushed forward as quickly as possible

There were two makes of bus; the Cambridge Motor Company chose a Thorneycroft which would accommodate 32 passengers, 14 inside and 18 out. Its body was painted dark blue (the colours of Oxford) with yellow decoration. The 'University' had a Cambridge-blue Straker-Squire; it would carry 36 passengers at an incredible 16 mph. Both were driven by petrol, had non-slipping tyres and were upholstered with spring cushions inside and seats like light garden chairs on the upper deck.

Both had to submit to trials before they could be licensed and both were eminently successful. The Thorneycroft's hill-climbing capacities were tested on Castle Hill which seemed to present no difficulties except a decrease in speed; the Straker-Squire passed with the greatest ease. Both naturally created somewhat of a sensation in the streets and the way they threaded their way in and out of the busy traffic excited much admiration. They were under perfect control and could pass through traffic where a horsed vehicle would have to wait its turn.

Both Cambridge buses started to ply for hire on Saturday the 15th April 1905 and the novelty induced people to make trips. Had several more 'buses been running they would have been crowded. The scene on Market Hill was unprecedented. Apart from those who lined one pavement in the hope of obtaining a seat it was alive with folk who were content with watching. As soon as a vehicle drew up a crowd swarmed around the steps, clutching the handrail and endeavouring to get a foothold on the step. Each time there were many left waiting on the pavement disappointed and most waited until it returned; some 2,000 people travelled on that first day the paper reported.

Very soon the University and Town Company turned to the commuter market with a service aimed at those Chesterton residents who needed to catch the early train to London. A bus left Old Chesterton Green at 8.25 am and ran through to the station in time to allow passengers to catch the 8.53 train. They also introduced other special services to allow people who worked in Cambridge to get to and from Chesterton for their midday meal

When the undergraduates returned after Easter they were amazed at what they found and recorded their excitement in verse:

“Oh, who will not go for a roar and a blow to the station and back to the Square
On one of the two apparitions in blue that the Vac has evolved for us there?
Oh, who would not rush in the Saturday crush for joy of a ride on the top.
Or quiver with pride - and the engine - inside, at the snort and the start and the stop”

But the undergraduate poet soon saw the problems: Petty Cury was too narrow for them

"Amazes the eyes the Gargantuan size, amazes the hooter the sense,
As swoops on its way in despotic array the Triton of traffic immense
In sooth but a few will remain in the Cury at hearing the omnibus roar
There cannot be space in that limited place for the monster and anything more"

And the double-decker bus gave unprecedented views into undergraduate rooms:

“Oh, bring up your ‘brown’ for a tour of the town, from nine in the morning till ten.
This way for a new and sensational view of Christ's and Emmanuel men!
The rooms where they keep, how they look as they sleep, the muffins for tea that they buy.
The bridge that they play and the rent that they pay, you can see all the lot from on high!”

They even foresaw the environmental consequences as the buses filled the streets and the snort of the engine was everywhere

“But a Stygian gloom will assuredly loom on the brow of the lover of peace,
That another new noise should detract from the joys that for ever and ever decrease;
And loud is the wail of the bike and the trailer and trap as they scatter afar
To left and right in discomfited flight at the voice of the God in the Car”

Within a couple of days of its arrival the new Cambridge buses experienced their first small accident. The ‘University’ bus was drawing up close to the kerb in St Andrew’s Street in order to take on a passenger when the camber of the road caused it to tilt and the top of the bus hit a street lamp which projected over the road. The top of the lamp was bent and a pane of glass smashed. This incident was captured by a cartoonist, Frank Keene and was issued as a postcard.

But others did not see the funny side. The ‘University’ bus was banned following a fatal accident when its conductor fell off the footplate into the road and was run over by the bus. The Cambridge Motor Omnibus lasted a bit longer before it too was forced off the road – it had been involved in too many small accidents and filled the streets with black exhaust smoke.

So the slow, safe and solid trams reigned supreme once more. Their triumph was short-lived. In 1907 came another bus Company - the Ortona - whose descendants still ply the Cambridge streets.

Memories 27th April 2005, by Mike Petty

Whilst the work of many of the wartime services has been well-documented, relatively little seems to have been recorded of the activities of the Police War Reserves. Aviation expert Michael Bowyer was speaking at one meeting when he mentioned a bombing raid on Cambridge in which a woman had been trapped in the rubble. Amongst those in the audience was a policeman who had helped to rescue her!

That gentleman might be amongst those depicted on a photograph of the Cambridge Police War Reservists that has been lent me by Marion and Alec Lant of Landbeach. It was taken by Stearns in 1945 and has a list of names of the men posing. Amongst them are those of Cudworth, Haddock, Hullock, Bradford, Peck and Pigott together with Chief Constable B.N. Bebbington and Superintendent A.E. Lilley to whom the picture was presented. [SCAN 1044.42 CAMBRIDGE POLICE WAR RESERVISTS – USE LARGE]

One village policeman was William Lythell from Stretham. He had been recruited one Saturday in 1939 as he left the football ground. The village bobby, P.C. Boulton told him, "I've got to get someone from Stretham to act as a War Reserve Policeman if war breaks out and you're just the chap for the job". Will passed it off saying "I wouldn't be much good at it" and it didn't enter his mind again until September 3rd 1939.

It was Sunday and he had just sat down to his dinner with his family when the policeman came to his house saying: "You've to report to Ely at once". So Will set off for Ely on his bike. There he was fitted up with a uniform and returned home with orders to be back at seven o'clock. He reported to Ely Police Station in good time and was on the beat in Lynn Road punctually at seven. "I felt everyone was looking at me", he recalled

As he passed the neighbouring houses one woman asked him, "Is my blackout alright?" Looking at it carefully he said, "Well there's a little glimmer of light showing in the bottom left-hand corner". Another woman asked, "What about mine?" and he noted, "That seems perfect" whereupon she commented, "Good, but of course, I haven't switched the light on yet!"

As time went on Will grew more accustomed to officialdom and he and other War Reserves were welcomed and advised by the regular members of the Force. Much of the work was routine, walking the beat in the village, riding his bike to meet colleagues at parish boundaries and duty at Ely.

Warnings of air-raids saw him on the streets, too, and on one occasion, when bombs were heard falling, albeit in the distance, one frightened Stretham woman confided afterwards, "I was really scared until I saw the policeman, then I knew I was safe!"

Although Will had many memories he was reluctant to talk of official duties but did recall one incident when armed with only a truncheon he was put in charge of a German pilot whose plane had been shot down. When he was relieved it was by an armed guard! Later, after the war, Bill had the task of guarding a dinosaur – or at least the fossilised remains of one that were discovered in a pit at the edge of the village. Despite his best endeavours some of the bits were liberated by inquisitive schoolboys! [SCAN SP 358- BILL LYTHELL GUARDING THE STRETHAM DINOSAUR 1952]

There must be other tales of policing either during the war or in the 1950s – please share them.

Miss Pamela Habgood of Waterbeach writes: "I was thrilled to see the picture of the Coleridge School political tour in Memories on April 6th. I remember the day so well and saw myself and two members of staff in the picture. Leslie Symonds M.P. was an excellent guide and the girls were most interested in the tour. On the way home we stopped the coaches for a while and the girls found a stall selling pomegranates, a totally new fruit to them, and they sucked away with great appreciation. It brought back so many memories of happy days in Coleridge School where discipline was strict and staff and pupils treated each other with mutual respect. Of course not all pupils were perfect and in most classes one could find an occasional 'class jester' who could be guilty of some minor disruption. But Coleridge was a most happy and purposeful community with an excellent record in sport and academic achievement. [SCAN 104.08 - COLERIDGE SCHOOL TRIP TO PARLIAMENT 1947]

D. Kiddy of Stradishall has been able to supply more details of a photograph featured a few weeks ago. It was taken as part of the Cambridge Antiquarian Society's photographic survey in 1928 and shows his father, Bill, uncle Jack and his two brothers, Jim and 16-year old Bill with Kit, a flea-bit grey horse. Kit was an exceptional horse who was driven by word of mouth, (no reins) and was always the lead horse. She was put down in 1936 when seven years old. The vehicle shown is a timber carriage that still survives. His father went into farming in 1913 and built up a business as a timber hauler until retiring in 1934. Then the four horses and carts went to work building the RAF station at Stradishall. [SCAN 10131- THE KIDDY FAMILY AND THEIR HORSES, TAKEN AT HORSEHEATH 1934]

Roy Chamberlain from Foxton recalls: "I took a motor cycle driving test in 1936; it was centred on the Cambridge market square and surrounding roads. The examiner told me the route to be taken and he walked or ran around the various viewing points to see how I managed the roads and corners. He also gave me an oral test on motor cycle and road laws. I passed o.k. The next year I learnt to drive a car, but did not have a test as the motor cycle licence covered it in those days. The car I started in was a 'special' as it had been adapted for my father who had lost his right leg in the 1914-18 war. It had two foot pedals, the left side for the accelerator, the other for the clutch and foot brake. You depressed the pedal a short way for the clutch and further down for the foot brake. It was converted by Mr Arch Hale of Melbourn garage."

Sue Dooley from Shefford has sent me copies of some interesting pictures of Cherry Hinton one of which seems to show some sort of fairground amusements standing in the street. She knows little about it and neither do I. Can you tell us more? Her grandparents Arthur and Ada Gladys Thompson kept a diary in Brookfields and every year gave their customers a calendar and a little pot of cream. Memories 4th May 2005, by Mike Petty

Whilst on a walk one evening last week I was intrigued to see one of the 'Vote for Me' signs on its wooden post being carried into a hedge in the field at the back of the village church. Soon a number of young gentlemen and one smart young lady were making their way through the crops towards it. But any thoughts of a political rally were soon dispelled as a wisp of bonfire smoke drifted away from what the youngsters believed to be their secret lair. Whatever passions were being inflamed or issues debated they were not political!

But what happens to all those election posters once the votes are finally counted. The issue is not a new one. Old photographs show similar posters plastered over buildings, but perhaps the most extreme example was that in Cambridge's Petty Cury during the county election of 1874. The whole of the front of the Lion Hotel was completely covered with signs urging 'Vote for Powell' which had to be removed once the election was over. Nor was this the only sign of campaigning – almost every dead wall, barn and public house proclaimed his name. [SCAN 10380 – ELECTION POSTERS ON WALL AT DRY DRAYTON 1929 - SCAN 104.46 – ELECTION POSTERS ON LION HOTEL PETTY CURY 1874]

Elections in Victorian times were more boisterous than those today with regular complaints of voting irregularity and bribing whilst successful candidates were carried shoulder-height through streets decorated with bunting, accompanied by a band of music. [SCAN 104.47 – ELECTION SCENE IN SIDNEY STREET 1830]

In 1910 one meeting in West Cambridgeshire was broken up by hecklers and the candidate's wife was hit by eggs and stones whilst in Cambridge women's suffrage was an important issue. Once the votes are cast crowds gather to await the declaration of the poll - as on Cambridge Market Hill in 1976 [SCAN 104.45 – CROWDS AWAIT ELECTION RESULT ON MARKET HILL 1976]. But not all winning candidates are popular with everybody.

Charles Henry Cooper in his 'Annals of Cambridge' reports what happened back in 1774: After the declaration was made the mob became exceedingly furious. The friends of the successful candidates were received with hissing. A load of beer soon afterwards appeared on Market Hill, when the populace, understanding that it was sent in the interest of the winning candidates, seized it, broke open the casks and let the beer run out. Then as the Members with their friends were returning from the Shire Hall (on the site of the present Guildhall) to the Rose (in Rose Crescent), under the protection of constables and others, pelted them with barrel staves and burnt the beer cart. But two loads of beer which appeared later on the hill, provided by the friends of the losing candidates, were drunk with cheers

Compared to that the events of last week seem positively tame!

VE AND WARTIME MEMORIES

Amongst all the celebrations of VE Day last weekend was an exhibition at Horningsea Church on Sunday afternoon with a series of short talks by people who remembered what happened locally. The centrepiece of the display was be a copy of the church register in which the Vicar recorded not only births, deaths and marriages but also other items of interest. He noted bombing raids, plane crashes, frost with ice thick as a penny – on 11th June 1942 – and flying bombs falling near West Wrattling in July 1944. Some of his random jottings include for 1st August 1943: "Very small congregation. Bomb in fen let off by our men killed cattle. Raid on Monday shrapnel fell in village. Mussolini deposed and the end of Fascism in Italy" On 4th July 1944 he recorded: "Cold weather back again. Part of an ammunition train blew up at Soham, two men died. Caught 38 jackdaws in a trap"

Christine Green from Comberton has responded to my appeal for memories of War Reservecemen; she tells me that her father Leonard Colpus was one and recalls some of the amusing incidents he would tell her.

She writes: "There was a lot said about the one legged Irishman who was always causing trouble. He would be taken in the police car 'over the border' and left in Newmarket. Each time the policeman got back to Cambridge, they always found that he was back into the county before them.

"Then there was the lady who lived in the next road to us. Dad was called out on several occasions to take her home after she went out riding her horse without her clothes on yet again! He also mentioned the two well built nuns who regularly went over to the continent. Eventually they aroused suspicion and it was found that they were really two men with yards of expensive silk wound around their bodies.

"Dad did traffic duties in various places and was also on our local beat. I was always so proud of my father when he did traffic duty outside my school and I would leave the playground and go and stand in the middle of the road with him. No one seemed to mind. Definitely not allowed now.

Dad was also a member of the A.R.P. and he and my Granddad spent many hours with their colleagues (and their bottles of beer) in their post on the Recreation ground off the Richmond Road. All the policemen at that time seemed to be able to get a drink out of hours. He said they would go to a pub, check that last orders were carried out and when the customers had gone the landlord would lock up and the policemen would be invited into the back room for a pint or two. He seemed to know most of the landlords in Cambridge indeed several of the war reserves went on to become landlords when they had finished their war time service."

Memories 18th May 2005 by Mike Petty

When I was a lad we in Stretham had a man who came to deliver the milk, but he did not come with an electric float, he came with a horse and milk cart. Then in November 1971 Geoff Beasley retired after 42 years, and so did his black pony, Jenny. She was an important part of the team, she knew when to pull the cart further down the road, but also knew at which houses she would be rewarded with sugar – and would then refuse to go on until she received some. Now such clever transport has it seems passed into the history books. [I WILL CHECK FOR PICTURES ACCOMPANYING CEN ARTICLE 10 NOV 1971]

But it was not just milk that came by horse, coal did too and in Orwell the tradition of horse drawn deliveries continued into the 1990s thanks to a local man.

Alan Neaves was born in the village in 1943 but as a lad spent much of his time out in the fields with men and horses at his grandfather's farm at Chatteris. Back home in Orwell he worked from the age of ten as 'Saturday boy' for Arnold Brothers, the only local farmers who still used horses. After leaving school at fifteen Alan continued working full-time with their Shires. Then in 1967 he took over a coal round and decided to use horsepower for his local deliveries; this he did until 1993 when his last horse, Captain, retired. [I WILL CHECK FOR CEN ARTICLE AND PHOTOS ABOUT ALAN AND HIS COAL ROUND]

Now Alan's experiences of working with horse have been captured on video, sharing anecdotes from the people he worked with, passing down the wisdom – and the tricks of the trade - of past generations when the horse was a vital part of life. [SCAN OF HORSES AT WORK NEAR ELY 1970 – DO NOT BE SPECIFIC ABOUT WHAT THEY'RE DOING]

The film has been made by Neil Lanham from Helions Bumpstead who has been recording memories of Suffolk county life for many years, amassing a rich archive of sound and video tapes. But now he's branching out over the border and is anxious to speak to men and women who have a tale to tell or an ear for country sayings. If you know somebody who fits the bill then contact Neil at 'Ivy Todd', Helions Bumpstead, Haverhill, CB9 7AT or see his website www.traditionsofsuffolk.com. Eileen Waller who now lives in Impington has sent a photograph which captures an often forgotten part of wartime life. In those days her family lived in Burwell, where the Manor House became a convalescent hospital for seriously burned servicemen from the RAF Hospital at Ely, before going on to have radical plastic surgery. Eileen recalls:

“My mother, Eileen Adams and Aunty Daisy used to help Mrs O’Callaghan at the Manor House and became members of the WVS (Women’s Voluntary Services). They helped to run a ‘Busy Bees Club’, giving support to evacuee families in the village. The club was formed in April 1941, Mum was the secretary, and it initially served cups of tea each afternoon, except Wednesday at the Congregational Schoolroom. With the WVS they also spent a lot of time knitting socks and gloves for the servicemen. By January 1943 the Burwell group had made 18 sniper suits, six sweaters for the Merchant Navy, 44 pairs of Special Slippers and 24 Surgical Mittens. We have vague recollections of my uncle, from Sheerness in Kent, being able to obtain herring roes that he sent up to the manor house for the benefit of the patients”

Eileen can put many names to the faces including Margaret O’Callaghan in the centre of the front row; Eileen herself is the little girl with the bow two from the right with her mum behind her on the left. She’s less sure as to the identity of the two WVS ladies but thinks they may be Mrs Tharp from Chippenham and possibly a Mrs Wostendale. Can you put her mind at rest.

The photograph was taken by Albert Grainger at rear of the Congregational Chapel Hall in Burwell. [SCAN 104.52 OF BURWELL BUSY BEES CLUB]

Eileen would also like information on a Hurricane which crashed in Burwell during the war. She recalls: “I can remember quite clearly going to see the wreckage and the deep depression in the ground for a long time afterwards. I have always understood that my mother (Eileen Adams) was first at the scene with the local chimney sweep Stan Faircliffe. Mum was collecting with a house to house collection in the Mandeville area when she saw it come down and she ran over the fields with Mr Faircliffe. As we were very young she did not ever spoke to us about the crash.”

Mrs. R.J. Rowlinson 56 Metcalfe Road, Cambridge writes to say she was very interested in photograph of the Cambridge Police War Reserves (Memories 27th April). It shows he father, Mr. Jack Tooke, fifth from the left on the second row from the back. He joined the War Reserves for some time and eventually enlisted as a regular Police Officer. He was one of the first Officers to join the Vespa motor scooter patrols and was later transferred to Panda Cars. His main beat was in the Chesterton area. After his retirement he served for a few years in a civilian capacity in the C.I.D. at Parkside Station. He enjoyed his time in the Police very much and was a keen member of the Police Fishing Club. Ken Saunders e-mails from Newmarket following the photograph of the Ramsden Square wardens (Memories 11th May); he writes: “The man on the front row, third from the left, is my late father, Richard 'Dick' Saunders. I well remember Mr. Winkworth, in the white helmet next to my father, as he used to visit our house on occasions and cut my fathers' and my own hair. Cyril Ryder, known as 'King Pin', was employed for a time after the war at the Cambridge University. Engineering Laboratory, where I was working as an apprentice. Coincidentally, before and after the war, my father was employed by the Cambridge Express Printing Company in King Street, which was run by George and Leonard Colpus, who appear in the other photograph.” [SCAN 104.48 THE RAMSDEN SQUARE WARDENS]

Memories 25th May 2005, by Mike Petty

I am always grateful when readers send or lend me items for ‘Memories’.

Last week I received a collection of colour transparencies, which had been rescued from destruction, though sadly nobody seems quite sure who took them.

They include several taken in and around Chesterton during the mid 1960s. Amongst them are a view of Union Lane snapped on 25th September 1965 with a Mr Miller at the corner [SCAN 104.70] whilst another from May 1970 shows the Prince Albert public house [SCAN 104.71] and a third shows the former Baptist Chapel in Church Street in January 1968 [SCAN 104.72]

But one slide in particular caught my attention. It shows a large house of varying dates and additions on the corner of High Street and Chapel Street. When our mystery photographer snapped it on a snowy day in December 1967 it was home to a shoe repairer. [SCAN 104.74] But the scene rang a bell – it was a view I’d seen before.

So I turned to another batch of photographs taken by a professional photographer, Bryan Manning of Glenacre Close Cambridge, which he had given me a few weeks ago. And there is the same building from the same angle with what appears to be the same snow. But looking again there are differences – a telephone box has gone, a chimney stack has been removed and in Bryan’s picture it was occupied by Hallen’s Motor Cycles. [SCAN 104.77]

Several of Bryan’s other photographs show window displays at Laurie and McConnal, the much-loved store in Fitzroy Street [SCAN ‘FASHION’ – LADIES’ RAINWARE]. But another shows the sad sight of those windows closed and boarded-up in 1978 as beyond the builders prepare for the construction of the Grafton Centre. [SCAN 104.75]

And this is where a third co-incidence comes into play.

Beth Lane of Ely has also been busy sorting out her files and has lent me a number of invoices from the 1930s, including several bills from Laurie’s which include a picture of the shop in more thriving days. [SCAN 104.78]

Beth’s collection also contains a bill for a wardrobe (price £4) from Robert Sayle in July 1933. [SCAN 104.79]. There on the top is a sketch of the shopfront in St Andrew’s Street, then thriving but now derelict as once again the developers move in to create a new shopping area, this time the Grand Arcade.

Sayle’s have moved across to Burleigh Street while work progresses, occupying the site of the old Co-op and – almost inevitably – Bryan has a photograph of it taken in the 1970s. [SCAN 104.76].

Does any of this ring a bell – if so let me know.

If you have old transparencies or snaps of Cambridgeshire scenes I should be pleased to see them – you might have been standing at the same spot taking the same view as another News reader!

Memories 1st June 2005, by Mike Petty

Mrs Penrose Green from Girton has contacted me following a mention of an undergraduate who was struck by lightning during the May races in 1892. She writes: "My father J.V. Hammond who was 'up' then & stroked the Selwyn 1st boat was a witness of the occasion. The victim was hit quite near by but apparently had no sign of damage except for a burn on his heels. I was glad it missed my father or I should not be here", she adds.

Not everybody has been quite so lucky, as stories in the back issues of Cambridge newspapers have reported over the years. In October 1897 A little girl, aged nine, was killed by lightning while sitting at tea in her home at Great Paxton, near St Neots. Her little brother was also knocked down and rendered unconscious. His body was marked with the complete outline of a tree, the branches being shown distinctly.

July 1900 a party of four men were carting hay from a field in Bannald's Drove, Waterbeach when a heavy storm accompanied by thunder and lightning compelled them to seek shelter. Three of them crept underneath the cart, the fourth remained on top holding his pitchfork which was struck by lightning. 'The fork acted as a conductor to his body, through which the electric fluid passed, finally losing itself in the earth where the three men were crouching' the paper reported. One man was killed and the others badly injured. [SCAN 979 – A HARVEST SCENE – HILDERSHAM 1891] One Great Wilbraham lady had a lucky escape during that storm: 'Mrs Morley was at her wit's end and sat upon the side of her bed and watched the vivid lightning with bated breath. Then came a flash that rendered her well-nigh unconscious & the room was enveloped in flames. In an adjoining room slept some children from an orphanage in London who were rescued with difficulty. The alarm was raised and soon there were upwards of 200 men, women & children on the spot and everything of any value was saved. Only the chimney and portions of the walls of the house remain to testify to the havoc wrought by the storm'. [SCAN 10139 – GREAT WILBRAHAM 1929– NB NOT THE HOUSE STRUCK]

In August 1901 the News described how: 'The usually quiet village of Hemingford Abbots was the scene of a very sad occurrence from the effects of a heavy thunderstorm. A farmer and his sons were engaged on the land and determined to return home to dinner. The farmer and one son took a shorter route across the fields, leaving a married son to bring two horses round by the roadway. Nothing being heard the farmer found one of the horses on its haunches and the other lying in the ditch. Near by was his son, also dead. It was found the lightning had struck the man on the side of his head. The other horse had to be destroyed.'

During August 1904 a spell of hot weather was followed by thunderstorms. At Needlingworth James Allgood's cottage was struck by lightning, bursting the wall open. The current passed through the bedroom and descended to the room underneath where Mr Allgood was sitting opposite the door. He was struck senseless. His wife was sitting near the window at the sewing machine wearing a steel thimble on her finger. She was struck on the right side and at first it was thought the shock had killed her. Both were put to bed and were progressing favourably, readers were informed.

But one man was either particularly lucky, or unlucky, depending on your point of view. For in August 1923 the News reported that Mr James Tuck of Ely had been struck by lightning twice. In 1914 he was putting hay into an elevator at Chettisham when there was a vivid flash of lightning and the fork he was holding was torn from his hands. The lightning scorched his face and left red marks of a zig-zag shape on his arm. Doctors were astonished that he recovered. Then in 1923 he was driving some pigs when suddenly there was a vivid flash of lightning and he was stuck to the ground in a dazed condition. With the exception of a headache he was little worse for his experience.

Nor are such stories limited to the earlier years of the century; in April 1979 lightning caused thousands of pounds worth of damage at Pidley when it hit a tree. The blast shattered dozens of windows in nine cottages and blew in a cottage door. A young man working near a dike was thrown into the water by the shock and children coming home from school had a narrow escape as the flash struck only yards from the bus shelter where their coach stopped seconds later. The Mad Cat public house was among the buildings damaged when most of the front windows were smashed

It seems ironic when churches are damaged by such Acts of God. In June 1900 the steeple of Lt Staughton church was demolished by lightning. The ruins fell in the belfry, and caused great damage. February 1928 saw lightning struck the church at Takeley and set the old building on fire; flames which could be seen for miles around shot out from the steeple on which the cross had been struck, with the lead running down the sides of the roof. Crowds of villages watched from the churchyard. Fen Drayton church spire was struck by lightning in September 1929 with stones crashing down on to a grave in the churchyard. More debris fell in Church Street or was hurled into Mr E.J. Warboy's premises on the opposite side of the road. Thomas Johnson had a lucky escape; he had been giving a little girl a ride on his bicycle and had alighted at his father's house when the lightning struck; they managed to get inside as the stones rained down. [SCAN 86.539 – FEN DRAYTON CHURCH SPIRE 1890S]

One other incident that comes to mind was in 1958 when Reach church was severely damaged. [SCAN 10349 – REACH CHURCH 1938]. There must be more – and do you have memories of lightning strikes – write to Mike Petty at the News

Not all church are ancient stone-built affairs; Michael Kenelly from March would like details of the “tin-tabernacles” – corrugated-iron buildings that were erected at the turn of the century. He is researching the story of March High School for Girls which started life in one such temporary building off Station Road in 1905 before moving to County Road in 1908. Parts of the old structure were later shipped to Christchurch but nobody seems to have any details.

My researches show that something similar was erected by the London Evangelistic Mission in Stretham in January 1884. It was designed by a London architect. The interior walls were lined with wood & included a coffee room and lavatory. It was subsequently sold and re-erected on the corner of Brays Lane Ely for the use of the St John Ambulance Brigade. Another may have been Stetchworth gospel hall, an iron building with 400 sittings which was registered for Congregational use in 1885 and was demolished by 1961. Do you know of others? Memories 8th June 2005, by Mike Petty

I have quite a collection of Cd-Roms and DVDs – those circular disks like silver gramophone records. In fact last week I acquired three more of them; one came free with the Saturday newspaper, one came free with a book on Melbourn and the third I bought.

The one with the paper was an old movie, the one with the book included an even older movie and the CD-Rom I purchased was a list of people in my village 144 years ago

In 1861 the Census officials were making their ten-year survey of the country, walking down each street and recording the names and details of the people living in each house. They meticulously recorded how David Sennitt, a wheelwright aged 36 was living with his wife Martha and their two children, a nephew and niece; how the Rector had four servants and Matthew Jackson was living in a barn. They listed the butchers and bakers, pig jobbers and castrators, railway workers and paupers, ministers and schoolteachers compiling complete a picture as possible of the community at that time. All this might be expected but there is at least one mystery-man: William Bates aged 29 who was living with his wife and two children gives his occupation as ‘Retired Gold Miner’; his three-year-old son George had been born in Victoria, Australia – something else to be explored!

Given the amount of information on just this one parish it made my purchase worthwhile. Except that I didn’t just get this list for my village; I got it for Abington and Ashley, Melbourn and Milton, Pampisford and Parson Drove, Sawston and Shelford, Tadlow and Teversham, Waterbeach and Willingham – in fact everywhere in the old counties of Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely. Except for Ely and Tydd St Giles – somebody had got there first and run off with the records!

But all the rest have now been carefully transcribed and digitised by members of the Cambridgeshire Family History Society who have already completed the censuses for 1841 and 1851. They are each available for £30 plus 80p postage; contact Carol Noble at 22 St Margarets Road, Girton CB3 0LT or e-mail carol.noble@ntlworld.com.

The Melbourn DVD doesn’t have such lists of names and addresses. Instead it opens up with an old cine projector showing a grainy film of the village in the 1930s in which people act-up in front of the camera, winking and tipping over their barrow-loads of furniture until reprimanded by the bobby. But a click on the mouse replaces the moving images with a series of old photographs of the village, revealing a place at once familiar and strange – and there is more. For the disk also includes a recording of local residents chatting about times gone by – the old nicknames, street lights, entertainment, shops and who sold paraffin.

All this is fine for people with computers and time to sit and click. But you can’t look at it in the bath or flick through it like you can with a book. But there is a book as well – a massive 260-pages on farming, industry, housing, water supply, loos, crime, wars and riots. The text has been researched and written by a dedicated team of Melbourn local historians who have scoured libraries, museums and archives as well as investigating the history literally beneath their feet – the archaeological record.

But for me one of the most compelling sections are those reminiscences of village folk, whose experiences could be echoed in villages elsewhere, like mine.

Peggy Abrey recalls: “My grandfather, Harry Robinson, owned the tailor’s shop. He had three sons who worked with him, making and repairing garments for all the villages in the area. The cloth was ordered from London and came by train to Meldreth station. The tailors sat cross-legged on a large table and stitched the fabric by hand. The irons for pressing were heated on a stove in the corner of the room. Easter was the busiest time as everyone had new clothes then. It was a great event when a boy had his first pair of long trousers”

Norah Cane remembers: "At school I learned cookery and needlework while the boys did woodwork. We didn't make whole garments as cloth was too expensive. Mother had a sewing machine and was able to make clothes for us, often from cut-down garments. We belonged to a clothing club and were able to have some clothes from there"

Violet Harper: "My mother used to buy 'Beehive' wool to knit our socks from Miss Pryor who lived at Crossways. In the room to the right of the front door she had a shop where she sold books, stationery, wool and haberdashery and thimbles. The fish shop was owned by 'Fessor Hinkins, he was also the chimney sweep and sold ice cream and it was not unusual for him to be seen using the same barrow for his brushes and soot as he did for the fish he collected from the railway station"

Bob Wedd remembers: "We were taken to school at Melbourn in an old Ford van driven by Len Smith. He kept pigs in an orchard and, as I was one of the first out of school, I would go along to help clean out the van from carrying the pigs and put the side benches back in. If you looked closely at the van you could faintly see 'Salvation Army' on the side."

With the support of The Local Heritage Initiative this wonderful record is being supplied free of charge to every household in the village. Any extra copies are available for sale for £8 from the Melbourn Village History Group. Contact Colin Limming on 01763 260072 or e-mail:colin.limming@ukonline.co.uk. But be warned: this is not a light-weight item and will never fit through your letterbox even if you can afford the postage.

As for that DVD of the old movie – I'll have no time to watch that now!

Memories14th June 2005 by Mike Petty

Andrew Westwood-Bate from Balsham has occasion to remember the date of the 16th June. For on that day in 1965 – 40 years ago – he was at his desk at Abington School when the bell went for lunch. As he trooped to the dining room he heard a terrific bang

An articulated lorry had failed to negotiate the bend into the village, ploughed through the wire fence & landed on its side in the front playground. It rested against the wall of the classroom a brick away from where Andrew had been sitting minutes earlier. "God was certainly with us that day, a few inches & a few minutes either side & it could have been a completely different story", he recalls. The lesson was learnt & within a few years the Abington bypass was built & huge steel barriers put up in front of the school.

But was this what drove the Cutters away? Jennifer Hirsh says there were dozens of them in the Abington parish records over the centuries starting in 1748 when Ishmael Cutter married Ann Andrews. In the second half of the 19th century Cutter was almost the commonest surname in the village. Now they've all gone. But Abington History Group is keen to get them back – at least for a day. They would like to invite any members of the family or their descendants to a Cutter Family Day in the Abington Village Institute on the afternoon of Sunday 26th June. So put a note in your diary and prepare for a grand reunion. They would love to meet you. For further details phone Jennifer on 01223 893352

And do you know anything about the Mansfield family?

Bridget Burrows is researching the story of Mansfield Almshouses at 21 Church Street Chesterton. She has delved into material in the Cambridgeshire Collection, County Record Office and at the Cambridge United Charities to discover that the four houses were founded in October 1891 and were for "women over 60 on modest incomes" who lived rent-free. But little else is known about their history before the 1950s.

The adjoining three houses, numbers 15-17, were also owned by Stephen Mansfield and their rents represented the sole income of the Charity which had to be used for the maintenance and repair of the almshouses. They were sold in 1995 to the English Churches Group but the almshouses are still owned by the Charity and for the last couple of years been managed by King Street Housing Association. In 1987 they were completely renovated with two more houses being built to the rear.

But who was Stephen Mansfield? Bridget has found little clues except that in 1937 the Trustees included Mr. A C Mansfield and Mr W S Mansfield who may have been his sons or grandsons. She writes: "Any help you can give would be very much appreciated, as I would love to find out more, and feel saddened that this individual who is responsible for these beautiful almshouses seems to have disappeared from history."

My own researches show that in 1881 a Stephen Mansfield, a draper and oil merchant who had been born in Chesterton was living in Harvey Road Cambridge. He had a son Alfred C. Mansfield who followed him into the drapery business. By 1888 Stephen was living in a large house called 'Gilmerton' at the junction of Long Road and Trumpington High Street.

As for the W.S Mansfield that Bridget mentions, this might be the man who entertained Frank Dobie to dinner on Christmas Day 1943. Dobie was the first Cambridge University Professor of American History during the Second World War. He published his memoirs entitled 'A Texan in England' in which he recalls "My host for Christmas dinner is the manager of a seven-hundred-acre farm owned by Cambridge University. A practical scientist, he is one of the best-known agriculturists in England, W. S. Mansfield. We had a turkey".

But this is just speculation; if you can add more – or have your own memories of living in the Mansfield Almshouses then please contact Bridget Burrows at 21 Church St, Chesterton [01223 562440] or email her at cambridget@ntlworld.com

Sue Dooley from Shefford also seeks help. She writes:

“My mother was born in 1919 in one of a row of cottages that backed onto the Cement Works along Coldham's Lane, Cambridge. They have now been pulled down. Past the Rosemary Branch and probably slightly further down Coldham's Lane than the abattoir was a property called West House where my grandfather Arthur Thompson ran a market gardening business in about 1914. He rented the property from a Mrs Warboys for the grand sum of thirteen shillings and sixpence.

Then in 1922 my grandparents started a dairy at 50 Brookfields and every year gave their customers a calendar and a little pot of cream. I still have a small screw-topped jar with their name, Arthur and Gladys Thompson, on it”

Sue has sent me copies of some pictures of the dairy in Brookfields [SCAN 104.87] and her mother, Muriel Thompson on the family's pony and trap en route to Cambridge station to collect milk. [SCAN 104.88]

Memories 23rd June 2005, by Mike Petty

Last week the News reported South Cambridgeshire District Council's decision to allocate some of its resources to repairing the dilapidated church at East Hatley. Officers fear that villagers walking past the crumbling church might be struck by falling masonry. But some councillors feel that the church which was rebuilt in 1874 and closed in 1959, has little architectural merit and should be allowed to fall down. [SCAN 10230 HATLEY CHURCH c1910 – ALSO ARTICLE FROM CEN LAST THURSDAY]

Their dilemma has been echoed in other parishes throughout the years.

In 1947 the rector of St John's church Duxford petitioned for his church to be demolished. He claimed it was in a very advanced state of decay and there was a possibility of serious accidents happening. It had been broken into, defiled and misused in a great many and scandalous ways and was in a state of considerable dilapidation. The walls were opening up and breaking away from the roof and the tiles were coming off. The rain had already destroyed a great deal of the medieval contents and irreparable damage had been done to 'really good stuff'. Efforts had been made to persuade the R.A.F. to take it over as a chapel in memory of the American pilots who fell in the Battle of Britain, but that scheme ended in failure. The church was closed but repaired by the Churches Conservation Trust and still stands. [SCAN 10004 ST JOHN'S CHURCH DUXFORD 1947]

But the most unfortunate parish as far as churches are concerned must surely be Wendy. The original medieval church having got into a most ruinous condition was in 1737 replaced by a small plain building without a chancel. But the foundations were poor and it served for little more than a century. By 1863 the gable was a long way out of perpendicular and the congregation could look out into the churchyard through the huge cracks in the walls. In its turn it gave place to a new church in the Early English style built by public subscription. But history repeated itself again, the foundations were inadequate and the church was pulled down in 1950. [SCAN 10399 – WENDY CHURCH c.1900]

There is an unexpected Cambridge connection. Although Wendy church was only built in 1867 it contained a much older fine double hammer beam roof brought there from the old church of All Saints, Cambridge which had been demolished two years earlier. In 1950 it acquired by Mr N.A. Huddleston who wrote to the News: “Sir - I have just bought the main timbers of the fine carved oak roof of Wendy church. They are extremely massive and are said to date from the 16th century. They were offered to me as firewood for £6 ”. But was this the end of the story or are those beams now gracing some other structure? [SCAN 10143 – THE ROOF OF WENDY CHURCH CAME FROM THE OLD ALL SAINTS’ CHURCH IN TRINITY STREET CAMBRIDGE; SCAN 8587 – ALL SAINTS CHURCH, CAMBRIDGE BEFORE 1865]

Do you have memories or snaps of churches that have now disappeared – write to Mike Petty at the News

Wicken has retained its church but like all villages it has lost the people who once worshipped there. There were characters like the Reverend Thomas Thomas and the curate John John, Bob Fal-Lal, the village crier who would also fetch medicines from Soham and take the opportunity for a little poaching, or Billy Morris the postman-cum-cobbler who took letters to Upware picking up boots en route which he repaired in a hut before returning them in the afternoon. There was Maria Knowles who wrote a village history and published poetry who lived next to her brother, a ginger-beer maker, and Emma Aspland.

Emma was born in 1871, a well-spoken and well-educated lady who had a passion for photography. Through her camera lens she captured the life and times of Wicken in a remarkable series of pictures, many of which have survived. They provided an inspiration for Anthony Day the fenland artist, who was born in the village and has devoted his life to borrowing and copying snapshots of Wicken which he has published in a series of books, the latest of which has just been issued.

But despite a lifetime of collecting, Tony knows there are yet more pictures to be tracked down from people who once lived in Wicken but have now moved away.

Recently he even found one of himself that was taken in July 1929. It shows him with a butterfly net standing outside the family home, Victoria Cottage which had replaced a low wooden home where his grandparents had lived. He can even remember the fragrance of the climbing rose that his father planted. [SCAN WICKEN – A YOUNG TONY DAY WITH HIS BUTTERFLY NET OUTSIDE VICTORIA COTTAGE WICKEN 1929]

Whilst pictures may survive, people do not and it is Tony’s memories of the folk who lived and worked in the village that makes his book such a valuable record of a community that has changed out of all recognition – even though the church and houses may look the same. If you can add to his collection of pictures or memories or would like a copy of the new book then contact Tony Day at 12 Pond Green, Wicken.

Memories 29th June 2005, by Mike Petty

It was in 1897 that the Hon C.S.Rolls, when an undergraduate, brought the first motor car to Cambridge, a four-seater single cylinder Peugeot. But the car was not reliable and he frequently got into trouble through getting back to his college late at night after a breakdown. He confessed that he had squared numerous Dons by taken them out in the car though many of these runs ended in pushing the car home with the assistance of his venerable passengers.

The prospect of breaking down by the roadside is not a pleasant one, though today there are the ‘men in a van’ who can be summoned to assist. Of these the Automobile Association is the oldest and is now celebrating its centenary

In the 1920s they offered the motorist a ‘scout’ based in a box by the roadside who would assist in case of breakdown. One box stood at the junction of Shelford and Hauxton Road in Trumpington and was manned by Frank Pipe, amongst others. He rode an ordinary pedal cycle on his rounds. Living in Pampisford he would cycle to Sawston and on to Trumpington where he would stand outside the AA box and salute members as they passed. Then in 1929 the AA opened a number of fuel stations, including one at Stumps Cross, where fuel & water were available at commercial prices. [SCAN OF AA BOX AT TRUMPINGTON C1929 – FIND A MODERN PIC OF AA MAN FROM NEWS FILES]

By 1954 the Automobile Association had nearly 30,000 members in the area & installed a new radio transmitting station giving continuous communication with a Land Rover and six radio-controlled motor-cycle combinations who provided prompt assistance whenever a breakdown occurred on the road. [SCAN OF AA SIGNS OUTSIDE THE CAMBRIDGE AUTOMOBILE ENGINEERING GARAGE ON CORNER OF SIDNEY STREET AND HOBSON STREET, 1920S]

But some thought they should have another role: in January 1929 Cambridgeshire councillors argued that too much time was taken up by the police in traffic management, which was not a primary police duty. It could be controlled by the RAC and AA patrols. They were better than the police because they had motors. Other felt that it would be difficult to make arrangements with the associations and would probably mean the motor scouts becoming special constables.

But instead of controlling motorists the scouts would warn members of police speed traps.

Speeding has been around as long as there have been motor cars. Even Rolls dashed down to London ignoring the rule about having a man walking in front with a red flag. By 1905 the complaints were pouring in to the News, one correspondent wrote on 14th July:

“Sir – the motor-car has come to stay, and some day everyone will wonder how people could ever have done without it. The dust nuisance is very serious, but this will soon come off the road, the noise is objectionable and so is the smell but they are not unbearable. But the terror is the sight of an approaching car coming at the rate of 30 or 40 miles an hour. Recently an increasing number of cars have been taking the road between Cambridge and St Neots. Near the village of Croxton there are two cross roads and several cottages and the village school stand on the high road. Past these the motors dash by at such a furious rate that the numbers at the back cannot be read. There would certainly be much rejoicing if the police ‘happened’ on one of these offending cars as it was racing past the school”

But the police were indeed cracking down on motorists; they instituted speed checks, placing two officers (sometimes in plain clothes) beside the road, each with their stop-watches so they could check the time that elapsed as the cars passed them. Case after case came to court and in August 1905 they caught the famous Cash Chemist, Jesse Boot – or at least his chauffeur.

But this was not the usual time check over a short distance – the speed camera of its day. No this was something different – something that 100 years later is being reconsidered: they were calculating average speed over a long distance.

Police had set up a check on the A10 between Buntingford and Ware. One officer stood by the 13th milestone, another by the 7th, each clicked their watch as the car passed them. When they later compared the readings they calculated that the intervening six miles had been covered in 14 minutes, giving a speed of 25 and five-sevenths miles an hour. [SCAN OF POLICE CHECKING THEIR WATCHES – FROM CAMBRIDGE GRAPHIC 19 MAY 1900]

When it came to court the defence solicitor raised objections which will doubtless be aired again: the police could not prove that the chauffeur had been driving all the way between the two milestones. But in this case the only other people in the car were Jesse Boot who was crippled with rheumatic gout and his wife, one of the most nervous ladies that ever got into a motor car.

Boot was supported by the Nottingham Automobile Club who argued that it was unfair to time a driver over such a long distance. If he had been timed over 440 yards he could when stopped point to his speedometer and that record could be given in evidence. (Can any reader explain this to me – did the early speedometers include such a ‘tachograph’ facility). They also pointed out that the driver was not charged at the time and it was not until three weeks afterwards that he got the notice. The case was found to have been proved, though as the speed limit of 20 mph had not been grossly exceeded the fine was reduced to only £2.

Today controversy surrounds the use of roadside cameras that record speed more accurately than any stopwatch. Yet the idea of such cameras are not new – in July 1930 the News published a cartoon devoted to the controversial issue of police photography. [SCAN OF POLICE CAMERAS CARTOON FROM CDN 31 JULY 1930]

Today the AA offers a wide range of services. But it is not now the only motoring organisation and nor, as far as I know, does it match what the R.A.C. advertised over 75 years ago.

On 1st November 1929 the News reported: “The R.A.C. has decided to extend the benefits of its ‘Get You Home’ service to members of the Club whilst flying. It has hitherto provided a relief car free of charge for their members who have broken down on the road but a considerable number are now either owners of light aeroplanes or are members of flying clubs. Should any of them whilst flying be compelled to make a forced landing they will be able to send for an R.A.C. relief car and be conveyed to the nearest railway station. If the plane is of the folding wing type that can be towed on a public road the R.A.C. is prepared to pay for its conveyance to any town within the limits of the scheme.”

Memories 6th July 2005 by Mike Petty

It must be particularly confusing for asylum seekers who find themselves at the Oakington Detention Centre whilst officials debate their future. For the Oakington camp is not in Oakington, it's in Longstanton.

And is it Longstanton or Long Stanton? And is it one village or two? For as you approach from Cambridge the church tower and spire of All Saints' dominate the community as it has for centuries. But then a little further down the road there is another church, this one low and thatched with a Holy Well - St Michael's.

There were originally a group of separate settlements along the road from Oakington to Willingham. Where a fen drove crossed the main road a cluster of houses grew up and a thatched church, St Michael's was built. Later came more houses and in about 1217 another church, All Saint's, was built further along. Soon the building had spread all the way between the two and on beyond.

Various large manor houses were built each with its home farm; one was held for a while by a French lady, Eleanor of Aquitaine the wife of King Henry II. But the largest belonged to the Hattons, a very important family: one backed Sir Francis Drake who renamed his ship the Golden Hind after the family's crest. They dominated village life and made many changes including the construction of a new road straight to their Manor House – the one now used by traffic from the A14. But then they sold up and moved away; their ancient manor house was pulled down in the 1850s, their estate broken up in 1874.

Longstanton settled into a life away from public gaze. By the 1930s it was a small quiet agricultural village with its own railway station on the Cambridge to St Ives line. Things were peaceful. But then came war and with war came an airfield built on Longstanton fields, but named Oakington. Its construction cut the road which had been the reason for the village's formation in the first place. Other battles would follow to try and get it reopened.

The noise of the bombers downed the birdsong, but it was the hundreds of new RAF personnel that transformed the village community as scores of houses were built to accommodate them. Their children packed the village school and by 1950 the situation had become desperate. The sanitary arrangements had collapsed, school meals were prepared in the cloakroom which had a water tap but no drainage and the playground consisted of 65 square yards of unsurfaced ground rendered unusable by the discharge of rainwater gutters into it. In 1954 a new school was opened by Lord Tedder, Marshall of the R.A.F. [THERE IS A BLACK AND WHITE PICTURE IN THE NEWS LIBRARY FILES SHOWING SCHOOLCHILDREN WITH A MODEL OF THE VILLAGE]

In the 1970s the RAF gave way to the Army and fears were expressed that Longstanton would become a 'garrison town' as more housing was needed. Some councillors thought it should be built in Oakington, which had been pressing for expansion. Now they are facing the prospect of hundreds of new residents this time in a new settlement of Northstowe. But already other housing estates are growing up in what were once arable fields and soon there will be no farms left.

The churches will remain although St Michael's was declared redundant in November 1973 & is cared for by the Redundant Churches Fund. Now All Saints' is in need of repair too. But if the buildings survive the memories of its congregations will not. Now a group of Longstanton residents are anxious to collect memories while there are still people around who remember what village life used to be like

But they may have left it too late. When the two parishes were combined in 1953 nobody knew where one boundary ended and the other began. There was one school, one post office, one police station, one village institute and one recreation ground and should be one parish, they agreed. But some felt the village name should be changed: the united community should be called "Stanton Green". But that would surely have caused confusion!

Two readers have responded to my Memories article of 15th June.

Ron Smith from Gt Abington tells me he remembers the day when a lorry overturned into the school playground and has lent a cutting from the News of June 1965 depicting the aftermath of the accident. [SCAN OF CUTTING] while Margaret Heffer tells me that the Alfred Charles Mansfield mentioned by Bridget Burrows was her grandfather. She has supplied a detailed family history of Stephen Mansfield, but adds: "I had no idea of the existence of the almshouses he built, which I find very interesting"

Memories 13th July 2005, by Mike Petty

At Christmas December 1977 parishioners at Hildersham were shocked when two 600-year-old wooden effigies were stolen from their church. The eight-foot long figures of a former lord and lady of the manor were the church's most treasured possessions and two of only 90 such monuments in the whole of the country. They were carved out of oak and carried in front of the funeral processions of the Busteler family who were lords of the manor in the early 14th century. "They were the most treasured of all the beautiful things we have in the church and we all feel absolutely shattered", said a parishioner.

The monuments are still missing but now the Society of Antiquaries of London has made a discovery that brings them back into the spotlight. For their Librarian, Bernard Nurse, has discovered a detailed drawing of the figures made in 1802. There is another of a brass of Henry Parys, which was also stolen from Hildersham and a macabre skeleton once nailed to the door of the chancel. If you spot them when browsing through antiques shops then please let the parish know. [SCAN OF THE MISSING FIGURES AND THE SKELETON WHICH ADORNED THE CHURCH DOOR, BOTH DRAWINGS MADE 1802]

They came to light while Bernard was cataloguing a volume of drawings of Cambridgeshire churches that were purchased by the Society at a sale of the collection of Lt Col. J.C.W. Francis of Quy Hall in November 2001. The volume also includes drawings, some in colour, of Isleham, Linton, Sawston and Great Shelford churches.

But Bernard also seeks your help; his volume is the third in a series of four all produced by Thomas Fisher. Does anybody know what happened to the others? If you can assist, or would like further information then please write to Bernard Nurse, Society of Antiquaries of London, Burlington House, Piccadilly, London, W1J 0BE or email bnurse@sal.org.uk

Those seeking mementoes of ancient church artefacts can do no better than to visit Isleham where they can obtain, quite legitimately, an angel from the roof or a green man— or at least a replica. During restoration work on the church roof three such grotesque carvings were discovered, one of which is a true "Green Man". Ian Powys arranged for a mould to be taken and is selling copies of both in aid of church funds; the angel is £50 and the green man £75 – though he comes with a signed copy of Mike Harding's book on the subject. Order your copy from Ian on 01638 780519 or powys169@enterprise.net [SCAN OF THE ISLEHAM GREEN MAN]

But Isleham church too was once a crime scene. As an article from the News of August 1955 reports how workmen discovered that the solid oak beams in the roof were riddled with lead shot probably fired by Roudheads in an attempt to destroy the magnificent carved angels. Other carved figures were defaced but the angels were too high to reach. A News reporter clambered up scaffolding to inspect the intricate carvings and this is an ascent Ian has repeated more recently, this time taking his digital camera to record the angelic faces in detail. He has produced a CD-Rom of his photographs one of which is now attached to the back of one of the angels where it will doubtless be discovered in years to come.

Last week's horrific incidents in London emphasise the danger of travel, but Janet Webb from Cambridge tells me that her father went there on his own when a lad of 12.

She writes: "My father, Norman Bond was 90 in May and often reminisces about his past life. His father who worked for the railway built little three-valve radio sets as a hobby. Sometimes he needed parts from London and put Norman on a train at Cambridge Station – this would be about 1927. Once he arrived in London he walked to a little electrical shop in Petty Coat Lane and passed a list of items required to the shopkeeper. As it would be nearing mid-day he would take lunch in a café, then spend an hour or two in the cinema before returning to the shop. The shopkeeper would have all the items ready in a box and would escort him back to the Liverpool Street and the train to Cambridge where his father would be waiting for him. Norman got a job in the restaurant at Cambridge station selling cups of tea for 3d and helping the chef make apple charlotte, later travelling on the train to Ely to help in the station restaurant there until at the grand old age of 14 he started as an apprentice electrician" [SCAN 13380 OF CAMBRIDGE STATION 1930S]

Talking of London, Margaret Culpin from Brinkley has contacted me following an item she heard on the news recently saying how you now have to pay 50p to have a pee in the capital. "When my mother took my sister and me to the underground loos in Cambridge market place in the 1930's and 40's we had to put an old penny in the door. There would be an old lady down there in a white overall and the brass rails would gleam", she recalls [SCAN 6375 – AERIAL VIEW OF MARKET HILL IN 1964 SHOWING ENTRANCE TO UNDERGROUND TOILETS]

Miss Margaret Wilsher from Frinton-on-Sea is preparing for a talk she's giving to Great Bentley History Society on East Anglian windmills. She has a nail from Bourn Mill and several photos including Balsham where her father ran Wilshers Garage. She is seeking others including the one at Madingley. The original Madingley windmill was last tenanted by Mr Charles French who was in bed one July night in 1909 when he heard the mill creaking ominously and then it collapsed. The great oak timbers were so shattered as to make restoration impossible. But in 1935 came the news that a new mill would be erected on the site: A post mill at Ellington near Huntingdon was dismantled and carried to Madingley. It was not the first move the mill had made. It had already been transported across several fields to a spot where its sails might better catch the wind. The work was entrusted to Mr C.J. Ison of Histon who in July 1955 was commissioned to move a derelict fen drainage mill at Adventures' Fen Wicken to a more prominent position near the entrance to the National Trust fen. It is featured in a new book by Dr Richard Hills who devotes a chapter to similar mills in Norfolk. But as he points out mills were used for much more than pumping water or grinding corn. There were saw mills, mustard mills, papermaking mills and oil mills like the one that used to stand at Ramsey Mereside. "Windmills: a pictorial history of their technology" is published by Landmark at £21.99 ISBN 1 84306 189 9. [SCAN 7841 - MADINGLEY MILL 1904]

Memories 20th July 2005, by Mike Petty

The News crime reporters have chronicled many interesting cases over the years but few can have compared to the mystery of the missing silk pyjamas that caught the attention of readers in July 1930

It all revolved around events at the University Arms on the evening of 20th February

Veronica King a fashionably attired stockbroker's wife had booked into the hotel the day before and was shown to her room by the porter. The doors were fitted with a slam lock and could only be opened from the outside by a key – but she was not given one. The chambermaid had a pass key and the manager had the master

That evening she'd dined with her brother in Jesus Lane, gone back to her room, put on a pair of pink satin pyjamas and gone to sleep. In the morning she threw her pyjamas on the floor and left her door open when she went out to Cottenham races. The door was still open when she returned to her room at 8.15pm to dress for dinner. During that evening the United Hunts Ball was held at the hotel and shortly after supper she returned to the room again to powder her nose, finding the door still open

Finally at 2.30 in the morning she left the dance and retired to bed. She found the bed had been turned down but there were no pyjamas. Nor were her slippers anywhere to be seen. By the time she missed them she was undressed and instead of standing about and incurring a doctor's bill she had adopted the sensible course of going to bed. Nor did she tell the chambermaid the next morning but complained just after lunch when she learned that others had also lost their nightwear, one lady missing a nightgown and a vest.

Two people claimed they had seen a man with a whole lot of pyjamas at the beginning of the dance, about 10 o'clock. She admitted there had been a certain amount of hilarity that evening but denied there had been any 'ragging' and no running in and out of bedrooms and throwing pillows about.

So she decided to seek compensation for the loss of the pyjamas; they were of pink satin purchased in December 1928 for £7 17s 6d as part of her trousseau and had scarcely been worn. As Lord Clive, her counsel observed: "There are pyjamas which are things of beauty to be looked at on a Sunday afternoon but which it is almost sacrilege to wear in the ordinary way"

The hotel manager, Alfred Bush Harris, said he had been there for six years and this was the first complaint of anything being lost. It was a safe hotel and the likelihood of anybody getting in to steal a pair of pyjamas wasn't very great. He had not been told of the loss or he would have checked the 'Found Book' and made enquiries.

Mabel Bottle, the housekeeper, said it was her custom to go round and shut any door left open; she had made her rounds four times that night and seen no open doors. People going in and out would have needed keys.

Edith Runham, who worked in the office admitted that a lady had asked if a pink georgette 'nightie' had been found; but the lady did not know the number of her room and had given her name as Mrs Guthrie. There was no mention of any satin pyjamas or anything else.

The judge observed that that if you travel with pyjamas of such value you were prepared to go to law about them you should take an interest in their whereabouts in the daytime. If she had attached any real value to them she would have raised a hue and cry. To which Lord Clive replied that: you don't want pyjamas except for a specific purpose or notice until the time for their use was approaching.

The defence solicitor claimed she had failed to prove that the articles were lost or that there was any negligence by the hotel. Whoever heard of a person stealing pyjamas? Anyway she had not shut her door and had contributed to any loss. The judge agreed and thought the real value of the pyjamas was only two guineas and the slippers £1.

But what really happened on the night of the Hunt Ball will probably remain a mystery in the annals of Cambridge crime. [SCAN 39117 – ENTRANCE TO UNIVERSITY ARMS HOTEL c1910 – THERE ARE OTHER PICTURES IN NEWS PHOTO FILES; SCAN 9070 – CAMBRIDGE BY MOONLIGHT – WHAT DID HAPPEN TO THE SILK PYJAMAS?]

Miss Margaret Wilsher from Frinton-on-Sea is preparing for a talk she's giving to Great Bentley History Society on East Anglian windmills. She has a nail from Bourn Mill and several photos including the mill at Balsham where her father ran Wilshers Garage. She is seeking pictures of others including the one at Madingley.

But there was not one mill at Madingley; there were at least two. In 1880 Robert Farren sketched a timber mill looking down on the spires and towers of Cambridge. Then in July 1909 came disaster. The miller, Mr Charles French was in bed one night when he heard the mill creaking ominously. Then it collapsed. The great oak timbers were so shattered as to make restoration impossible and it remained a picturesque ruin to be photographed and painted by passers-by. [PHOTO WITH ROS]

Then in 1935 came the news that a new mill would be erected on the site. Following an extensive search for a replacement a post mill at Ellington near Huntingdon had been identified by Ambrose Harding, the Squire of Madingley. It was dismantled and carried to Madingley where it was reconstructed. It was not the first move the mill had made. It had already been transported across several fields to a spot where its sails might better catch the wind. [PHOTO WITH ROS]

The work of moving the mill was entrusted to Mr C.J. Ison of Histon who twenty years later was commissioned to move a derelict fen drainage mill at Adventures' Fen Wicken to a more prominent position near the entrance to the National Trust fen. It was thought to be the last of numerous small wind drainage engines that were erected throughout the fens in the 1700 and early 1800's. The wind turned sails that drove a scoopwheel pushing water up from the fenland drains into the higher rivers. [PHOTO OF THE WICKEN FEN MILL WITH ROS]

But there were problems – the wind needed to be strong enough and steady enough to keep the sails turning. If a sudden squall blew up then the miller needed to remove the canvas covering of the sails otherwise the whole machine might be blown off its base and 'walked' across the fen. As years passed and the land dried out so the fen shrank, meaning that the water had to be lifted ever higher. There came a time when one mill could not cope and a second had to be constructed nearby to lift the water into a reservoir from which it was pumped into the river.

The situation was recorded by fenland poet William Harrison

Those poor old mills had done their best
To have our drainage wants redressed.

Though often in the times of need
Found anything but 'friends indeed'.
When winds were low and floods were high
With outstretched pinions to the sky
They stood in utter helplessness
Exchanging signals of distress
Whilst murmurs, frequent and profound
Arose from those whose lands were drown'd

If we could not rely on wind something else had to be tried; the solution was steam, which in turn gave way to diesel – and now electricity. How long, I wonder, before somebody will come up with the idea of a windmill to generate the power to work the modern electric pumps that continue to keep the fens dry

It would come as no surprise to Dr Richard Hills, an expert on fenland pumping engines who has now produced a new book on the technology of windmills. Wicken drainage mill is there together with similar pumps in Norfolk, but as Dr Hills points out mills were used for much more than pumping water or grinding corn. There were saw mills, mustard mills, papermaking mills and oil mills like the one that used to stand at Ramsey Mereside. "Windmills: a pictorial history of their technology" is published by Landmark at £21.99 ISBN 1 84306 189 9.

Joan Pearman of Linton is not seeking pictures but sharing them. She has been clearing out some old papers and has come across a page from 'The Sphere' magazine of 2nd February 1957. One side reports on terrorist raids by Yemeni tribesmen on both sides of the frontier between Aden and the Yemen and how Venom jet fighters of the RAF had flown eight sorties in one day to protect the traffic passing along the road. But it is the other side that she had marked. It is devoted to protecting ancient buildings and features the group of cottages on the corner of Northampton and Magdalene Streets, Cambridge. They were acquired by the Society for the Protection of Ancient Buildings in 1937 when they were in exceedingly bad condition. Work on them was delayed because of the war but they had now been restored as 'before and after' photographs show. [SCAN OF BUILDINGS ON CORNER OF NORTHAMPTON STREET FROM 'THE SPHERE']

HOLD OVER IF YOU'RE SHORT OF SPACE

Old buildings need constant care and those that now survive are testimony to the work of skilled craftsmen over the years. But disaster can strike suddenly as two pictures taken of a cottage in The Grip at Linton testify. The front section of the cottage collapsed in about 1913 – but does anybody know when? Memories 3rd August 2005, by Mike Petty

Pictures of the tornado that hit Peterborough and Birmingham last week will have jogged memories for residents in various parts of the region

In January 1978 Newmarket was devastated with more than 100 homes damaged, cars overturned and the station signal box wrecked, when a tornado with winds equal to a hurricane force ten cut a two-mile swathe through the town. Firemen, then in the middle of a strike, turned out to deal with the emergency, police reinforcements were drafted in from Bury St Edmunds, and the News sent a team of reporters to the disaster zone.

They came back with eyewitness accounts from the Crockford Park Estate with its smashed windows, flattened fences and slate-less roofs. In St John's Avenue 14-year-old Gary Blinston described his experienced: "My little brother said, 'The caravan is going over'. I looked out of the window and saw a tree blown into the air. My little sister locked the door and took cover", he recalled. Nearby Stewart Grainger, aged 15, was in bed when the window blew in; his bed cover was cut by glass but he escaped unhurt. He had a second lucky escape when he went into his parents' bedroom and was narrowly missed by the attic trapdoor which had blown in. At another house the roof was lifted off and then came back down again, with tiles falling through the ceiling and windows blown out by the wind.

In Duchess Drive ten houses were badly damaged when the tornado toppled trees lining the road, crushing a car. Ron Ranner from Clare Place said: "Fences were flying through the air and tiles were piling up outside. It was a most frightening experience and was really five minutes of sheer hell". Nearby Arthur Smith, a market trader, had a narrow escape when a pane of glass landed on top of the eiderdown just moments after he had got out of bed.

At the Newmarket Bloodstock Agency an executive meeting was in progress when, as Roger Booth recalled: "It got very dark. There was a funny noise and then the windows blew in. There was glass and bricks and plaster everywhere. We just dived for the floor and tried to cover our heads. It was like a bomb going off". A string of racehorses was just arriving when the storm struck; trainer Ronald Sheather was leading the first of the six animals: "I thought it was a bomb exploding in the station yard. There was a cloud of dust, bricks and bits of wood thrown around. But the horses were very good and we had no difficulty getting them into their stables".

Peter Greco was on duty at the railway signal box when the tornado hit. Virtually every pane of glass in the box was smashed as the wooden building was moved 18 inches on its base. He was sent home suffering from shock – but not in his own car - his three-wheeler vehicle had been overturned and smashed against the wall of the signal box by the wind.

The centre of nearby Ashley also found itself in the tornado's track; Colin Smith who ran the general stores had his own home damaged and a tree crashed down on two of his vans, but, with his brother, he dashed around the village to see if he could help others. He found garden walls and chimneystacks wrecked, trees blown over and roofs virtually stripped. Electric cables were brought down and there were sparks everywhere. Engineers were drafted in to restore supplies, but sixty people were without power for up to eight hours.

[Cuttings & pictures in News files; there are also pictures of demolished wall at Ashley (neg R17810) and a power cable pole snapped off like a matchstick, (neg R17821)]

A similar tornado in May 1950 hit the area around Sutton. It swept up the High Street, through Pound Lane, Church Lane & Ely Road, damaging chimneys, roofs, walls and fences. One building was shifted from its foundations and Church Lane was completely closed by trees blown down along its entire length. Then in an awesome demonstration of its power it overturned a double-decker Eastern Counties bus onto its side. Ann Hood, who then lived at 14 High Street Sutton recalled: "Our garden stretched from High Street to The Brook, We had two beautiful mature Walnut trees growing in the Orchard garden. One of these was lifted and dropped by the hurricane, so that it lay across the fence between us and our neighbour's field. One of the smaller neighbouring apple trees was also lifted and dropped back almost in the same hole. The double-decker bus on its side caused some childish smiles as we girls had just been taught in science that Double-deckers were more stable than single!" They were days that people will never forget – but what do you remember of it now? And do you recall others

Memories 10th August 2005 by Mike Petty

Do you remember Longstanton, I asked. Yes, replied Fred Pond from Surrey – but Surrey in British Columbia, Canada. He writes: “In 1947 I was discharged from the Army and re-united with my wife Jean and our little daughter Isabel, who was born while I was in Germany.

“They were living with my mother and father in Oakington in a very small house so Jean and I decided to rent our own. The only accommodation was the Nissen huts in Longstanton, which had no bathrooms or electricity, just an outside loo and candles. But we wanted to be together with our little daughter and so we moved in. It was there that our other daughter, Sandra, was born with the help of a local nurse”.

Later Fred decided to emigrate; he acquired a second-world-war harbour defence motor launch to make the 10,000-mile voyage to Vancouver. It was a hazardous crossing with tropical storms and engine-failure to contend with – but they made it.

Mr Frederick Mahoney of Arbury Road Cambridge also has memories of Oakington airfield. He joined the Royal Air Force in 1941, aged 19, as an electrician and was posted to 7 Squadron at Oakington after his training before moving on to other local airfields. By VJ night, at the end of the war, he was the duty electrician at RAF Mepal and was tasked to take a searchlight lorry to Cambridge to floodlight Parker’s Peace, the Catholic Church and the area around until midnight. Then he returned to Oakington before being posted to the Far East. He was de-mobbed in London in 1946 and went back to work with his old employer, the Baldry Mineral Water Company in Cambridge.

Jack Baldry began his soft drinks firm in Gold Street, off Fitzroy Street Cambridge in 1923 with one assistant and a motor cycle for deliveries. He worked from dawn to dusk, stopping at four in winter when they had no light to see by. He got his first order, for two-dozen cases of lemonade, from the old Livingstone Hotel in Petty Cury but was so keen to deliver them that he roared around Emmanuel Road so sharp that two of the bottles fell off his motorbike and broke. Then in 1925 he acquired an important contract to produce ginger beer for a local brewery. The company diversified; they began bottling cider in 1930 and in 1935 extended into confectionery, cocktail savouries, pickles and groceries.

By the time Fred Mahoney started in 1940 Baldry’s had three lorries delivering drinks, crisps and biscuits to the pubs, clubs and shops in the surrounding area. They were in competition with deliverymen for the other mineral-water companies, Barkers in Willis Road, Wadsworth in Wellington Street and Corona with their bottles which closed with a fascinating metal-clip arrangement. Should two drivers arrive at the same pub at the same time they would play darts to see which one got the order. Production depended on the result and on the weather, for a hot weekend kept the factory on overtime for the rest of the week.

When he returned after the war Fred became a representative, successfully building up new accounts including the colleges and their sports grounds. In September 1952 fire caused thousands of pounds worth of damage at the works in Gold Street, Cambridge. It broke out in the first floor of the factory where corks, labels and bottles were kept & ran the whole length of the roof of one wing, most of which was destroyed. Firemen were hampered by extremely dense smoke and by many of the mineral water bottles exploding

Mr Mahoney left the firm in 1957 and continued to tour the region on behalf of other companies. But he looks back with great affection to his days with Baldry's and treasures pictures of their first outing by a Progressive Coach to Clacton in 1948 [SCAN 105.38] and a Christmas party in 1955. [SCAN 105.37]. This was held at the Cambridge Masonic Hall in Corn Exchange Street, a building demolished for the new Lion Yard car park - which itself is now just a memory. Did you attend other dances or dinners there – and do you remember Baldry's.

He has also lent me another picture that will perhaps stimulate memories. It was given to him in Christmas 1936 by Leo Rae who played the Compton organ at the Rendezvous Cinema in Magrath Avenue (renamed the Rex in 1938). Does it hold memories for you? [SCAN 105.39]

Stephen Brookes from Gt Shelford was in Burma in 1942 when the Japanese army invaded. His father had already retired as an army surgeon but rejoined took charge of a medical supply depot in Mandalay before evacuating the city in the face of the enemy advance. They reached China but felt there was still work to be done in Burma, so the family returned. It was not a wise decision. Soon they were making a 290-mile trek through mountainous jungle during monsoon rains, just five people amongst 40,000 refugees. When his father died of fever Stephen had to grow up fast. With his mother and crippled older brother having to be carried by porters there was a 130-day march before they arrived in India. During that time his sister kept a diary which has formed the basis for a book of their experiences, experiences that Stephen shares with fellow members of the Cambridge RAF Association and other groups. 'Through the jungle of death' by Stephen Brookes is published by John Murray at £16.99.

Mr G. Stelmaszczyk from Cambridge also has a wartime story to share. He writes: "After the fall of Monte Cassino in July 1944 there was still a small stronghold of German paratroopers left in the monastery, under the command of a German major. A British unit, together with a Polish unit in the charge of an English captain, were standing at the foot of the mountain, waiting for the surrender of the last paratroopers. Visualise the scene: the German Major approached the British Captain, and suddenly gave a yell, 'Hullo George: Long time no see'. It transpired later that they had both been undergraduates at Oxford University before the war. The Captain replied, 'I'll take you to dinner in the Officers' Mess, but then I'm afraid I must deliver you to the POW camp.' Ironic, isn't it?"

Memories 17th August 2005, by Mike Petty

The news of the arrival of the pound-a-litre gallon has brought petrol back into the headlines – but such stories have been around before

In June 1979 petrol rationing in the United States and Sheikh Yamani's latest warnings on the oil crisis were causing concern. Prices were well up and a number of petrol stations started rationing customers to five gallons as supplies fluctuated. Both Tesco (Gulf) and Sainsbury in Coldham's Lane were charging £1.04 for four star but Hallens (BP) at Victoria Road corner were 10p more. Holland's in Mill Road matched Marshall's price of £1.07, the Newmarket Road Service Station (Phoenix), where you were served as opposed to manning the pumps yourself, charged £1.08 and the Lolworth Service Station was £1.12.

A few years earlier in January 1975 a News survey had found that the new Sainsbury's filling station in Coldham's Lane was offering the cheapest prices in Cambridge though 68p a gallon was regarded as something of an opening offer. Holland motors in Mill Road came second with 4-star at 71p a gallon whilst the dearest was Oliver Rix at 74p

By September we were in the middle of a price war with Sainsburys now down to 63p for a gallon of four-star. Holland Motors were 68p, but small garages such as the Short Street Service Station were reporting their sales had dropped by more than a third since they could not afford to drop below 73p.

There were other ways to encourage trade: in December 1975 petrol pump attendant, 64-year-old Mr Percy Bursford was singing to his customers at the Rutland Hill Motor garage Newmarket, often letting rip with a full-throated burst of light opera in his tenor voice.

But such low prices could not continue and companies began to prepare for the inevitable rises to come. In June 1976 the nightmarish possibility of petrol at a pound a gallon was being considered; it would present problems not only to the motorist but also to petrol companies. If prices were to rise to such an extent then the existing blender pumps would not be able to cope, having been deigned for prices like 33p a gallon. But National Benzole gave a demonstration of futurist forecourt equipment, including a petrol pump head which could not only cope with metric measurements – litres instead of gallons – but which was also geared up for prices of a pound a gallon or more.

When prices increased in the March 1977 budget motorists pushed and fought their way to the petrol pumps in a panic-stricken rush to fill up. As soon as news of the increase was announced on the radio Holland's garage was one of the first to be besieged. A line of traffic stretched halfway along Mill Road and motorists, jealously guarding their place in the queue, were not even letting other cars out of the garage. At Huntingdon one petrol pump attendant said motorists had appeared to have "gone berserk" at the budget news

One man shielded from the stampede was Harry Smith of Abbotsley who in December 1977 had his own petrol pump nestling among the rose bushes in his well-kept front garden. It had been there before the Second World War when petrol was just 1s.6d. a gallon and although prices had risen it was handy having a supply of petrol on tap.

It was better than the lottery of petrol shortages and strikes such as that of November 1973 when reductions in supplies began to bite and garages restricted sales to regular customers who had one of their stickers; Ted Salisbury limited petrol to four gallons a customer but despite that sales shot up 37% as a result of panic buying and they ran out of petrol.

Such shortages encouraged people to think about economising; the Cambridge Evening News Managing Director, Tony Durham led the way by cycling to work, closely followed by the Editor, Mr Nicholas Herbert. And the company lashed out by purchasing four cycles for reporters – though stressing they would not forced to use them. Police tested a gas-powered patrol car in March 1975: with gas at about 30p a gallon and the cost of conversion from petrol to gas around £140 the car should be saving taxpayers money in September. That October South Cambs District Council worked out it would save at least £1,500 a year on fuel if it converted all its mini vans to run on gas instead of petrol. Comparative costs per mile were 1.36p for petrol and 0.97p for gas.

By July 1980 it seemed the crisis was over; following recent cuts in petrol prices differences of 8p or more could be found by shopping around with Tesco at Bar Hill charging £1.32 for a gallon compared to £1.40 at Hallen's on Victoria Road corner. Four-star was the main contender in the fight for sales and a number of garages had dropped two-star altogether. Looking back a year ago when many garages were short of petrol and 'regulars only' signs littered the forecourts, the current surplus of supply seems barely credible, the News commented. But it was most unlikely we will return to the days when they gave free gifts and trading stamps in a bid to attract business,.

Now with prices at hitherto undreamed-of levels there are plans for a new type of fuel based on crops grown by local farmers. [IS THIS CALLED BIO-ETHANOL OR SOMETHING SIMILAR – CAN SOMEBODY CHECK SINCE IT IS VERY SIMILAR TO THE NAME OF THE PETROL IN THE STORY BELOW] However similar developments have happened before as a story was back in August of 1930 demonstrates:

“‘Ethyl’, as every motorist knows, is a super motor spirit with remarkable properties. It causes engines to run more smoothly, delivers more power and eliminates the ‘knock’ without retarding the spark. A few years back it was obtainable at petrol filling stations almost everywhere and many motorists cheerfully paid the extra penny a gallon. But sinister rumours circulated that the lead tetra-ethyl it contained was injurious to health and gradually it disappeared. Now following tests it will shortly be on sale again at the Olde Castle Hotel garage in Cambridge.”

But as the amount of petrol consumed has rocketed, the places where it can be obtained have plunged dramatically. Many village petrol stations have closed and the thought of parking beside Bridge Street to fill up with petrol is one that now seems as incredible as the £1-a-litre price would have done to motorists only a few years ago.

Memories 24th August 2005, by Mike Petty

Recent scare stories about an intense heat wave now seem to have been washed away by the rain. But it is still not too late. If history does go in cycles then it is as well to recall what happened at the end of August 1930.

At the end of the month a heat wave which gripped the country. In Cambridge temperatures soared to over 90 degrees in the shade. Several deaths were reported including a Teversham man who collapsed from the heat on the railway line near Whittlesford.

The sun brought out a rash of what the News described as ‘gay parasols’ whilst fans made of materials varying from paper to black lace made a reappearance.

The river became a popular gathering point; groups of small boys naked to the waist lay recumbent under the shade of trees along the Backs whilst others emulated Rupert Brooke at Grantchester: “They bathe by day, they bathe by night’. Indeed even at midnight there were bathing parties by the banks of the Cam. [SCAN OF WOMEN SWIMMERS]

It was so hot that shoppers stayed away and the centre of town was left to office-workers some of whom abandoned their jackets and even their ties, whilst those who were less courageous fingered the tight damp bands that had once been collars and wondered whether respectability was worth while.

One group continued labouring: the workmen on building sites and road repairs. They, undaunted, carried on under the broiling sun amid the fumes of molten surfacing and the heat from weird flame-throwing devises. There was at least one sight to distract them from their labour, however momentarily, when a girl in green striped pyjamas more reminiscent of a continental seaside resort than a sedate university town was seen in one of the main thoroughfares. It was, the News commented, an extreme symptom of the heat wave that held the town in its grip. [SCAN OF BUILDERS AT WORK]

But there was something that was causing a shiver to run down certain spines, and it might have particular interest for Derek Reay from Hampshire. He has written to the Cambridgeshire Family History Society appealing for information on the Seekings' family, some of whom seem to have dropped off the tree. The name immediately rang a bell, but for a different reason: in November 1913 one Frederick Seekings became the man to be hanged at the County Gaol on Castle Hill, Cambridge. Although the hanging itself was a private affair crowds gathered to watch for the flag hoisted to mark his execution.

The old gaol was in itself the news in 1930. In the June it was opened to the public. Maids in their scanty summer frocks, flannelled youths, mothers and fathers and grandfathers queued for admission. The execution shed where Seekings met his fate was a popular rendezvous along with the condemned cell, the burial ground and padded cell. People searched for links with the past but found few. Dirt and rust had replaced whitewashed walls and polished steelwork and certain parts had become dilapidated. Then on 2nd September came the sale of the gaol materials – the cell doors, barred windows and of course the gallows themselves with their traps and a piece of thin string flapping from the top beam. Nobody was too keen to bid but eventually they were knocked down to a Littleport man for one pound, a chilling reminder of the past on a hot afternoon. [SCANS OF HEADLINES OF GALLOWS SALE, AN EXTERIOR OF THE COUNTY GAOL AND CHOICE OF TWO INTERIOR VIEWS, ALL 1930]

At least the weather would have boosted the sales at Baldry's mineral water works, recent mention of which prompted memories for various readers. Tony Miller recalls the fire there in September 1952. He writes: "I was only six years old but remember walking home along East Road on our way home to Brandon Place with my mum after she picked me up from the Brunswick infants school in Young street. There was lots of smelly smoke drifting along East Road and lots of bright red fire engines down Gold Street" He remembers the excitement he felt was tempered with concern for the firemen struggling to put the blaze out. [SCAN OF BRANDON PLACE 1960S, HOMES ON THE RIGHT NOW DEMOLISHED FOR SHELTERED HOUSING]

Louise Lawrence from the Arbury spotted her late mother, Hilary Moore (then Hilary Goodwin) on both the Baldry's photographs. On the one of the outing, she is third from the right, next to her best friend of many years, Sheila Heaton. Sheila died in 1982. On the photo of the party her Mum is pictured behind Olive and Jack Underwood, who are seated on the far right at the table: they were good friends for many years.

Also on extremes of weather Alan Beaumont from Cottenham tells me that he was caught up in the tornado at Sutton in 1950. He writes: I was a boy of 11: our family were out in my uncle's car for a drive through the fens when the sky went black, the wind blew fiercely, rain appeared and branches were blown everywhere. The windscreen was broken by a fallen branch but we made it to a pub carpark. None of us were five were hurt, just very shook up!" But there was another memory that night: Eric Boon the boxer was in the bar at the time.

Memories August 31st 2005, by Mike Petty

Mention of the county gaol on Cambridge Castle Hill has kept the emails buzzing. Sheila Proctor writes to tell me her great-grandfather, Alfred Edwards, (1852-1929) was the Head Jailer there until it closed. Although Alfred was quite strict he bred and kept birds in his garden loft and would sit patiently feeding the babies off the end of a match, she recalls. [SCAN 9507 STAFF AT COUNTY GAOL]

Beryl Doggett also contacted me so say she is compiling a family tree part of which that concerns the Doggetts and Fordhams of Chesterton. She writes: "I understand from my husband that either a Doggett or Fordham was hanged in Chesterton for the murder of his wife, a crime committed probably in a house in Water Street. Also a James Hancock was hanged for the murder of Alfred Doggett. Does anybody have any information on this?"

It is always dangerous probing into a family's past but I thought I would just search my 'Looking Back' and 'Memories' articles for the name 'Doggett' to see what would come up.

One story from 1898 concerned Mr Frank Doggett of Rectory farm, Cherry Hinton, then in deep countryside. There was scarcely a corner of the land he did not cultivate and he let seven cottages to his workmen. Tragedy struck the family in November 1925 when his sister was amongst the Christian missionaries who suffered ill-treatment in China during the Boxer rebellion.

More sad news was reported by Mrs Doggett, of Gt Eastern Street, Cambridge, in 1900. She received a letter from her son who was a prisoner during the Boer War. It included a South African caterpillar with a rose. But on arrival the rose had disappeared and the letter was partially eaten. The caterpillar was very thin, but alive.

During the Great War F.C. Doggett played a vital role in protecting the home front in event of invasion. A handbook issued by the Local Emergency Committee for Cambridge names him as the chairman of the Grantchester area. Should 'Total Emergency' be declared he would have been responsible for ensuring that most of the stock and horses would have been requisitioned; the remainder would be slaughtered and beans, oats and hay destroyed. Any vehicles left in the parish would be rendered useless.

During the 1920s members of the family played their part in local government. Councillor Doggett reported that Coldham's Lane was a veritable slough and almost impassable. Its condition was so bad that one ratepayer proposed to sow it with potatoes! He was also fighting for motor buses to be fitted with pneumatic tyres: it was only a matter of time before solid tyred vehicles would be barred from using the roads at all as they caused so much damage.

Francis Doggett was mayor of Cambridge in 1947 when the King & Queen visited Trinity College. He came from several generations of farmers but himself worked for Cambridge Instrument Company. [SCAN OF ARTICLE ABOUT DOGGETT] During the second-world war he served as Chief Warden and came under fire again in May 1951 when he investigated complaints of a six-pounder gun being used by the Ministry of Supply for testing armour-piercing shells at Cherry Hinton lime pit. He stood within three or four feet of the weapon and was not 'disturbed' – "although it was true I had my fingers in my ears. There is really very little we can do and it wouldn't be of much use objecting", he told councillors.

Others in the news included Robert Doggett, a sandwich board man in St Andrew's Street who was featured in the News in May 1961. He had had not always been a sandwich man, he had worked in college kitchens, on building sites and as a newspaper vendor. He was fit as strapped between his boards he could walk about the town for three or four hours without feeling the least bit tired. [SCAN OF SANDWICH BOARD MAN]

Members of the family served Cambridge in a number of occupations; in 1904 they were piano teachers, labourers, coal merchants and signalmen; later one had a milkround. [SCAN OF MILKMAN]

Writing to 'Memories' Thomas Taylor from Newton reported that his grandfather, J. Doggett used to keep the Granta Inn on Newnham Road while others recalled George Henry Doggett who was company secretary to Robert Sayle until Selfridges bought the store and he was 83. He was a tall upright man with a neat white beard, who commanded respect wherever he went. Frank Doggett also worked for the firm as head of accounts until 1940 when John Lewis acquired the store.

But the late Ernie Papworth from Over recalled another branch of the family when recording his memories of the demolition of the old Boat Inn at Brown's Hill Stauch, Over in 1947. "The old building was taken down, brick by brick, mainly by two or three German P.O.W.'s. Inside the pub was an old blackboard with the words "Mind your P's and Q's", at the top. This was to remind the bargees how much they owed for their Pints and Quarts, which they would have to pay for their return journey. Then well lubricated they would sing the following: "Can ye walk along a lighter, Can ye eat fat pork, Can ye 'oller out 'Watchee Dozee', Can ye drink a quart?"

"Dozee Doggett was foreman of the lighters, the railway across the fens to Earith was called the Pork and Lard Railway, part of the platelayers wages. The new house, as it was then, was built on the other side of the Great Barrier Bank. It is no longer occupied but on dark cold winter nights it is still possible to see the faint glow from the old pub window and hear the merry voice of Bill Johnson tell Bill the landlord to chalk another one up for Dozee!" Ernie reported.

But there is another connection between the Doggetts and the criminal fraternity that dates even further back. In the early 1800s the Cambridge town gaol stood next to the Town Hall on the market place. The gaoler had a little perk: he was allowed to sell ale to the prisoners. His name was John Doggett.

Of course all of these may have no connection at all with Beryl's branch of the family – that's part of the fascination and frustration of researching your ancestors. If you can assist then email her at johnandberyl.doggett@ntlworld.com or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch.

Sue Slack, who works in the Cambridgeshire Collection at Cambridge's Lion Yard Library has been delving through their thousands of old pictures to select some of her favourites for a new book.

She has chosen to devote one section to the role of women reflecting suffrage activity, women street and window-cleaners during the First War and servicemen of both sexes relaxing in the Toc H lounge during the Second. Elsewhere they appear as shopkeepers, Pye employees and washerwomen. Sue includes one particularly risqué photograph from 1900 showing university men and women in very close proximity but points out that they were only actors – such fraternising between undergraduates would not have been permitted for real! [WOMEN AND MEN ACTORS].

But what would the women prepared to fight for their country, for the right to vote and for the right to be awarded University degrees have thought of their sons fighting for the fun of it? One intriguing picture shows a couple of lads indulging in bare-knuckle boxing about 1910. Can anybody supply details? [BOXING LADS].

One of the pictures is of a college bedmaker, ladies who continue to play an essential role in University life, as they have for centuries.

Back in 1859 an American undergraduate wrote that it was a good job: "A person once appointed to this seriously lucrative place never gives it up, although utterly superannuated, toothless and tottering. They order from the butteries every day twice as much bread and butter as a man wants and at the end of the day all that's left goes to them, by immemorial custom, as perquisites. And any meats left from a dinner, breakfast, etc, unless specially mentioned by you, go to them as perquisites. . . They form an immense body. . . grown old in the college and handing down their power to their nieces and daughters. . ."

But Frank Rutter defended them in 1901: "No sooner does a 'Fresher' make his appearance than the bedder takes him under her protective wing, combining the roles of foster-mother and maid-of-all-work. What if she does clean your teapot with paraffin, or entertain her friends to breakfast in your room? Such little perquisites are well-earned by the bedder who at her best is a motherly creature and known to stick staunchly to her 'young gentlemen' in their hour of need."

Frank Dobie, an American don, found them invaluable the 1940s: "In the college hall where I have rooms two plain women, designated as 'bed-makers,' bring in coal, make the coal fires, scrub the hearths, draw the water, draw back the black blackout curtains, make the beds, change the linen and otherwise administer to us gentlemen". [SCAN OF MERCY REYNOLDS, BEDMAKER, 1946]

But by 1969 things had changed. Enid Porter noted: "The bedmakers of today are very different from their predecessors. Many of them are young, attractive and well-dressed, whereas, until early in this century, it was customary to appoint more elderly and far from good-looking women, presumably in the interests of the undergraduates' morals. Even until shortly before the Second World War only married women could be bedders. A woman still working in one of the Colleges recalled in 1966 that when she applied for work in 1936, two months before she was going to be married, she was told that she could not be engaged by the College until after the wedding ceremony had been performed"

Bedders used to have a male equivalent: the gyp. Their role changed; from acting as valets and 'gentlemen's gentlemen' they took on other duties such as staircase-sweeping, boiler-stoking and waiting in Hall. They were the butt of many an undergraduate gibe: "most of them are either too old and worn out, or young, impudent and thievish. The whole set may be defined as leeches". Indeed their name was said to have derived from the Greek word for a vulture. Today their memory lives on in 'gyp rooms', their former pantries on college staircases where undergraduates now make themselves tea or coffee. But are there any gyps left, or does anybody have memories of this most important side of college life? [SCAN 100.18 – A GYP AND BEDDER WITH NEW UNDERGRADUATE]

Kath Gray from Cambridge has memories of the County Gaol on Cambridge Castle Hill in 1930. She writes: "I remember my mother taking us three children to the open day. I was ten, my sister eleven and my brother seven. The man took us into the padded cell and shut the door. He told us they put bad boys and girls in there. I did not like it. On the way out there was a lovely lemon mint bush in the grounds. My mum took a little piece and set it in our garden. We were afraid to run up Castle Mound and look over Cambridge"

More memories of Baldry's have come in; Mr F. Dean from Stapleford worked for the firm from 1959 to 1979, starting in Gold Street before moving with them to Harvest Way and then Sawston. He has lent me a picture of one of their lorries in Arbury Road with the Manor School in the background. [SCAN OF BALDRY LORRY]. Margaret Draper, nee Hinde, was amongst those who attend the firm's Christmas party in 1955 and recognised several of her former colleagues. She worked in the office and recalls that it was a lovely friendly firm who all worked well together. Mr Baldry was a very kind and generous boss who often bought them cream cakes and they could go into the factory to help themselves to drinks off the production line. Not everybody patronised the company's products: "I remember seeing the ladies going with their jugs to the Rabbit public house to get them filled with ale and the lovely warm pies and sausage rolls from Curtis' in Burleigh Street. Happy days!"

Memories 14th September 2005 by Mike Petty

With the country gripped by the excitement of the Ashes cricket series it is timely to receive a letter from Phyllis Bowman (nee Fuller) of King's Lynn. She receives regular shipments of issues of the News and has just caught up with the March editions which had articles on the future of cricket on Parker's Piece.

It prompted her to write with her reminiscences:

"In the early 1950s I was 15 years old and worked at Hobb's Pavilion. Every Saturday and Sunday in the cricket season a large marquee was erected on the grass between Hobbs and the University Arms Hotel and we were responsible for the 'cricket teas'. What glorious afternoons they were. The teas consisted of sandwiches – Page and Sons bakers provided the bread already sliced which was quite a new thing then. The fillings were boiled bacon, grated cheese and boiled egg which we bought from Sainsbury's old shop in Sidney Street. There were cakes (nothing fancy) and Chelsea buns, Swiss rolls & scones. To drink there were urns of tea and orange squash.

"When I worked there Hobbs was managed by Len Payne and his brother-in-law, the manageress was a Miss Barnard, the main tea lady came from Six Mile Bottom and a lady called Lizzie (who was well over 70) did all the washing-up and saw to the boiled bacon. There was Janet Seagrave from Shelford and me from Burwell.

"There was a small room at the back of the pavilion where working men came – plumbers from the Gas Board, electricians or Camtax taxi drivers and they were allowed to eat their own sandwiches. Boys from the Perse School came in as did office workers, staff from the Cambridge Daily News – situated behind the New Theatre in those days. We also had actors and dancers from the theatre, even Phyllis Dixie – Jane – with Fritz her dog and many others. Tea was threepence, Camp coffee fourpence and ham rolls sixpence.

"What glorious times they were and I never remember any wet days"

The pavilion was named in honour of Jack Hobbs, one of Cambridge's famous cricketing sons. He had declared in open in March 1930 and returned that September bringing with him one of the most brilliant cricket teams that Parker's Piece has ever seen to play a Cambridge Eleven. It included seven men who had captained England including Hobbs himself and O'Connor, both of whom learned the game in Cambridge.

The weather seemed likely to put a damper on events with heavy overnight rain, but warm sun and a strong wind contrived to make the pitch playable. By two o'clock there were at least 5,000 spectators massed three and four deep round the entire field. Others stood on the running boards of cars drawn up in Park Terrace to see the game. At the tea interval the crowd dashed across the pitch to line the entrance to the pavilion as the players entered for their break.

Then it was turn for Hobbs and Sutcliffe to open for the visitors with each of the arriving or departing batsmen being escorted to the crease by a police escort to keep excited youngsters at bay. The partnership of Hobbs and Duleepsinhji saw the 150 up on the board, passing the town's total. But that was no reason to stop and play continued until Jack Hobbs had made his century.

The result really didn't matter. What mattered was that Cambridge had seen a match that would live on in the memories of all who saw it.

By happy coincidence this week Sheila Proctor from Fen Ditton has lent me a picture of the Camtax staff – some of whom may have taken their tea in the pavilion backroom. It was taken at a Christmas party in 1948 at the Bridge Hotel, Clayhithe, the only occasion Camtax closed for the evening. Her dad, Percy Crisp, can identify them all – apart from one. Can you fill in the name of the mystery man seated second from the left on the middle row between Harold Hunt and Jack Glasscock. And its not Gregory Peck the famous actor whose seated two further on – just a namesake.

There was something like to cricket on show at Cambridge Town Football ground in June 1954. It was a new sport called American softball between a team from the US Air Force Hospital at Wimpole and another from USAF Molesworth. The game seemed to be a form of glorified rounders akin to baseball. There was 'strike one', 'ball one', 'blunt' and a host of other expressions which the News sports reporter found difficult to explain. There were incidents such as two players somersaulting as they tried to catch a ball but the thing that really stuck in the memory was the way the umpire was hustled and pushed by players disputing a decision. That was definitely not cricket!

But do you remember the American Hospital in the grounds of Wimpole Park in the 1940s and 50's? There is to be a special reunion for US medics who were based there and Arrington Parish Council is seeking photographs or memorabilia for an exhibition to be held in the village hall in October. In May 1947 some of the huts were used as Wimpole Park Teachers Training College. They had their own film society who made a record of college life – but what has happened to it? The Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library, Cambridge has four snaps but there must be more. Three of the county's principal educational establishments are seeking assistance in celebrating their history

It was in October 1930 that Sawston Village College was officially opened by the Prince of Wales, the future King Edward VIII who was to abdicate the throne in December 1936. He came not just to open another secondary school but to set the Royal seal of approval on an ambitious scheme of rural education which had attracted world-wide attention.

The man behind the concept was Henry Morris, Chief Education Officer for Cambridgeshire since 1922. He had realised that country youngsters were moving into the big cities; villages had few amenities and people were beginning to lose their sense of identify with their own locality. He envisaged a series of 'countryman's colleges' with buildings that were open in the evenings providing education for adults as well as children. It would be a base for the county library and a meeting place the whole community.

It was to endorse this vision that the Prince arrived by aeroplane, landing at Duxford airfield before his limousine made its way to Sawston, like streams of other motorcars. People crabbed about the enormous increase in motor transport but it was the development of such transport that made the idea possible, for the new college would cater for nine villages, the Prince remarked. He continued "For the children the college would give a varied training ... with instruction in the workshops and, no less important, the opportunity of knowing how to play games". The adult wing gave the opportunity for technical and agricultural education as well as drama and music. It also provided a home for such splendid voluntary associations such as the British Legion, Women's Institutes, Boy Scouts and Girl Guides and the Infant Welfare Centre which had done so much for the welfare of rural England. It would be a centre of village social life and recreation and village local government."

Within a decade the Sawston college for country folk was welcoming London evacuees; they arrived in a red London bus (which the driver parked in the middle of the lawn) and were accommodated in the hall. Within minutes the ceiling was bespattered with blotting paper ink bombs, flicked up by rulers. Perhaps 'welcomed' was not the right word!

War could not interrupt a Sawston tradition: the election of the Rose Queen. The 'coronation' ceremony was held on the fountain court in the presence of dozens of visitors. Pearl Mann recalled how in 1942 she processed to a throne on a raised dais to the accompaniment of music from an orchestra formed of teaching staff and was crowned by the wife of a local dignitary. There then followed a pageant which became increasingly more elaborate over the years. In 1963 the ceremony was abandoned, but it is to be revived next Saturday as part of a series of events to celebrate the college's 75th anniversary including a Big Band Ball to the music of the Joe Loss Orchestra. It will also mark the publication of a short history of the college by old-boy Bryan Howe. Copies are available from Bryan at 16 Henry Morris Road, Sawston, priced £5 plus postage.

March High School for Girls also experienced difficulties with war-time guests. They were already in over-crowded buildings when 400 children, many from Tottenham, descended on the town. Many of the girls – and boys – had to share the formerly girls-only building. One benefit was that the school got electric light. Previously on dark winter afternoons they had to send a messenger to find the caretaker to light the gas lamps, but the Londoners could not cope with such a system. School dinners were no longer served as the Tottenham children took over at one o'clock, so some of the classes were able to use the kitchen for their lessons. The winter of 1939-40 was particularly cold and the kitchen was freezing with only a few radiators and a tiled floor. But it did have gas ovens around which the girls gathered with their feet practically inside in a vain attempt to keep warm. Then without notice the Army arrived and took over the school hall forcing the girls out onto the playing field, or into the air raid trenches if it rained.

These and many more fascinating details have been gathered by Pauline Kennelly for a history of the school which will be launched at March Museum on 8th October. There will be extensive displays of class photographs and memorabilia which should ensure that this excellent museum receives even more visitors than usual. Pauline Kennelly's history of the High School for Girls March 1905-1969 is available from bookshops at £8.99 – ISBN 0-9550653-0-5 – or from Pauline on 01733 235956

Mike Good from Selwyn College Cambridge is part of a team now working on a book to celebrate their 125th anniversary in 2007. It will be a well illustrated and by no means a dry-as-dust academic history of the college which will draw upon the memories of many of its past students and dons. But he is also anxious to make contact with other people who have played their part over the years as porters, gardeners, kitchen staff or bedders. If you have memories or snaps that can be added to the college history he would love to hear from you. You can write to him at Selwyn or email msg55@sel.cam.ac.uk

My appeal for bedders' memories has brought a letter from Kath Gray of Cambridge. She writes: "My mother was a bedmaker at Jesus College in the 1930s. In those days there was a bedmaker and her help on each staircase and with eight sets of rooms it was hard work. They had start at 6.30 to get the undergraduates up and take their hot water for washing. They worked till eleven and had to go back in the afternoon to wash up and turn the beds down. The help had to do all the heavy jobs, carrying coal, cleaning fires and scrubbing stairs. In 1940 the Air Force took over the college and mother worked in the kitchens. At Christmas the college used to give them all a Christmas cake, pudding and a ten-shilling note; mother got a pension of ten-bob a week when she retired. If they were the good old days I don't want them back!"

Memories 28th September 2005, by Mike Petty

John Pearce from Great Wilbraham has sent me a postcard of Six Mile Bottom Post Office; his question is when was it taken? A few clues such as the post box and the style of dress suggest it was probably before the Great War. Miss Ellen Barton was sub postmistress and shopkeeper in 1904– but is it her outside and who were the other people? [SCAN 107.13 – SIX MILE BOTTOM POST OFFICE]

I wondered however what the message on the back of the card might have said. Did anything ever happen at Six Mile Bottom that would have been worthy of a note to a friend?

Six Mile Bottom takes its name from its distance from Newmarket racecourse and has a long sporting tradition. A large house called the Lodge was erected in 1802 which became home to the half-sister of Lord Byron, who visited it several times. By 1890 it belonged to Herbert De la Rue of the printing family who enlarged and remodelled it into the Swynford Paddocks stud. Plenty of things there for a postcard writer to speculate on.

In October 1904 Mr Pierpont Morgan, an American millionaire, leased the Six Mile Bottom estate together with the sporting rights which were said to be excellent. People speculated that in all probability large shooting parties would arrive each season, possibly even including the King who had visited regularly when Prince of Wales. Instead they got travellers when a group of two to three hundred Macedonian gypsies were escorted through the hamlet by a contingent of police who were shepherding them on to Essex and ultimately London.

Most people roar through Six Mile Bottom by road, but one motorist stopped in April 1929 when his Essex Super-six saloon burst a tyre and plunged down a bank, turning over on its side at Valley Bottom. The whole of the roof was ripped away and the occupants thrown out. They were taken by police ambulance to Addenbrooke's Hospital. But apart from the roof and windows there was little damage to the car itself, the News reported.

More excitement erupted in July 1947 when a railway truck loaded with 60 112lb American mustard gas bombs caught fire as it passed through Six Mile Bottom station. It was one of about 40 wagons transporting bombs to Barry in Wales where they were to be dumped in the sea. In scenes reminiscent of the ammunition explosion at Soham in June 1944 Driver Frederick Smart spotted the danger and Fireman Alfred Chandler jumped down from the tender to uncouple the burning wagon. They tried to pull it away from the rest but with a spectacular 'whoosh' about half the bombs exploded and a burst of flames shot fifty feet into the air. The fireman tried to subdue the flames with buckets of water as poisonous fumes spread and police sealed off the area and awaited the decontamination team. Smart and Chandler, both Cambridge men, were awarded medals to commemorate their bravery. [SCAN 86.1289 SIX MILE BOTTOM STATION 1930s]

Roger Asplin from Reach has asked about Pout Hall, an isolated spot at the junction of the Burwell and Reach Lodes. It was once the site of an old picturesque building with a thatched roof and dormer windows. Charles Lucas, a Burwell doctor who enjoyed spinning tales, said he remembered that a little old woman who lived there used to ferry herself from one bank of the lode to the other in her wash tub, using the linen prop as a punt pole. He claimed it had been built as an inn by John Peachey but he could never get a licence to serve beer as it was too remote for the police to supervise.

By the 1860s it was home to a gang of thieves and scoundrels who lurked about the fen at all times of day and night seeking what they could plunder. Sheep stealing, fowl stealing, tool stealing and every other kind of lawlessness were carried on, especially at harvest-time. In one incident four of the villains formed a gang; one pinched a sailcloth from one of the fen drainage windmills, another a pole, the third a pitchfork and the fourth some sacks. They sneaked into a cornfield where they spread the cloth on the ground, took a sheaf from a shock with the pitchfork and beat it with the pole. The corn was gathered into a sack and carried back to Pout Hall. Once they'd got as much as they wanted it was loaded onto a boat and transported along the lode to a wharf belonging to a house in North Street, Burwell. There it was hidden in an underground granary until it was time for it to be disposed of.

he gang was finally brought to justice when Police-Sergeant Plant with one or two constables surprised them with a boatful of plunder and after a violent struggle arrested the ringleaders and sent the rest running out into the fen. Hazel Sandiford from Salford has a photograph taken by R.H. Lord in the 1880s which shows a fenland fisherman with Pout Hall in the background but as far as I am aware there are no picture-postcards of the building. Do you know different or have you more tales to tell? [SCAN 107POUT – R.H. LORD'S PHOTO WITH POUT HALL IN THE BACKGROUND]

Those seeking sites of even bloodier battle can do no better than journey deep into the fenland beyond Chatteris. Beside a lonely road from Wimblington a signpost points along a rutted track to Stonea camp, the lowest hill-fort in Britain. It was a refuge for the Iceni hidden deep in the marshy fens where they were safe from the Romans who had conquered the rest of Britain. Then came the revolt lead by Boadicea which destroyed Colchester and London and prompted a dreadful retribution by the legionaries. The battered remnants of the Iceni forces retreated to make a final defence at Stonea where they were smashed by the might of the Roman army. Later Emperor Hadrian – of Hadrian's Wall - decided to build a new administrative centre on the site to control the fenland, erecting a stone tower that dominated the area around. Yet within a century the Romans pulled down their villas and temples & moved out, leaving no trace behind them. All became forgotten until a field archaeologist, David Hall, spotted something unusual as he tramped his way around the fenland and sparked a massive series of excavations. Tim Malin, then a senior archaeologist at Cambridgeshire County Council, investigate the site in the 1990s and has now compiled a most detailed yet readable account of the area in Roman times. There is a colour postcard showing an aerial view of the camp but for a proper understanding of what was built, and lost, you should read Tim's new book 'Stonea and the Roman Fens' (Tempus £19.99 – ISBN 0-7524-28993-3). Memories, 5th October 2005, by Mike Petty

Last weekend I had the opportunity to guide an expedition into the fens – a grand name for a pleasant potter by coach from Cambridge to Earith, Wentworth, Welney and beyond.

For me one essential pausing point is at Sutton Gault, where one can get a unique appreciation of the civil engineering work of the seventeenth century that led to the creation of the Old and New Bedford Rivers, and cross the wash-land in between. Sometimes the road is completely flooded and you walk above the waves on the elevated walkway. This is not a catastrophic breakdown of the drainage system. It was always intended that the washes will flood and the people on the other side of the Bedford rivers get used to the fact that periodically their little community will have to look to Chatteris rather than Sutton for their services. [SCAN 2861 OF FLOODED ROAD AT SUTTON GAULT AND ELEVATED FOOTBRIDGE, TAKEN IN 2000]

Yet on Saturday the road was perfectly open, it was just the place itself that had disappeared. For this time I needed to dial 999 and the East Anglian Ambulance Control could not find it on their computer.

The first time I rang the controller demanded the name and number of the road. Then the phone went dead. I dialled again. For what seemed an age I endeavoured to describe just how one got there – take the road from Sutton (the one near Ely) to Earith and turn right. I was told an ambulance was on its way from Ely. By the time I rang a third time, now with the actual grid reference, the vehicle was coming from Chatteris. Before it had arrived the bus driver had phoned his wife, a nurse, and she had got to the scene, as had a relation who had been summoned from Willingham.

So its time to put Sutton Gault on the map.

When Prince Edward was making his television series on ‘Crown and Country’ he found Sutton Gault a good location for some of his filming, indeed he was photographed there for the cover of the brochure that accompanied the programmes. He took lunch at the well-known ‘Anchor’ Inn itself a product of the drainage operations that constructed the New Bedford River in the 1650s for it features in a list of public houses erected on the riverbanks to refresh drainers & travellers. The drainers also constructed a wooden bridge over their New Bedford River, later replaced with a more substantial road bridge and supplemented by the raised footbridge [SCAN OF OLD WOODEN BRIDGE ACROSS THE NEW BEDFORD RIVER AT SUTTON GAULT c1910]

Sutton Gault has even featured in the annals of Cambridgeshire aviation history for it was here that in October 1913 an advertising blimp containing the slogan ‘Give Her Bovril’ made a forced landing. Then during the Second World Wars air raid records record the dropping of high-explosive bombs in August 1940 and February 1941, when a bungalow was damaged. Fortunately they missed one of the county’s most interesting houses just up the road, the Burystead, a former manor house with an early 14th-century chapel. [SCAN 5813 OF THE ‘BOVRIL’ BLIMP 1913]

The area around Sutton Gault received worldwide attention when work began on a revolutionary hovertrain. A 12-mile long elevated test track was erected beside the Old Bedford River towards Earith. The prototype vehicle was rolled out of its hanger in November 1971 and made its first run down the one-mile track the following month. The tests saw speeds of 106 mph being recorded but the Government were unwilling fund it and everything closed down. The track was removed, though some pillars remain beside the riverbank to be discovered by those who care to explore even further off the beaten track. [SCAN 210 OF HOVERTRAIN AND PRESS PHOTOGRAPHERS 1971]

None of this is earth-shattering but at least it shows that there really is a place called Sutton Gault.

Glancing through some of my ‘Looking Back’ stories I see that radio control for ambulances was in the news back in March 1950 when the innovation, which had already proved its worth with the police and fire brigade, had a successful trial with the county ambulance service. Pye Telecommunications had fitted four ambulances with radio receiver, transmitter and microphone and all vehicles were now in constant contact with the control room. [SCAN T2403 OF AMBULANCEMEN WITH RADIO 1970]

In 1921 a motor ambulance for the use of Cambridge townspeople was provided by Special Constables but was soon being used on long journeys to Ipswich and Norwich. By March 1926 it was proving of great benefit with increased demands for accidental and private cases. An additional motor ambulance had been purchased and proved of great assistance. They were available at any hour of the day or night upon application to the Central Police Station or Fire Station [SCAN T580 OF CAMBRIDGE AMBULANCE 1920S]

But not all communities could afford a proper ambulance. By September 1924 Haverhill had made arrangements to take patients to Addenbrooke’s Hospital in a motor lorry adapted as an ambulance with a stretcher secured in position by springs. But they needed something better: there were two alternatives, the purchase of a new ambulance at a cost of £160 or the possibility that one might be obtained on loan.

In July 1928 Ely Councillors also debated the advisability of obtaining a motor ambulance. Cases were frequently happening where a person was ordered off to the Hospital at once. The previous week frantic efforts had been made to find an ambulance but the only vehicle that might be termed an ambulance was being used at a funeral and they had to telephone to Cambridge for one. This was a standing disgrace to Ely. Their friends at March had purchased a first-class ambulance for £880 and Soham had one, the News reported.

In 1947 Cambridgeshire ambulance service jumped the gun to become first to carry patients free of charge before it came under the National Health Service in June 1948.

On Saturday the ambulance personnel were welcomed. But sadly they are not always appreciated, as the News reported in September 1978. Two St Neots ambulance men made a one-mile mercy dash by bicycle to treat an injured man. One had borrowed his wife's machine and the other used his own bicycle as they set off with first aid bags over their shoulders. But on arrival they were ridiculed by onlookers. They were laughed at, sworn at and generally made fun of for turning up on bikes. None of the station's ambulances had been available. Two 'emergency use' vehicle were in use, another had broken down and two 'sitting case' vehicles were also unusable, one with exhaust trouble, the other with a puncture.

At least the professionals on the ground knew the way, computer or no computer!

Memories 12th October 2005, by Mike Petty

New Hall was Cambridge's third 'Foundation for Women of moderate size' when it opened in a former guesthouse called the Hermitage in Silver Street in October 1954.

The University had approved the admission of women back in 1948, opening the way for an increase in the number of female undergraduates, but the two existing women's colleges of Girton and Newnham did not wish to increase their numbers. Hence the need for a new college. But the new college had virtually no money and for the first few years the tutors had to be 'Jills of all trades' combining the roles of teachers with caretakers, doorkeepers and handymen.

The mistress, Dame Rosemary Murray, was still acting as emergency plumber at the time of the big freeze of 1963. As the river outside their walls froze the girls huddled for warmth over the feeble flames of their gas fires. People were skating on the Cam in early January and it was still frozen eight weeks later. Gill Emberson remembers: "My gas fire packed up so I had to dash into another girl's room to dress. The roadside windows gave a terrific view of the icy roads, I watched numerous cyclists falling over one morning. It was very chilly in the days before tights and we all wore tweed skirts and long knickers under our academic gowns" Nancy Eastham recalls: "All the water pipes froze solid for a week and the hot water pipes did not come back to life for a month. I would never have survived if I had not brought my electric blanket from home. I found the Cambridge voltage was different but fortunately through the Physics department I met a student from Canada who supplied me with a heavy-duty transformer so that I could keep toasty warm in bed." [SCAN OF CARTOON BY CAROLA GORDON (NEE BROTHERTON) WHO ENTERED NEW HALL IN 1961 AND IS NOW AN ARTIST IN EDINBURGH, HER WORK IS EXHIBITED AT THE COLLEGE]

Not all the women studied 'girlie' subjects; Jean Anscombe read mechanical sciences; at one time she was the only female undergraduate amongst 750 male engineers; "Lecturers were embarrassed if they told their male-only jokes when I was present – my fellow students would hiss in disapproval", she recalls.

New Hall undergraduates played their full part in University life: where else could you sing Messiah with David Willcocks, listen to Father Trevor Huddleston preach and borrow pictures by promising young artists to hang on your walls. Anne Wallis joined the Amateur Dramatic Club but after a few days of heavy sewing on the safety curtain – and fending off immoral proposals – she left it to others. During Rag Week she was one of the 'New Halle Orchestra' who toured Cambridge on the back of a lorry playing an assortment of mostly homemade instruments including a hunting horn. During her second year she went to a May Ball – "I made my own dress but cut things a bit fine and had to leave my boyfriend sewing up the hem whilst I went to have my hair done", she confesses. [SCAN OF NEWS PHOTO OF THE NEW HALLE ORCHESTRA c1962]

In 1964 New Hall left Silver Street for its new home on Huntingdon Road where it has continued to flourish. Now Pat Houghton from Foxton has helped to edit a collection of reminiscences, autobiographies and obituaries from some of the alumnae of those earlier years. It provides a unique insight into the careers of the girls who helped to pioneer a new college for ladies in what was essentially a male-dominated University. Many have gone on to take their Cambridge experiences with them around the world. They have pursued careers as diverse as their own backgrounds – as surgeons, actors, economists, teachers, engineers and mothers and all express their appreciation for being one of the New Hall 'women of moderate size'

Various readers have had memories stirred by recent 'Memories' articles. Percy Seeby from Trumpington contacted me to say that he used to play in a jazz quartet at the United States Hospital at Wimpole Park in the 1940s. Last weekend he was invited to the reunion of American servicemen who were based there.

Mrs P. Claydon from Newmarket recognised her aunt as one of the ladies in a photograph of Six Mile Bottom post office while Bill Barton of Burwell believes the gentleman could have been his great-grandfather [SCAN OF SIX MILE BOTTOM POST OFFICE]

Amy Cockett from Bromley in Kent has just received a copy of my article on Longstanton from the 6th July. She writes: "The photo of the village post office shows my grandmother, Charlotte Day, then a widow, at the door of her cottage and one of her other daughters, Jessie is also shown. The Rignall family ran the post office for years, transferring to the new one when it was replaced. [SCAN OF LONGSTANTON POST OFFICE]

She has sent me an article by Isabel Hughes that was published in the September 1996 issue of 'Yesterday' magazine, one of those published by Family Tree Magazine of Ramsey. Isabel was appointed headteacher of Longstanton School in 1948. Her initial impressions were not good: An enormous oil lamp was suspended from a beam on a rusty chain, not showing any sign of being lit for years. There was no electricity so the children went home early in winter. One day a child saw two rats eating the orange peel in the wire waste-paper basket – which also explained the rustling sounds in the toilet situated in a wooden lean-to shed at the end of the kitchen, with its own ventilation system of holes in the roof. The rat-catcher became a regular visitor. (On reflection the problems of New Hall seem not quite so bad after all!)

Then Longstanton expanded. The RAF built married quarters and one morning twenty children were waiting to be admitted to school. Each day more and more came along. Desks and chairs ran out and when forms arrived for the children to sit on there was no where to put them. The solution was to turn two nissen huts into a new junior school. But there were no teachers until two were appointed who had completed a one-year emergency training scheme (one of the uses of the huts at Wimpole Park).

Now Longstanton is bracing itself for another population explosion with proposals for a new town to be built on the old airfield site – itself in the headlines through the discovery of wartime bombs.

Memories 19th October 2005, by Mike Petty

The discovery of wartime bombs at Oakington airfield and their subsequent detonation has special resonance for Cyril Marsters of West Dereham near King's Lynn. During the war his father was appointed stationmaster at Wilburton, one of the stops on the Grunty Fen line from Ely to St Ives.

It was not really much of a responsibility. The line had already been closed to passenger traffic and only three freight trains passed through each day. The previous porter, office boy and signalman had been dispensed with and it was virtually a one-man operation. The morning milk and parcels train arrived at eight, two hours later came a goods train bringing any freight that had been consigned to the station and in the late afternoon another would arrive to take away loaded wagons back to Ely and the main line.

There were no signals: you knew when the train was expected and kept eyes and ears opened when it approached, making sure that the crossing gates on the minor road were closed in time. Only one day it was a near thing. Cyril's father had been taken to hospital and the relief stationmaster could only get to Wilburton by train, which meant somebody had to ensure the gates were open to allow it to get there.

This was a doddle, something that could be entrusted to the bright twelve-year old lad. Each morning he got up early and did his duty. But one morning it was foggy and he could not see along the line. Any sound was muffled by the mist but he knew the train should be near and it must be time to close the gates. Cyril had shut one when he heard a clanking in the fog and could see the small locomotive – now transformed into a speedy monster – bearing down on him. If he ran he would be hit by the heavy timbers of the gate as it shattered them, there was no option but to use every ounce of strength in his body to slam the gate shut just in time. The engine driver rushed back; he had seen the gates open just in front of him and feared the lad must have been crushed. It was the last time Cyril did that job! [SCAN OF WILBURTON STATION SHOWING THE CROSSING GATES; SCAN OF LOCOMOTIVE LIKE THAT WHICH NEARLY CRUSHED CYRIL]

But it was his brother Arthur's keen hearing that prevented a greater tragedy. At breakfast one morning in the autumn of 1940 he told his mother he had heard a strange noise in the night; something had scraped across the roof of the house. But there was nothing to be seen and it was dismissed as a dream.

A few weeks later their dad was helping to load a wagon with potatoes when he spotted a light-coloured object lying in a field. It was a large piece of cloth that turned out to be a parachute. Whatever or whoever had descended on it had disappeared into the sticky mud. It could not have been a man – it must have been a mine!

Dad phoned the police, the police called the military and everybody was told to evacuate. But the afternoon train was due and it was too late to stop it. Several trains had already passed without incident but this one came and left extremely gently.

Now it was time for everybody in the vicinity to get out and Cyril and his family were to some nights in St Peter's Hall while the bomb disposal people went to work. As with Oakington the bomb would have to be detonated where it lay.

When they were allowed to return they found the roof of the station had been punctured by falling debris, ceilings had cracked and buried in their settee was a thick piece of shrapnel four inches long. The blast had left a crater that looked large enough to take two of the nearby semi-detached cottages. It remained a reminder of their close encounter with a German bomb until a year later when a gang of Italian Prisoners of War arrived to fill it in. The one British soldier in charge seemed very relaxed about it all, even strolling off leaving his rifle propped up by the gate! But who would want to escape from Grunty Fen back to war-torn Europe?

Cyril moved on to other railway positions; he was a signaller and porter at Ely for a while, then a move to Cambridge. But it's his memories as a boy on a branch line that he has now committed to print, adding a new insight into wartime Cambridgeshire.

'Boy on a branch: a King's Lynn and Isle of Ely boyhood' by Cyril Marsters is published by the Horsley Press – ISBN 0 9524493 1 5 at

What do you remember of 1968? The answer is probably not very much.

Students were revolting: there were demonstrations at visits by Enoch Powell and Dennis Healey which led to calls for a curb on student political demonstrations. The German revolutionary 'Red' Rudi Dutschke came to Cambridge for treatment to a bullet wound received in Berlin. He was offered place at the University but the Home Office refused him permission to stay. Dons protested and the Cambridge Students Union mounted its first-ever national march in London. When the Home Secretary, Reginald Maudlin came to Cambridge to discuss it nobody would provide a room except the Leys School where police mounted the biggest security exercise ever seen in Cambridge to protect him.

Other University students were amongst those fighting the proposed demolition of the Cheddars Lane Sewage Pumping station, newly redundant after the new electric Riverside pump had opened. It was later to become the Cambridge Museum of Technology.

In Cambridge City Centre plans for the Lion Yard redevelopment were stalled after the Government stopped the council borrowing money; it would be a derelict site for 120 years councillors warned. But later that year the basic outline of the present scheme was accepted & Arup Associates were commissioned to prepare it in detail. [SCAN OF THE LION YARD SITE c1968]

There was change too within the University with the opening of the new History Faculty library; it was a year late and it leaked but won major architectural awards for its innovative design. Kings College chapel reopened after a major restoration with the painting of the Adoration of the Magi now displayed in its new setting as an altarpiece.

Now he would love to meet them again at a reunion on 12th November at the college in Gilbert Road. The building will be open from four o'clock for former pupils to look round with a disco and bar starting at 7.30pm You can phone him on Cambridge 743352 or email trebor30@tiscali.co.uk [SCAN OF CHESTERTON SCHOOL PREFECTS]

Memories 26th October 2005, by Mike Petty

There was some mild embarrassment at the Quay Mill Hotel on Friday evening where enthusiasts from around the world, including Australia, Germany, Holland and America, gathered for an International Conference of Slide-rule Collectors. For the welcoming brochure referred to the celebrations for the Battle of Trafalgar fought – according to their calculations - 250 years ago. But then who remembers how to operate slide-rules anyway!

Elsewhere this weekend it was the 200th anniversary that was marked with beacons, services and parades. But in Cambridge in October 1905 its centenary was something of a low-key affair.

True there were flags on public buildings and special sermons in Cambridge churches. The preacher at Great St Mary told his congregation that although the introduction of steam had revolutionised the art of naval warfare it still required the same qualities of pluck, grit, hardihood and determination from the fighters. But he then pointed out those very qualities had applied to the handful of Boers who had so embarrassed the British army in South Africa a few years earlier.

Nelson's final words, 'Thank God, I have done my duty' were probably echoed by the Mayor and corporation as they returned from the service. The commemoration had passed off peaceably. To have organised any large civic celebrations so near Bonfire Night would have been tantamount to inviting major disturbances from the University undergraduates and town youths.

But they were determined to grasp the occasion anyway and the police were ready for them.

Cambridge Market Hill was the traditional battle site for here there were wooden stalls that could easily be consigned to a bonfire, and it wouldn't be a rag without a bonfire. But police kept the crowds on the move so they headed off into Peas Hill and Bene't Street where an initial skirmish occurred. Then the students sneaked down King's Parade and St Mary's Passage to attack the Hill from that direction – but the police were waiting and they were driven back. Other attempts from other directions were also foiled.

Seeing which way the wind blew the mob retreated to the post office at the Sidney Street end of Petty Cury where, the News reported, 'two young men in caps and gowns – if one might hazard a guess they were Frenchmen, despite their rakish air – assumed the leadership'. They were joined by town lads who told them where to find a good supply of wood. Gathering a few kindred spirits the excited pair shouted 'Nelson' and headed off towards the Carlyle Road recreation ground. But to get there they had to cross Jesus Green footbridge and here a contingent of county police blocked their charges. [CARTOON OF AN UNDERGRADUATE ATTACK ON JESUS GREEN BRIDGE]

The students were not to be denied; two fires were started on Midsummer Common, one near Park Parade where half the houses were deprived of their railings to feed the flames. When police arrived on the scene and used their belts to beat off the undergraduates they fled towards Auckland Road and the fences of Brunswick Place. The two police constables stationed there were unable to combat so large a force of attackers and fled leaving house owners to defend their property.

Another attack was mounted on the houses surrounding Parker's Piece but the residents of Melbourn Place were used to such invasions and rallied to guard their railings. One garden seemed unprotected so the undergraduates set to work to remove its wooden fence only to beat a hasty retreat in the face of an infuriated Amazon who rushed out, swinging her broom. She then stood guard, lashing out at anybody who came within range. [CARTOON OF THE LADY WITH HER BROOM]

Her example was followed elsewhere until the mob having scoured Newmarket Road and Fitzroy Street - off which lay Nelson Street - quietly drifted away.

But the undergraduates did gain one major success; they may not have stormed a French man-of-war but they did seize a Cambridge horse tram going about its patrol in St Andrew's Street. The driver and conductor were powerless to repel an invasion by such a large number of undergraduates and soon the tram was one black mass of struggling beings. But despite it all the poor old horse did what his company expected and continued its stately plod towards the station. [CARTOON OF AN UNDERGRADUATE ATTACK ON THE TRAM]

By now however the streets were being patrolled by police reinforced by that most-feared of warriors, the University proctors and their bulldogs, and numbers of undergraduates were handed over to the authorities. The battle was over.

Next morning when the police reviewed the scene they were satisfied. By the normal scale of things this had been a comparatively sedate affair. Through their careful policy of defence-in-depth and the strategic placement of their forces they had avoided what would have been a major blow to their reputation. They had allowed the enemy roam the common to the south of the river but had denied them the ultimate prize.

By keeping them away from Victoria Bridge they had prevented a double battle of Trafalgar – this one of Trafalgar Lane and Trafalgar Road, Chesterton [SCAN OF TRAFALGAR ROAD – SEEK A BETTER ONE IN THE NEWS LIBRARY].

Memories 2nd November 2005, by Mike Petty

I was grateful for the presence of male members of the St John Ambulance Brigade last week. I had been invited to give a talk to a meeting organised by Norfolk Federation of Women's Institutes held in a sports hall at Wymondham College and when scanning the upturned faces of over 450 Norfolk ladies it was comforting to know that help was there if needed. In the event all passed off without the need for trained medical assistance.

Then a day or two later Ted Mudd from Cambridge shared with me his experiences of serving in the Brigade. He writes: "I joined the St. John Ambulance just before the Second World War. The Headquarters in those days was in the Falcon Yard, just beyond the Macfisheries shop and during the blackouts the smell of fish continually surrounding it night and day was a useful aid to its location. Here we worked our way through the St. John Handbook from beginning to the end, memorising every detail required to administer good First Aid. We passed our examinations and were issued with our uniforms which were second-hand, but fortunately fitted quite well.

"When the War started the St. John Ambulance continued to provide service for a variety of occasions such as cinema screenings and football matches though some other community events, such as fairs and fetes, ceased temporarily. Our training continued as before, but now many of us found ourselves required to also become involved in Civil Defence. First Aid Posts were established around Cambridge and I was attached to the one in Auckland Road, just off Newmarket Road.

“I spent several nights each week in blue denim uniform with civilian duty gas mask and an army-type helmet. When the sirens sounded we mounted our bicycles and rode to our First Aid Post. We often slept on tubular wire mesh stretchers covered with blankets and pillows or sometimes on the operating table which could be made quite comfortable.

“We were also involved in helping evacuees arriving at the Railway Station while many civilian patients from London Hospitals arrived on stretcher in special trains who we helped get to hospitals. Blood was needed and as many donors as possible were asked to volunteer. My colleague and I spent several days helping to move blood supplies and assist where required.

“The First Aid course was deemed insufficient due to the difficult demands at the time so we took Nursing and Midwifery courses to extend our usefulness. The noise and stress of war caused premature births and miscarriages, both of which needed our help. There were also far more cases of fainting in general, due to extreme cases of shock. Some of these were in Cinemas where 'emotional' faints often occurred. At one time when Chipperfield's Circus was in Cambridge; I had to administer first aid to a ballerina who had damaged her ankle by falling from a horse and also treat an animal-keeper who was clawed by a bear.

“I worked at the Unicam factory on Arbury Road where because I had First Aid knowledge, I was called upon to give unpaid medical assistance. Many people who were working there for the first time received cuts because of the different types of machinery, sharp cutters and materials unknown to them in normal circumstances. The factory had a look-out person on the roof whose job was to sound a klaxon noise whenever enemy aircraft were heading our way. This was the signal for staff to take cover under the workbenches until the all-clear was sounded. On one particularly hot summer's day when we had many women workers of all ages in the factory the sudden alert and extreme heat caused several to faint under the benches with stress. First Aid was called for; smelling salts and care were needed for some who had injured themselves falling down in their haste to take cover.

“St. John Ambulance men and women were very much involved in many ways during the war. Very little has been published in this year's anniversary of the War and I feel their varied and considerable efforts should be recognised and not forgotten. It is still an important organisation that continues to support the community by being present at a variety of events, venues and situations”

As Ted says such groups were established in various villages and I have a picture of the combined St John Ambulance and Red Cross group that was based at Stretham post office. [SCAN OF STRETHAM RED CROSS GROUP]. Roy Chamberlain from Foxton also served in the St John Ambulance and has lent me a picture of them in action during a motorcycle scramble in the 1950s. The picture of policemen on their motor bikes has brought memories for several readers. Shirley Langley, from Cambridge identifies them as Fred Boon, Harold Holden and her father, Fred (always called "Herb") Ward. The photograph was taken when they went to the Triumph factory in Coventry to collect the new red motor cycles. Her dad retired in 1948, so she reckons the photograph was taken towards the end of the war, or just after it was over. Connie Baker from Gt Shelford has good reason to remember Herb as he was the best man at her wedding on 9th August 1941. Her late husband, Chief Inspector Phil Baker rode one of the motorcycles for a time. Roger Coleman from Cambridge does not know the men, but does know the bikes. They are Triumph 500cc 'Speed Twins' with consecutive 'FCE' Cambridge registrations dating from the end of 1946, early 1947. They incorporate features introduced just after the war and would have been a major achievement for the police to have taken delivery of such desirable machines at the time, as vehicles were so scarce. What do you remember of 1968? Phil Cheesmur, who now lives in Linton, was struggling to maintain order at Chesterton Community College in Gilbert Road. He was one of the school prefects who took time off to pose for their photograph – a copy of which he's sent me. He still remembers their names: back row Richard Crane, Doug Webdell, Brain Dunn, Mike Jones, Dave Thornton, Trevor Amiss, Malcolm Taylor, Robert Fell; front row John Munden, Wally Esau, Phil Cheesmur, Mark Hill-Tout and Keith Lloyd. Now he would love to meet them again at a reunion on 12th November at the college in Gilbert Road. The building will be open from four o'clock for former pupils to look round with a disco and bar starting at 7.30pm You can phone him on Cambridge 743352 or email trebor30@tiscali.co.uk [SCAN OF CHESTERTON SCHOOL PREFECTS]

Memories 9th November 2005, by Mike Petty

As Armistice Day approaches once more so memories of the now distant days of the Second World War are revived for many people who just cannot help remembering.

Recently I had the privilege of sharing some of the events of Cambridge during the years 1939 to 1945 with retired members of Cambridge University Engineering Department. What little I told them was more than matched by what great knowledge they themselves had.

They told me of the wartime spy who had mixed with refugees, of firewatching in Holland Street, of the bombing of Sturton Street chapel and a horrific incident in Hills Road. A man and his wife were sheltering near the Globe pub during one particular raid in January 1941 when the blast from an exploding bomb killed her and ripped his arm off.

Now Simon Brook from St Paul's church is seeking your help to add further to the details of such incidents in that parish. The memorial plaque recording the names of those who died has become illegible and the church has obtained funding to restore it. But there are several names that are just that – names and initials - and he would like to know more.

Simon says that on Thursday 16 January 1941, following troop movements on the ground, enemy aircraft launched a sudden bombing raid which left a path of destruction and loss of life in its wake. Two hundred incendiaries fell on the Gonville Place area. Some penetrated the Perse School for Boys, setting the building ablaze. At that time the school was located opposite the Catholic Church, whose clock was also hit and put out of action until the end of the war.

The bombing caused mayhem and destroyed buildings along the north end of Hills Road. Miraculously, only three people died during the raid with many bombs falling on open spaces. One bomb damaged the Blantyre Home for the Blind and shattered the windows in St Paul's Church. The east window, which depicted the crucifixion scene, was irreparably damaged.

The raid on 'An East Anglian Town' was reported in the Cambridge Daily News, although due to censorship they could not report all the details; the impact on St Paul's was mentioned briefly: “a famous church was among other places where incendiaries fell without causing damage”

But at the time the wrecked building was a shocking sight to all who knew it in its former glory. Overnight the quietly confident mood of the local community had been transformed to one of extreme fear and insecurity. However, led by their curate, Bill Lee, the congregation was determined to continue to worship in the church - now a rather gloomy place because of the boarded-up windows and the limited supply of electricity.

The church railings were removed to be melted down for the war effort and a firewatching team was based in the church tower. Their log book from 12 September 1941 until 30 August 1943 has survived and is now in the care of the Cambridgeshire Record Office.

Amid all the activity during the clean-up, few people noticed two visitors who dropped in to an evening service shortly after the air raid. Both were Canadian Protestant chaplains, Bob Sneyd and his friend Ray McCleary, who were serving in East Anglia.

Bob was assigned to the Second Canadian Infantry Division. When on leave, he would often take the opportunity to worship in an English church. He had a passion for stained glass and would collect pieces from bomb-damaged churches. Before leaving St Paul's, he picked up several pieces of brightly coloured glass from the east window and took them away with him. But his visit was to have an even more significant and lasting meaning that would come to light only decades later.

Once the war was over, the most important matter for St Paul's was to erect a memorial to their parishioners. They decided it should be placed outside the building on the west wall of the tower, for all to see from Hills Road and in 1953 the former Curate, Bill Lee, was invited back to unveil it.

It was not until December 1958 that the War Damage Commission authorised the replacement of the wrecked east window by a new one depicting the ascended Jesus speaking to Saul, who after his conversion on the road to Damascus became St Paul. With the church and its congregation having put the war years behind them, the brief visit by the Canadian chaplain and his friend could have been forgotten forever.

But years later a Canadian television crew turned up at St Paul's unexpectedly at the end of a morning service, to enquire about the bombing of the east window. They were working on a documentary about the Canadian chaplain Bob Sneyd. Bob had taken all those salvaged pieces of broken glass back home with him where they were made up into a new stained glass window in a Toronto church. Among them was the head of a figure from the crucifixion scene in the wrecked east window from St Paul's.

That fragment had especial memories for Bob. Back in the 1940s, about twenty girls from the Cottage Home, which later became a Barnardo Home, used to worship regularly at the evening service in St Paul's Church. During his brief visit Bob met its Warden and later that year he and his wife adopted one of the girls, Joyce, then just seven years old.

In December 1941, Bob had watched Joyce sail with an escort to Canada where her new family was waiting for her. After the war Bob returned too and every time he attended that Toronto church and looked at those pieces of broken glass from a crucifixion scene it reminded him of the way wartime tragedy had brought him a daughter

The commemoration services at the weekend were a poignant reminder of the impact of war on people and places. But thanks to those who fought, our county has remained free from the trauma of seeing armies storm into our village high streets to wreak havoc on our communities.

But it was not always so, as two new books on Burwell remind us. Back in the 1100s we were suffering from the ravages of a civil war between two contenders to the English throne, King Stephen and Queen Matilda. And in a period of anarchy powerful men will take the opportunity to pillage and rape. In those days the villain-in-chief was the Earl of Essex, Geoffrey de Mandeville who with an army of mercenaries seized the Island of Ely, drove the monks from Ramsey Abbey and plundered, ransacked and burnt Cambridge. Nobody was safe as he laid waste to large areas of the countryside; farmers feared to plough and sow, so famine added to the hardship. He did not hesitate to use every type of torture to extract ransom from anybody unfortunate enough to fall into his hands.

King Stephen could not get his armies through the marshy fenland so he set about to construct a ring of castles around the edge in an attempt to keep de Mandeville confined. One of these was at Burwell but before it was completed Geoffrey attacked. During the battle that followed he raised his helmet to survey the scene and an archer seized the opportunity to take aim; his arrow merely nicked Geoffrey's ear, but the wound turned septic and he died at Mildenhall. With his death peace returned to the countryside.

But then in 1851 the invaders were back, and once more Burwell people put up a struggle against them. The issue was land that villagers claimed belonged to the poor; when a court ruled differently they refused to accept the judgement. The authorities saw no option but to send in a strong body of police from Scotland Yard to impose order. News of their approach spread and the village crier called on everybody to 'come this day to do his duty'. Negotiations took place at the Fox Inn during which one villager threatened the police superintendent with a shovel and a magistrate produced his pistol, threatening to shoot unless he dropped it. Despite their efforts the police could not enforce the court's ruling and there was nothing for it but to send for the soldiers.

Hundreds of Burwell men assembled on the disputed land prepared to resist anybody – except the red-coats. Memories of earlier attacks on the poor at Littleport back in 1816 were still fresh in their minds and they knew they could not resist in the face of professional troops. The first to arrive was a contingent of the 48th Regiment of Foot to be followed by the cavalry of the 11th Hussars. Now with army backing the police could arrest the ringleaders and drag them to the Fox before conveying them by omnibus to Cambridge castle to face trial. Peace restored, the horse-soldiers galloped away but the other troops remained for month or so to ensure order.

The incident was reported at great length in the Cambridge Chronicle whose editorial hoped this would change the character of the labourers of Burwell. Hitherto the village had been proverbial for a having a large number of idle and disorderly persons who never seemed to work but were invariably in the public house.

But the same stories go around and around. In April 1892 the paper was reporting that ruffianly gangs had taken over to the village such an extent that nobody dare give information against them. Shepherds and farm servants ran the risk of assault if they ventured to enter a protest against acts of wilful violence and it was as difficult for the Queen's writ to run in Burwell as in some of the more turbulent portions of Ireland. There was an urgent need for more police especially during Newmarket races when every available man had to be drafted in to that corner of the county, leaving the lawless elements in other parts an almost open field for their violent incursions. Given some updating of the language it could almost be a quote from a modern issue of the News.

Tracking down information on such activities is not easy. William Franklin has spent months trawling through ancient documents in the University Library and County Record Office to produce his scholarly book, 'Burwell, the history of a fen-edge village' which principally concentrates on the earlier period. It has been published by Heritage Marketing and sells for £17.95, ISBN 0 9544456 9 4.

But a team of many people have had a hand in compiling the 'Burwell Chronicle' with its stories of village life. First there were the reporters who sent their despatches to the Cambridge Chronicle's office where editors and printers produced that week's paper. Then somebody made sure that a copy of each issue was preserved and bound until eventually the massive volumes ended up in the Cambridge Cambridgeshire Collection at Lion Yard Library. In the 1970s a major project was initiated to index the news for every village in Cambridgeshire and the Isle of Ely between 1770 and 1899, unlocking a wealth of material never previously available. Then in the 1980s Sue Burgess sat down to laboriously copy out each Burwell story. Her notes found their way to members of the Burwell History Society for typing, checking, annotating, indexing each name, securing funding and eventually publishing. It is now on sale in the Post Office for £8.95

If you have a Burwell connection, or even if you don't, then next weekend is a good time to visit. Memories 23rd November 2005, by Mike Petty

The appointment of the new High Sheriff marks a continuation of an office that is now largely ceremonial. The position dates back to before the Norman Conquest and the sheriff was once the king's representative in the country and its principal law enforcement officer

I recall being told by Geoffrey Vinter of Thriplow how he had been High Sheriff at the time when the Government was expected to announce the abolition of hanging any day. He was dining one evening when he received a phone call from the Governor of Bedford Gaol to say that they were due to execute a prisoner next morning. Should they go ahead or delay for a day or so? Geoffrey advised delay and, as expected, the change in policy was announced and the man lived.

But not all have worked for the benefit of their citizens. In the early days sheriff of Cambridge was responsible for ensuring that the Great Bridge (Magdalene Bridge) was maintained in good repair and raised taxes for this purpose. But an enquiry in 1276 discovered that one had diverted the money to other uses with the result that the bridge became so unsafe that people had to cross by a ferry boat. This was owned by the sheriff who charged people for crossing, pocketing the additional revenue.

Cambridge being Cambridge there have been times when the Sheriff and his deputy have clashed with the University authorities. One such was in 1547 after University proctors had cracked down on 'evil persons in houses of sin' at Stourbridge Fair. They took them to the town gaol on the Market Hill, but the Mayor refused to hand over the keys to let them lock their prisoners up. So they hauled them up to Cambridge Castle where they left them in custody only for the Mayor's son to let them out again. At this the University sent letters of complaint to Archbishop Cranmer and the Mayor together with the undersheriff (who happened to be his son-in-law) were hauled before the Privy Council to answer for their actions. Subsequently sheriffs had to swear an oath to defend the peace and privileges of the University

Some light on the inner workings of the University's own rule-enforcement machinery was revealed by David Bennett, who served as one of the University Constables in 1984-85. Known by graduates and dons alike as 'Bulldogs' the constables traditionally needed to be 'fleet of foot and strong in arm' as they escorted the Proctors, the University disciplinary officers, to apprehend scholars committing misdemeanours in breach of University regulations.

But their role too was largely ceremonial. David described how in his uniform of a dark blue tailcoat, waistcoat and trousers with white shirt, black tie and top-hat, and draped in a cloak with gold buttons, he observed at first hand the various university ceremonials inside the Senate House.

But on one occasion Town and Gown came face to face, and the High Sheriff was part of the act as well.

One morning in March 1985 a University procession left the Senate House en route to the Master's Lodge at Trinity College. Here the constables waited outside together with the University Bedell and Marshall, their maces sparkling in the spring sunshine, while the Vice Chancellor and Proctors entered to meet the High Sheriff (then Major William Birkbeck) and the Circuit Judge who was to hear cases at the Assize Court in the Guildhall and traditionally lodged at Trinity.

Facing them across the courtyard were the Mayor of Cambridge, Councillor Eddie Cowell, in his full regalia together with the Sergeant at Arms, Ken Quick, resplendent in bright red overcoat and top-hat. There too were three bailiffs in long blue cloaks and the town clerk in black gown, white bib and wig and the mace-bearer with the gold mace

As the University party left the Master's Lodge so the Corporation contingent advanced towards them. This time there was no animosity as each raised their respective head-gear in a mark of respect

However the highlight of David's year of office was Sunday 17th March 1985, and a cold night he spent at the ADC Theatre, checking the tickets of those attending a performance that attracted a large crowd of spectators in the street outside. The press were out in quantity, as were both uniformed and plain-clothed police.

There was some excitement at the arrival of Prince Edward, who turned up on foot and was later to be seen on stage apparently in an intoxicated state – though he was acting. But he was not the main attraction.

The main cheers were reserved for the arrival of a limousine containing both the Queen and Princess Margaret who were attending a Royal Gala evening in aid of charity. David came smartly to attention like a toy soldier, motionless, his eyes fixed as the royal sisters passed by to take their seats. Then he chatted to the chauffeur before the performance ended and it was time to ensure all departed safely before he could take his own farewell and journey home to his wife Linda to share his memories.

Later he set down his experiences in ‘The Office of Constable, a personal account that was distributed to friends and colleagues many of whom attended his funeral service at Comberton last year. Memories 30th November 2005, by Mike Petty Christopher Tongue from Abington in Northamptonshire has been stimulated to share his memories of a childhood in Hills Road, Cambridge during the war.

He writes: “I was born at the Brunswick Nursing Home, which faced Midsummer Common, during an afternoon snowstorm in March 1937, then taken to our newly-occupied home at 6, Hills Road (now Carter Jonas). This was a three-storied elegant dwelling with steps up to the front door, high ceilings, large windows and with a semi-basement entered by more stone steps next to and below the front garden.

“My mother used the downstairs front room as a fitting room, for she was a ‘Court Dressmaker’, with a high-class clientele which included peeresses, and the wives of college dons, town businessmen and many a spinster lady. Elsewhere was a workroom with several seamstresses. My mother’s name, Constance E. Pyle, was spelt out in gold lettering across the façade of the building. The rest of the house was entirely ours and a nursery was prepared for me in the basement front room. My mother’s busy life was made easier by a daily housemaid and cook, who lived elsewhere.

“My father was employed in a merchant bank in the City of London, travelling up to the capital and back six days a week by train, which was partly the reason for living near the railway station.

“I cannot claim any unusual early memories, apart from having happy, sweet-producing meetings with my grandfather, Robert Pyle, who used to slip into our back garden unannounced by way of a door in our garage facing Union Street. He had been a chimney sweep with his own business, dislodging the soot from many of the college chimneys. Now he lived with his sister Rose and her husband Joe Fairweather who ran the ‘Oak’ public house opposite the Catholic Church.

“The outbreak of the Second World War passed me by though I do remember the blackout curtains made for the nursery windows, enlivened with stencilled scenes of Dutchmen and windmills. Apparently for a short time I was removed from the nursery to make way for my father’s sister and two children from London but they returned when enemy action failed to occur and it was restored to me. I was found a live-in full-time nursemaid who had been professionally trained for the job. She came from Oakington and has kept in touch ever since. She tells me she saw, through the window of the nursery half-way below ground, the tramping feet and legs of the careworn soldiers returning from Dunkirk.

“Next to my nursery was the dank and narrow brick-lined wine cellar, covered with flaking whitewash. Into this claustrophobic place the whole household would descend in dressing gowns, whenever there was an air-raid warning. I never really understood what was going on, but was very bored.

“My nursemaid was treated as one of the family, and slept in a box-room at the top of the house. But she was downstairs with me when the bombs fell on the night of January 16th, 1941. We were not in the wine cellar but in the nursery when the blast blew out the plate glass window of the house facing the main road, and she threw herself over my bed to protect me as shards of glass showered over us and embedded themselves in the bedclothes. Outside in the street, and in view from our house, the Perse School was burning fiercely.

“My mother became an air raid warden for the Cintra House stretch along the main road and I remember the cache of stirrup pumps and sand buckets. She got to know the publican of the ‘Globe’ quite well – a Mr Ward who was a ‘sporting man’ with a taste for horse racing (and betting), hare coursing and dogs. He left his wife to run the pub and they kept exotic parrots with mixed vocabularies, in the back room. I recall the unique beery smell he exuded, which was foreign to my experience.

“From June 1940 my father, though still working in London, had joined the Home Guard and disappeared every Sunday morning. I have bright memories of his return home in uniform for a traditional Sunday lunch, seated at the dining room table with all the cutlery and glass shining. In 1942, to his great chagrin, he was called up to the regular army.

“Mother’s workpeople often included seamstresses who had fled from Nazi Vienna when the talk I overheard included allusions to a happier life under Franz Joseph and the waltz kings. One of my mother’s ‘girls’ was killed in a Brighton hotel while on a weekend visit.

“When the time came for schooling I merely crossed over Hills Road to the Shrubbery School opposite and when on one occasion I was kept at home because of a childhood illness the headmistress personally delivered to me a jelly to cheer me up. This proved that, although she looked like a witch, wearing her black teacher’s gown on all occasions, she was well disposed to me.

“As time went on the town became full of American servicemen. On one memorable day I joined an eager group of Cambridge children for a party they organised at the ‘Bull Hotel’ in Trumpington Street, where every kind of toy and food was available for our delight. There were presents and parcels and items we had never seen before such as linen discs filled with beans, which were to be thrown about like quoits. It was so bright and colourful after all the prevailing drabness.

“In 1945 with the coming of peace my parents decided to move to a large terraced house in Bateman Street which had lain unoccupied throughout the war because the German architect tenant had been interned or fled back to Germany. We moved into our new dwelling on V.J. Day and became acquainted with our new neighbours by dancing round the bonfire which had been built in the middle of the road, regardless of traffic”

Memories, 7th December 2005, by Mike Petty

With the current interest in archaeology encouraged by programmes such as ‘Time Team’ it is easy to forget that people have been investigating the buried past for generations. But although their discoveries may have been properly written up, less is known about the diggers themselves.

In 1932 a young group of amateur and professional archaeologists, geologists, botanists and geographers gathered in the Upper Parlour of Peterhouse and, like all good University scholars formed themselves into a committee. Unlike many such bodies however the Fenland Research Committee actually did things and for eight years were active in investigating early life in the inhospitable landscape of the fens, the extinct forests which had once covered large tracts of the area and the history of the formation of the North Sea.

Their work heralded a widespread change in manner of approach to archaeological problems in Britain. In addition to introducing new methods such as pollen analysis, the Committee's interdisciplinary co-operation was a forerunner of what has today become an inescapable feature of modern science.

Over time, the Committee's research became widely known and highly respected. At peak membership, 42 specialists drawn from all over England worked on this committee and fruitfully combined the resources of many disciplines.

Local people from Ely and the surrounding villages were vital participants in their activities. One of these was Major Gordon Fowler who was the transport manager for the Ely Beet-sugar Factory. Other names are less well-known: F.M. Walker was interested in Manea, Wyman Abbott was active in the area around Peterborough and H.L. Bradfer-Lawrence was based near King's Lynn, but who knows more about them?

One of the leading members of the group was the Anglo-Saxon archaeologist, Tom Lethbridge, and before her untimely death his wife, Mrs Mina Lethbridge, gave her friend, Pamela Jane Smith, several unidentified photographs of the Committee's work.

Now Pamela would be extremely grateful if anyone could let her know anything about the some of the pictures, all of which were taken in the fenland area during the 1920s and 1930s.

One of the group's main areas of interest was Peacock's Farm at Shippea Hill where a small sandhill was emerging from the shrinking peat. Excavations revealed remarkable evidence for early occupation of this isolated spot and in the autumn of 1932 delegates to an International Congress held in London journeyed out deep into the fens to view the site. Their visit was photographed, so Pamela knows it happened, but has no further information. [SCAN OF THE VISITORS PEERING INTO A HOLE WHILE THE HARVEST CONTINUES BEHIND THEM]

Not all her pictures are of people deep in trenches; one shows a man and boy standing behind a massive Gunnera plant, but who are they and where was it taken? Various readers have identified faces in last week's picture of the staff of King and Harper's garage in Hills Road. Dot Sadler from Stretham worked there as a cashier just after the war and recognised the foreman, Billy Walton, in the white coat, Reg Golding in glasses and long overcoat on the right and Tommy Hart, an electrician. Diann Rouse spotted her dad, Jim Adams, in the centre of the back row, the shorter of the two lads wearing caps. At the time of the photograph he would have been a 16-year-old apprentice. Jim died in October of this year at the age of 89. [SCAN OF KING AND HARPER FROM LAST WEEK]

D.A. Winter and his wife have been sorting some photographs found amongst his late brother's effects and come across several that puzzle them. They know that his wife Doris was in service with the Heffer family until she had to leave to nurse her mother about 1938 as she had an inlaid games table which they had which she said came from them, perhaps on her leaving. They believe the snaps may have been taken at 'Willowbrook', in Chaucer Road, Cambridge and include the house, the gardener, a lady and gentleman who could be servants and three females, perhaps members of the Heffer family.

'Rus in Urbe', the history of Chaucer and Latham roads, shows it was indeed home to George Heffer, a senior cashier at Barclay's Bank in Cambridge, his mother Mary and two unmarried sisters, Kate and Lucy. They were later joined by another unmarried sister, Emma, who had been matron of a nursing home in Newmarket Road. She often took her parrot along when shopping, going to the head of the queue at Fitzbillies pastry shop. But can you name the gardener? Violet Ryder, nee Payne, has sent me her memories of the British Red Cross during the war which also give an insight into working conditions at the Cambridge Instrument Company at that time.

She writes: "If I could have chosen a career for myself, I would have liked to have trained as a nurse. However, my mother was a widow and we could not afford to pay for the books, uniform and exams. So I started work as a housemaid in a big house near Girton College in 1940. I had just two half days off a week, working from breakfast to suppertime, for seven shillings and sixpence a week. From this I was expected to buy my own uniform, cap and apron. I was very pleased to escape this life when later on in that year I was called up for War Work and went to work at the Cambridge Scientific Instrument Company.

"I started in 'Shop K' making jam thermometers for Chivers & Robertson. The casing was either metal or silver plated and if the mercury inside escaped it attacked our gold wedding rings. When this happened we had to go to Dr Jessop to have them cleaned. Balls of mercury often rolled about on the bench, but we were ignorant of any danger they might have caused us. We also packed the thermometer sheaths in strings of asbestos, again with no knowledge of the potential danger. I later moved to the plating shop and remember one day having a lump of hair pulled out by a machine, luckily my hair was quite bushy, so the loss wasn't too obvious.

"It was while working there that I joined their first aid team led by Mr Dean, who had been in the Army Medical Corp. I also joined the British Red Cross Society and am still a member more than 60 years later. After work and on Sundays I went on Red Cross duty at Emmanuel College sick bay for RAF air men, the Leys School sick bay and the Gog Magog sick bay for London evacuees. In 1940 there was no penicillin, the wounds of the injured had nets over them to try to prevent infection by stopping the flies going on them. Another Red Cross duty at this time was helping at the blood donor sessions at the laboratories in Tennis Court Road. These were supervised by an old army doctor, who expected everyone to be brave, no matter how rough he was with them"

Violet has sent me two photos, one of the Instrument Company First Aid Detachment in February 1942 and another of some of the same people taken 50 years later. It shows Jim Laughton, Ron Ryder Bill Askham, Reg Smith, on the back row with Violet, Iris Christmas, Cyril Ryder (Violet's husband) and Dicky Luff in front. [SCAN OF THE INSTRUMENT COMPANY FIRST AID DETACHMENT FEB 1942 AND A REUNION 50 YEARS LATER, VIOLET IS SECOND FROM THE LEFT IN THE MIDDLE ROW OF THE OLD PICTURE AND ON THE LEFT FRONT ROW IN THE LATER ONE]

Old school photographs are very interesting to the people who were actually at that school at that time but many of the faces have now been forgotten, even on snaps taken in more recent years. So on first glance a picture of Ely Market Street Infants class taken 105 years ago is unlikely to mean much to anyone. Keith Moore of Hadstock found it when he bought some old photo frames in a junk shop at Saffron Walden. But what makes this one very special is that it includes not only the names of the children but also where they were living. There are so many names that are still around today including two Morris brothers from West End both of whom were killed in the Great War, C. Garner and E. Holland lived nearby in West Fen Road, E. Barwick near E. Houghton in Fore Hill, A. Lemon in Broad Street, A. Haylock in Market Street, Ted Wayman and E. King in Silver Street and C. Woodbine in Fieldside. The teachers, Miss Rickwood and Miss Burchall are on the back row. Memories 21st December 2005, by Mike Petty

Reminiscences of times past have come in from three villages across the county.

Joe Newell has focussed on Holywell-cum-Needlingworth where he was born in 1921; he spent his childhood at Manor Farm, then a mixed arable and dairy farm struggling through the agricultural depression of the inter-war years. Joe has gathered together a number of photographs and paintings, some by Robert Winter who lived most of his life in the village and whose works now sell at Sotherbys and others by Arthur Anderson Fraser

Amongst the snapshots is one of Norah Tabbitt with her hoop, she was later to become a teacher at Over school, crossing the river by the ferry with her bicycle thus saving at least seven miles on the alternative road route. Fred Tabbitt was herdsman to the Holywell pigs, an acknowledged expert on the breeding programme he travelled to Europe with stock though he had no formal education. Elsewhere David Tabbitt is shown weighing up fruit in 2lb chip baskets at a time when whole families would be on the go, dawn till dusk, seven days a week to gather the crop. The nearby Houghton and Wyton Local History Society have also been busy on the publications front, though they have not produced a book. Instead they have commissioned two CD-Roms to open up the past to present researchers. One is a genealogical survey of the Goodman family who lived at Elm in the late 17th-century. It was compiled and published by Albert Goodman in 1911 in a limited typescript edition.

In almost any country village any family which may have been very numerous at one period, will be found to be almost entirely extinct, or lost sight of a hundred or so years afterwards. Albert gives one explanation. "Upon our father becoming a widower he entered into a mutual agreement with Mrs. Matthew Tebbutt, a widow to whom he had previously paid his addresses, that whichever of the two families should first become total orphans should be taken to live under the care of the other. So it was that the Goodman children took up abode with Mrs Tebbutt, her son and three daughters at her house which then had had to be enlarged by the addition at the back of a large sitting room with two bedrooms above.

Albert's sister Mary, who married a Tebbutt, always signed herself 'Mary Goodman Tebbutt', and he had several nephews and nieces with that surname who had twice as much Goodman blood in their veins as Tebbutt.

Things could go wrong, even in those days. At one wedding the minister had forgotten the certificate so Charles Tebbutt galloped on his fast brown horse to St. Ives and back to obtain it. There was no way the service could be eked out so long and so the congregation started the wedding breakfast, returning to the chapel to complete the ceremony once the paperwork had arrived.

The Tebbutts also feature on a second disk which includes notes on Potto Brown, the Huntingdonshire non-conformist who financed the building of chapels and churches in the county, together with the reminiscences of his elder son, Bateman Brown, and notes on the Union Chapel at Houghton. All were issued more than 100 years ago and have become very rare, now they can be consulted on a computer. [SCAN OF PAINTING OF HOUGHTON BY WILLIAM WATT MILNE OR FIND PICTURE OF HOUGHTON FROM NEWS LIBRARY]

But there is nothing like a book and Valerie Bloye has been encouraging Haddenham villagers to set down their reflections. There are most interesting accounts of the village brick industry, the surgery and bakery. Joyce Thulbon remembers journeying with her father to deliver bread by horse and trap around the village, from Station Road to Aldreth in the morning, Hill Row to Lode Way in the afternoon and down to Earith bridge on Saturday evenings. Sunday afternoons had to be very quiet in their house as her father took a nap before working all night to get the ovens hot and ready for baking again first thing in the morning.

This book too has a Tebbutt connection: Miss Jessie Tebbutt was very well-known and highly regarded and one of the founders of the Friends of Haddenham set up just after the War as one of the first local history / conservation groups in the county. They initiated a series of photographic displays at the Young Farmers' Shows, forming the nucleus of a fine collection of pictures now available at the village library, and organised tractor rides to show newcomers that the fens are neither flat nor boring.

Taken together the contributions paint a unique picture of a Cambridgeshire community including the wide range of organisations from amateur dramatics to men's interest group, old-time dancing, cubs and meals-on-wheels. It shows that village life – at least in Haddenham – is probably more diverse than it has ever been. Memories 28 Dec 2005, by Mike Petty

It is our routine in the week leading up to Christmas to forsake Cambridgeshire for the charms of the Bull Hotel in Long Melford where, snug by the big open fire we can watch the merry-makers celebrate in their way, as we do in ours. During the day there are book and antique shops to browse before pottering off to find somewhere nearby for a sandwich at lunchtime. Thus it was that we arrived at the half-timbered Bell Hotel in Clare and sought a seat by their fire where we joined another couple we had never met before. But such is the way of the world that we discovered two common interests – the Fish and Duck and Grunty Fen. [SCAN OF THE HALF-TIMBERED BELL INN AT CLARE IN OCTOBER 1986 AND THE HALF-WOODEN FISH AND DUCK AT LITTLE THETFORD AS IT WAS BEFORE 1972]

The former is not quite half-timbered, just mostly wood. It stands at Pope's Corner near Little Thetford, where the Old West and Cam join, a most attractive spot for an inn that has seen mixed fortunes since it was built in the 1820s to serve folk arriving by water. In a sale document of 1852 it was described as a new-built brick, timber and slate house with seven rooms and stabling for twelve horses. A new road down to the pub was constructed in 1968 and it was modernised and extended in 1972. In June 1980 it was relaunched as a riverside nightclub with a discotheque, and top music personalities were booked including Radio 1 disc jockey Dave Lee Travis and disco dancers Pan's People. It was hoped to make it one of the top night spots in East Anglia. Sadly it did not achieve its aim but still attracts a good crowd on summer afternoons.

That can also be said for Grunty Fen, a low-lying area separating Wilburton and Stretham from Wentworth and Witchford, for it is home to a waste recycling tip and sundry car-breakers yards. It has in recent years achieved greater fame through the exploits of 'Dennis of Grunty Fen', that tale-telling alter-ego of Pete Sayers, who died this year. No longer will he regale audiences as he did when he gatecrashed the opening of the Cambridge Heritage Showcase in Lion Yard Library and led the assembled dignitaries in a chorus of 'Fen tigers got dewdrops on their nose, Fen tigers got webs between their toes' [SCAN OF 'DENNIS OF GRUNTY FEN']

'Dennis' was not the first to describe such anatomical features. Writing in 1930 Dr Charles Lucas of Burwell reported how he had been told by a Londoner, who had lodged in the fen, that all the girls had yellow spotted bellies and the men webbed feet. Lucas added that "he himself had known webbed fingers and webbed toes would not bother anybody". One man who knew the area well was Alfred Sulman the Wilburton village postman for many years. In order to get a delivery established he did the round for a whole year for no pay walking the village first, then the Twentypence Road before heading down Grunty Fen.

Albert Pell recalled in 1908 how he had to take a boat to visit one Grunty Fen house in rainy times and moored it to the door latch with a short piece of cord. Jeremiah Fenn went back somewhat further as he reminisced about the 1830s: "There was paths through the reeds and stuff to Wilburton and Haddenham from Winfer (Wentworth). One evening I went with father to cross the fen to see grandmother but in the afternoon a thunderstorm had beaten the reeds down over the path; we missed it and got lost. It was getting dark and father took me in his arms and laid down to sleep till it got light. Dear heart what a night that was. Owls and things came and screeched at us. I though they were ghostes, and some of these buttleebumps kept on saying 'Bump, bump, bump' all the time".

The low-lying basin was one of the last areas of fenland to be drained in the 1860s and even by the Second World War the War Agricultural Executive pressed for improvements. But this would cost £40,000 & Grunty Fen land was only worth £15 per acre. But not all the value was agricultural: a gold torque discovered by a man digging peat is on display in the University Museum of Archaeology and Anthropology.

Drainage was followed by inclosure in 1860. It was a wasteland common to seven parishes and used for pasture, anybody could turn one to a thousand sheep out there to pasture. Once enclosed each parishe was granted land for allotments. It was an expensive process but landowners benefited when a railway line was built from Ely to Stretham, Wilburton, Haddenham and Sutton, later extended as far as St Ives. [SCAN 7323 PAINTING OF GRUNTY FEN BEFORE DRAINAGE]

Eric Drake, from Sutton took a train each day to Soham Grammar School. He remembered the Station Master at Haddenham: "He was an important gentleman with navy brass-buttoned suit and braided military-style peaked cap. He met every train and blew the whistle whilst standing on the platform which allowed the guard to wave his flag to signal to the driver. Goods trains took away trucks loaded with bricks and cheese". In January 1964 the News described the diesel goods train as it made its daily run, leaving Ely at 1.15 pm and returning from Sutton, eight miles down the line, two hours later. The trip was not a speedy one for the fireman had to jump down to open and close the crossing gates including those over the A10 at Thetford corner. [SCAN 023 CLOSING THE RAILWAY CROSSING GATES AT LT THETFORD 1964;]

Being an isolated area it was chosen in 1903 as the site for a small-pox hospital, a temporary building of wood and iron built two miles from any village. But despite its remoteness it has featured in parliament for in June 1980 the Isle of Ely Member of Parliament, Clement Freud, asked Prime Minister Margaret Thatcher whether she had plans to visit Grunty Fen where people were worried about the level of wage settlements. But she replied that the 97 residents were a very happy agricultural community with a low rate of unemployment and content under a Conservative Government. Dorothy Barker of Station Road, Grunty Fen, said: "It is nice of her to think of us"

Now Grunty Fen is home to a few farmers and a larger number of travellers whose trailers and lifestyles do bear some resemblance to that depicted by 'Dennis', though quite how it became known to my Clare acquaintance I never discovered

The New Year arrived in our village with a bang as revellers' rockets boomed and flashed into the bedrooms of young and old who had been peacefully sleeping their way into 2006. Any annoyance they may have felt at being roused from their dreams were doubtless suppressed in the joy that others were having fun.

Such celebrations were once the traditional way to see out the old year in Cambridge

As midnight approached on December 31st 1906 streets which on 364 nights of the year were solitary and deserted after 11 o'clock were packed. Throughout the town all forms of entertainment stopped, coats and hats were donned & shoes laced. All feet were heading for Kings Parade, feet of all ages for although the young predominated the middle aged and old were also there. They paced up and down while the year hastened to its close. At a quarter to midnight the crowd in front of Deck's the chemist grew even larger. Finally the door opened and the hero of the hour emerged. [SCAN 9515 DECK'S CHEMIST SHOP, KING'S PARADE 1902]

Alderman Arthur Deck was one of the grand old men of Cambridge. He had been a town councillor for over 50 years; he was an enthusiastic balloonist - but most importantly he was the Rocket Man. The elderly gentleman was greeted by cheers as he crossed Kings Parade to the open space in front of the College and prepared for the ritual that had been started by his father in 1820. [SCAN 9514 – ALDERMAN ARTHUR DECK, THE ROCKET MAN]

As King's College clock struck the first chime of midnight a rocket whizzed up into the night sky and everybody waited for the distant explosion and the pretty coloured lights that would follow. Then before the clock had finished striking up went the second. The New Year had now officially arrived in Cambridge. It was welcomed with much shaking of hands and exchanging of good wishes before the crowds drifted away. [SCAN 9046 KING'S PARADE 1887]

Arthur Deck saw the start of 1908, but not its conclusion. His son, who had tried to expand the custom to Chesterton in 1904 by setting off rockets near the Horse Grind ferry, continued the custom on Kings Parade until 1913. Then Dora - the Defence of the Realm Act - forbade such activities for the duration of the Great War. In December 1919 those Cambridge people looking forward to a general return to pre-war conditions at the festive season were disappointed to learn that there would be no rockets to signal the New Year.

Sometimes, Mr Deck junior explained, the falling rocket sticks caused damage and - perhaps more significantly - the crowd had become rowdy, breaking bottles in the street. So he had decided that his father's custom must not be his. It seemed a pity said the paper - "there are many losses we -could submit to with less regret than the loss of the rockets and the abandonment of a celebration which was based on good fellowship". It was the end of a chapter, but not the end of the story.

In 1922 the custom was revived in response to continued pressure. But it was thought no longer safe to use Kings Parade for the launch and the ceremony transferred to Parker's Piece. Midnight found a thousand people assembled to watch the rockets. But it was not quite the same, numbers dropped off and people found other attractions such as dances on New Year's Eve. So it was that 1929 arrived uncelebrated by any rockets and one of the most celebrated of Cambridge customs fizzled out. At last people could sleep peacefully in their beds. Memories, 11th January 2006, by Mike Petty

Mike Barrett has emailed with memories of the Dave Gelly jazz quartet in Cambridge between 1959 and 1962. This was the resident band at 'Daddys', the only student 'Night Club' in Cambridge which was based on the top floor of the Dorothy Cafe. They also played at the University Jazz Club at the Rex Cinema Ballroom where Town and Gown got together to swing away Monday evenings and at May Balls: they did seven in one week, one year!

Guest players from London's Jazz scene were occasional visitors, and the University Big Band led by Clare College music graduate, Patrick Gowers, was a breath of fresh air in British Jazz of the late 50's and early 60's. [SCAN OF DANCING TO JAZZ AT OVERSTREAM HOUSE 1956]

Mike Barrett played piano with Dave Gelly on tenor sax. The drummer in the quartet at 'Daddy's', and in the University Big Band, was George Walden who went on to work in the Foreign Office, before becoming Conservative MP for Buckingham and Minister for Higher Education from 1985 to 87. In 1997 he gave up his seat and left the Conservative Party and politics to write witty and merciless commentaries on the State of the Nation. His memoirs, 'Lucky George', a riotous rollicking romp through life, were published in 1999.

But can anybody help track down the fourth member of the group? Mike Payne was on bass and also played with a fine rehearsal band called MC2 (MC Squared) which was in demand at Public Schools' functions. In January 1959 he appeared in the film 'Bachelor of Hearts' playing bass in the University Jazz Club in the Cellars of St. John's College. The film starred Hardy Kruger as a visiting German exchange student and Sylvia Sims [SCAN OF KRUGER AND SIMS IN FREE SCHOOL LANE 109.02]

In his day job Mike Payne worked as a photographer for Fisons Research establishment for many years. He lived in a room at the Eagle and later moved to 8a

Botolph Lane. The last time Mike Barrett met him was about 20 years ago; he says: 'he was a damn nice bloke and if he's still around, I and the rest of his jazz-playing friends would dearly love to renew contact with him'. With the success of 'Come Dancing' on tv, Geoffrey Hawes has lent me a photo of a production by pupils of the Barbara Leader School of Dancing at the Cambridge Regal Cinema in January 1946. It was promoting the forthcoming film 'Rhapsody in Blue' about George Gershwin and his music. Geoff can name most people on it including himself and his partner Roma Naylor on the left of the back row. [CHOICE OF SCANS OF THE 'RHAPSODY IN BLUE' DANCERS]

One person who has been trying to identify people from much further back and piecing together a unique picture of the past is Tobit Curteis, an international expert on wallpaintings who is based in Cambridge. He has been undertaking a large-scale conservation project on the fine examples at Willingham church, some of which date back to the 1200s and show St Etheldreda, founder and abbess of Ely. Next Wednesday, 18th January, he will be describing his findings at the church. The meeting starts at 7.30 and all are welcome, entry is free. Sheila Turner from Cambridge emails following my mention of Jeremiah Fenn in Grunty Fen. Her mother was a Fenn and she is researching the family history. Some of her ancestors were 'lime burners', but what did that involve, she asks. Arthur Houghton in his 'Memories of Isleham village' described visiting the lime pits there. He recalled: "We used to go there for lime for the toilets, also we used to get two penny-worth of slack lime for whitewashing the houses, even a 1/2d [A HALFPENNY] worth. A Mr. David Brown, who worked for Roger Robins, used to go with a load of lime to Denham, Suffolk; he also used to go to Gazeley and Witchford. Mr. Brown used to travel to these places at 5 o'clock in the morning and he would be gone all day. Mr. Norman Diver who lived in the Pits took lime once a week to Brandon and from there brought back whitening (hydrated lime) for use on ceilings and walls. They used lime on the sandy soils and also on the fens to sweeten (purify) the land. It was a slow process spreading the lime thinly on the land". But can you add more?

Memories 18th January 2006, by Mike Petty

Sometimes headlines seem to go round and around. The stories in last week's News of the smashing of a Cambridge vice-ring were matched in January 1931 – 75 years ago – by sensational accounts of the goings-on in a Fen Ditton barn.

The story first broke in February 1930 when a respectable lady, the daughter of a lawyer who had always borne an irreproachable character was summoned for allowing a barn adjacent to her cottage near the Plough at Fen Ditton to be used for immoral purposes.

She told the court that she had bought the barn when she'd learned it was to be taken by a large family who had been evicted in Cambridge. Her son had suggested it could be converted into a bungalow for himself when he married. She put in a floor and he used it for a boxing club.

Then after a garden party in 1928 she had been approached by members of a band run by undergraduates who asked to hire it for practising; when they became more proficient they suggested it be used for tea dances. She had simply arranged dances at which undergraduates and local girls could enjoy the music. She made nothing from the venture apart from a few shillings from teas.

The dances proved popular, numbers of people came and danced till six when the band played 'God Save the King' and the event finished. Later the undergraduates asked whether their friends might stay for coffee; she agreed – they were gentlemen after all. She had never witnessed anything improper and was horrified when she heard the police allegations.

Detectives and policewomen gave evidence of what they saw after the dances were over. Once the lights were out and the most of the dancers had departed one constable peeped through the window and observed people inside. There were two couples sitting by the fire. On another occasion girls were dancing by themselves down the centre of the room holding up their dresses; another girl got on top of the piano and danced to the music of a gramophone. Some couples sat on a swinging seat on the verandah and others went to the cottage.

Police claimed that some of the women attending were known to be of an undesirable character. The lady testified: "I did on one occasion turn a girl away. She was so frightfully made up that I would not let her in. Later I found out she was the daughter of one of the University Dons"

Since the men were mostly members of the University the University Proctor was alerted. He went to the dance room which was in darkness and by the light of his lamp could see four undergraduates, seven girls and an elderly gentleman. They said they were telling ghost stories. Later it was revealed that the man was Conan Doyle, famous creator of Sherlock Holmes, and being very keen on spiritualism he had organised a small séance.

Such was the evidence that was presented to magistrates in March 1930. It attracted a great deal of public attention but there was no actual proof of wrongdoing and the case was dismissed. The Chairman said: "If we are out to administer the moral law then no condemnation would be sufficiently strong for the shameless and wanton proceedings that have been allowed to occur. Had we been in a position to impose a fine it would have been a very heavy one. I am ashamed that a young constable should have been called upon in the course of his duty to witness the scenes described"

But it was not over; the police lodged an appeal against the dismissal which was upheld by three judges on the King's Bench and in December 1930 the case was sent back for consideration again.

Once more all the details were repeated in court and reported in the newspapers. This time magistrates concluded that the lady had deliberately inveigled young men of the University and girls into immoral courses, using the premises as a brothel.

She was fined £100, a sum she could never afford; she had to sell the cottage at a ruinous loss and leave the neighbourhood. Her son was obliged to resign his commission in the Air Force and Fen Ditton retreated into respectability once again.

Pam Ladd from Sudbury recalls other dances, especially those organised on New Year's Eve by the Association of Cambridge University Assistants in the old University Examination Hall in the early 1950s when music was provided by George Freestone and the Gurston Trio. After midnight the dance became a carnival when coloured hats, streamers and lights transformed the crowded dance floor into a tapestry of colour. Pam cherishes an issue of the News for 1st January 1952 which has photos of other dances at the Rex and Guildhall, the Regal cinema had a midnight matinee and the Cambridge Scottish Society reeled the night away at the Oak Room at the Dorothy.

Memories 25th January 2006, by Mike Petty

Warnings of an invasion of rats, as cold weather seems set to hit, will have sent many people poking and probing in outbuildings and sheds. But many others will have recoiled in terror at the thought of tackling the ever-present menace.

What we need is somebody like my late granddad. He was the village rat catcher – when he wasn't trapping moles or rabbits. I went out with him on one or two occasions but never gained his skills, nor his love of ferrets.

In years gone past whole communities rallied round to defeat the rat. Enid Porter, one-time curator of the Cambridge Folk Museum, recorded how Richard Callaby, a Cambridge dog-fancier arranged rat hunts in a cellar under a house in Grantchester Meadows to demonstrate the prowess of his terriers. But there were other hunts nearer his home on Midsummer Common as the News of 18th March 1904 reported:

Ratting is a form of amusement which dates back to the dim ages. Usually this practice is carried on in out of the way places but in Cambridge ratting parties are to be seen on Midsummer Common on Sundays. The undergraduate takes a great pride in the sporting qualities of his "dawg's" pedigree, half-bred or mongrel, and certain townees feed this pride by collecting a supply of rats for the alleged sporting dogs to worry. With stout wire cages slung on their backs the dealers await the arrival of undergraduates and then offer rats at a "bob apiece". Rat after rat is released from the cage, given half a dozen yards start, and then the dogs "course" it to its death. The slaughter over, the dead rats are piled on the common to fester and rot.

[SCAN 10288 – CALLABY'S PREMISES ON MIDSUMMER COMMON, 1935]

In August 1925 the problem was acute in Ely. For weeks past allotment holders in Barton Fields had been missing produce such as peas & broad beans and had attributed the blame to two-legged thieves. But then much 'stolen' produce was found stored between a rhubarb bed & a rubbish heap, where a big rat was acting as sentry. In the evening an army of rats of all sizes was seen to emerge from an adjacent ditch & begin to remove their plunder to a spare 'storehouse', leaving tracks which were so distinct one would think that sheep had been making their way over the plots. The council debated as to whether it should do something about it. But it was not enough for one local authority to take action as the rodents would just decamp into a neighbouring district where ratepayers were less vigilant.

If councils would not take action it was up to the Boy Scouts: in November 1925 the Ministry of Agriculture organised a great rat hunt and enlisted the youngsters for this war. It did not solve the problem. By March 1926 the Cambridge University Farm had killed 5,000 rats since harvest, but they were still all over the fields; one had jumped on a student and scratched his face. The answer was to pay landowners 1d or 2d for each rat they killed.

Communities were encouraged to fight the problem on their doorstep. In November 1926 the County Agricultural Organiser gave a lecture on the destruction of rats at Lt Shelford village hall. People did not pay enough attention to the rat menace, there were far too many rats about Cambridge for his liking, he told them. If they held a Little Shelford Rat Week it would do a world of good. Everybody should kill rats whenever they got the change. If each person killed one a week it would be doing some good. [SCAN 10199 – MANOR FARM BARNES AT LT SHELFORD, SCAN 86.1267 – LT SHELFORD HIGH STREET IN 1920S WHEN RATS WERE A PROBLEM]

One community to take the matter to heart was Great Chesterford where their Rat and Sparrow Club dinner in February 1927 was told they were doing good work in keeping down the vile rat: 6,527 had been killed, a decrease of 2,000 over the previous year. All members should kill one rat for every two acres of his occupation during the year, with ten rats being the minimum contribution. Anybody not killing the requisite number would be fined a halfpenny an acre. They hoped the other side of Saffron Walden would form a club as it was hardly fair that one district should take steps to keep down the number of rats and others do nothing at all.

Yet despite all their efforts still the rat is with us. Do you have memories of rat-hunting – write to Mike Petty at the News

Memories 1st February 2006, by Mike Petty

When Britain was at bay and the enemy seemed about to invade the lads and dads came forward to form a force that would defeat the foe should he dare to set foot in their streets and lanes. At the time of Napoleon they trained to repel the French and Volunteers paraded on Cambridge commons and village greens. [SCAN OF NAPOLEONIC CAMBRIDGE VOLUNTEER]

Then when the enemy threatened in the Great War the Boy Scouts went out with their rifles to keep watched and defend bridges. They were followed in 1940 by the Local Defence Volunteers, soon to be renamed the Dads Army, or Home Guard.

One man who recalls their activities at Great Abington is Geoff Tiplady whose parents were landlords of the Green Man. He remembers how they had a HQ in The Crown and a gun point defending the bridge. Under the leadership of Colonel Foster from Hildersham they were required to be on duty one night a week from 10pm to four in the morning and had power to arrest people who would be handed over to the police. At first they carried pickaxes, crowbars, spears and dummy rifles when on duty. But in May and June 1940 several thousand rifles arrived in Cambridge. They were taken to the Corn Exchange packed in grease where an army of ladies worked for two weeks to clean them – do you know anybody who helped? [SCAN OF VIEW OF GT ABINGTON]

Once equipped the Abington defenders would often stop every car passing along the Newmarket Road, sticking their bayonet through the car window. But despite their vigilance the Home Guard could not prevent an ambush on the Linton Road. A couple of lads, Terry Lee and Jim Ollett, managed to find two old German helmets and, armed with long sticks, hid in a ditch before leaping out to try and stop a passing motorcar by pointing their 'guns' at the occupants. Both driver and children escaped. These recollection are but a smattering of those collected by Jennifer Hirsch and members of the Abington History Group for a new book of wartime memories, featuring also the recollections of those villagers who served around the world on land, air and sea.

The Home Guard was stood down at the end of the Second World War and many homes have cards of appreciation for their father's efforts. [SCAN OF A CARD ISSUED TO MEMBERS OF THE HOME GUARD]

But who remembers that they were reformed in the 1950s, rebuilding a body of men capable of defeating any invasion attempt. In June 1953 Home Guard patrols in the East Road area of Cambridge arrested five suspects; a slenderly-built, quietly dressed brunette was stopped by a patrol who found a flaw in her identity card and she was taken away in a car to Battalion H.Q. It was just an exercise but it proved that in a real emergency Cambridge people need not worry about spies wandering the streets of the city.

There was soon a shortage of manpower and in October 1953 came a Home Guard recruiting week. The appeal was directed towards middle-aged men who had previously seen service. The exceptional commitment of the Regular Army abroad made it imperative that there should be an organised body trained and ready to cope with emergencies in the event of war. It must contain people who know the local geography of their area intimately, in every parish and hamlet [SCAN OF REFORMED HOME GUARD MEN AND WOMEN WITH RECRUITING POSTER] [SCAN OF HOME GUARD FIRING BREN GUNS]

By the end of the month Cambridge citizens were shaken to hear rifle fire in the city and see groups of khaki-clad men dashing about on Jesus Green and Parker's Piece before attacking Hobbs Pavilion where the 'enemy' was wiped out. It was another exercise to keep the Home Guard in the public eye.

However the threat of war was changing. In June 1955 Officers of Cambridge Home Guard were told that Cambridgeshire had a good chance of surviving the dropping of a hydrogen bomb since it did not present a target worth the expense of such a bomb. But it would undoubtedly be cut off so it was important they had Civil Defence in addition to small arms training

By the end of January 1956 it was time to stand down again. Their last assembly in uniform was a farewell dinner. They were told they were not being disbanded but were going into reserve as tension had slackened. Should an emergency arise they were the right men to form a nucleus of a strong body which would spring into being. The battalion flag was handed into the custody of the Commanding Officer, Lieut.-Col. E.C. Parker to be guarded faithfully until once again it flew over their headquarters. [SCAN OF A HOME GUARD DINNER – NB NOT NECESSARILY THE LAST ONE]

Pictures of these forgotten warriors have been lent me by John Carter of Cambridge; but can you put a name to the faces?

Memories 8th February 2006, by Mike Petty

Memories can be wonderful things.

I received a call the other day from a German television company who had been contacted by a lady who wanted to share her recollections of Cambridge in the '50s. The 1950s!

The company had made a programme for Austrian television in which they had featured a person with a vivid memory of having lived in a particular place in the distant past. When they followed it up every detail was shown to be accurate. Afterwards they were deluged by other people with similar experiences, one of which related to Cambridge.

So on Friday I met with Frank, the researcher, to learn the story that had already been committed to film. Our lady, now called Gisela, was in those days Elizabeth, Countess of Lichfield. Her family lived in a large house not far from Cambridge with a stud where they bred Arabian horses.

Her most vivid memory was a visit she paid to Cambridge with friends when she was 18 years old, in 1854. They had punted on the Cam, visited King's College Chapel, Trinity College and St Michael's church and spent some time on the Market Hill where she remembered the wooden stalls, the men with white jackets and the women with long skirts. She recalled the bakery, teashop, books and sewing shops.

It was a remarkable tale. But was any of it true? At first I had my doubts, by Monday I was almost sure.

I could find no mention of the Lichfield family owning a large house locally. Could she have got her name wrong – perhaps she meant Leeds. This was one of the titles of the Earl of Godolphin who had a mansion at Wandlebury where there was a definite connection to the famous Godolphin Arabian racehorse. The house has been demolished but the stable block still stands which would make a good place to take her before they jetted back.

But on Monday it was to be Cambridge. They had already filmed her punt trip and the colleges before I met them on the Market Hill. Here I was able to show Gisela a photograph taken in the 1860s showing just the scene she had described: there were the stalls, there were the people and Great St Mary's church dominated the background. There was one slight snag.

On a September evening in 1849 there had been a major fire in the centre of Cambridge which destroyed a number of ancient wooden buildings that previously stood right in the middle of the present Market Square. In those days the Corporation did not move at the greatest of speed and it took a considerable time before they cleared the burnt remnants and pulled down the remaining properties. These included the Grapes and the Kings Head public houses, Emmerson's bakers, Whites the bootmakers, Peters the cutler, Sharman's toy shop and Styles' fishmongers along with milliners shops, tailors, bootmakers and a silversmiths. When the site was cleared they widened the roadways and erected a new stone-built fountain in the middle of the new Market Square to replace the old Hobson's Conduit. This reconstruction was not completed until Christmas 1855. A visitor in 1854 would have been only too aware of the work in progress. Whilst being filmed I looked across to the nearest stall; there hanging up was an engraving of the old market as it had been before the fire; the difference was obvious.

I had shared my concerns with the director before we started. He was not too worried: people often got their names wrong, the date was flexible: perhaps it had been 1844 or 1864 – such small details should not be allowed to interfere with the essential story.

So it came down to the surely most traditional of Cambridge pastimes, punting down the Cam: an unforgettable experience for any visitor. Well it would have been in 1854.

A correspondent to Cambridge Independent Press of 18th October 1873 noted that between the Coach and Horses, Newnham and the Small Bridges 44 houses drained into the river, 'in consequence a large amount of faeces constantly finds its way into the stream and the accumulation of filth is considerable'. After passing Small Bridges (now called Silver Street) it was supplemented by 16 sewers and drains including the privies or bogs of the riverside colleges making the Cam perhaps more dangerous to health than any other river. Nearer St John's there was more filth from a vinegar works, Ekins brewery, two sewers in Northampton Street and several privies. No Countess is likely to have forgotten that journey, however or whenever she made it!

But it is unlikely she made it by punt. Gwen Raverat describes ‘a kind of water-borne cart or floating wheelbarrow’ when referring to a garden punt that she used for playing pirates. But these bore little resemblance to the present slim tourist punts of today. These arrived in 1907 and proved tremendously popular. The Cambridge Daily News ‘Table Talk’ column commented how the previous year there had been hardly a punt available and before that such a thing was not known in Cambridge. Even the German television man conceded that there might be something wrong; but by then the sequence had been filmed.

I’m told the programme will be shown exclusively on a small Austrian television channel so how it all comes out will be a mystery. But at least Gisela will have her memories of an expenses-paid trip to Cambridge and her half-hour of international fame!

Memories 15th February 2006, by Mike Petty

Sometimes the oddest things happen. When compiling my ‘Looking Back’ paragraphs I search through the files of the News that are housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library, looking for snippets I don’t remember having seen before.

I recently spotted a story about the Crown and Sceptre pub in Clarendon Street, Cambridge which was appealing for an extension to its licence in February 1931. Cambridge justices heard that the pub was only open from Monday to Saturday and closed at nine o’clock instead of ten, which was the ordinary time for licenced houses. Nor was it allowed to open at all on Sundays.

It was within easy reach of Parker’s Piece and in the summer men who had been playing cricket were anxious to get liquid refreshment on their way home afterwards. It was a comfortable house and the company was good but customers found early closing irksome and went to other pubs of which there were five within 200 yards.

The pub was adjacent to New Square which was to be turned from a grassy field to a car park and would boost trade. The National Council of Women opposed it for just that reason: the last thing we wanted near a parking place were numbers and numbers of public houses. But it was wrong to suggest that because a house is allowed to open one hour longer it would cause the people who used the car park to become indecently drunk. Having heard all the arguments the magistrates granted a full licence subject to improvement in the sanitary arrangements. [SCAN OF NEW SQUARE CAR PARK IN 1963 and AS IT WAS IN 1930]

But on the very day this snippet appeared I had an email from Gill Harrison from Dorchester asking whether we could come to the aid of a very old family friend, Peter Bevis.

Gill writes: “He is in his eighties now, and living in a village near Bolton. His mother used to have the Willow tea-rooms in our home town of Blandford, Dorset many years ago, and was famous for her home cooked cakes, especially the gingerbread, the like of which my husband has never again tasted. They were made to an old family recipe.

“When he came down for a holiday before Christmas he said that as his father had died quite young and he knew very little about his family. In fact he gave me only this information that Thomas Bevis used to have a posh bakers shop in Cambridge. I hit into the 1881 census, and the 1901 census, and his grandparents, aunts and cousins popped up before our eyes. They had a bakers and confectioners at the Crown and Sceptre, Clarendon Street. He would love to know what happened to the bakers shop, and if any of the Bevis family still live in Cambridge”

Dan Jackson traced the story of the Crown and Sceptre in his ‘Down Your Street’ article in November 1989. He discovered that it had been one of the busiest in Cambridge during the Second World War and a popular haunt of servicemen. As well as a pub it was in the 1920s ‘The Claire’, a kennel for toy dogs and later it became a veterinary surgery. Dan confirms that in Edwardian times it had indeed been a bakers and confectioners called Coulson and Bevis. He even tracked down a photograph showing their name above the door [FIND CEN NEG 5544 89 (cutting scanned)] [SCAN OF CLARENDON STREET c1910]

But can you add to the story; if so let me know and I will put you in touch.

Several readers have responded to my mention of the whale that visited Cambridge in May 1954. Miss Susanna Fleet writes: “Yes, I saw ‘Jonah’! The poor whale in the Thames reminded me of him. I was nearly ten years old but still remember the smell of the preservative”. Mrs Christine Green from Comberton also went with her father: “I recall walking through and seeing all the ribs around me and feeling that it did not seem right to be treating a majestic beast like that. I also remember my mother buying whale meat sausages from the local butcher. They were a sort of grey colour and I can still hear mum saying ‘Never again’. I wonder if anybody else remembers them?” [SCAN OF NEWS CUTTING OF THE WHALE AT CAMBRIDGE]

Dawn Greenwood, nee Acker, from Wicken had her memories jogged by a picture of Little Shelford High Street: she once lived there. “So many times I have been up and down it to Hauxton Road to my grandmother Acker who had a sweet shop. I remember an old tyre and cane hoop running down the middle of the road, not many cars then. On the left is the farm from which you went to get milk in a can or jug – my job after getting home from school. Nellie Lichfield and her mother saw to your needs. On the right further down were the butchers and bakers – we had many a loaf first thing in the morning.” I wonder if anybody remembers the Plough inn, seen here in the 1920s when it was kept by Edward Moore. Memories, 22 February 2006, by Mike Petty

Mrs M.G. Carter from Cambridge has written to me after spotting a snippet in my ‘Looking Back’ columns relating to Rance’s Folly.

This was a Hollywood style mansion in St Andrew’s Street. It had been built in the 1850s by Henry Rance, one-time Mayor of Cambridge. It sported a magnificent dining room – so grand that council meetings were held there in 1882. There were four lifts and a roof-top tennis court.

Rance’s reputation for hospitality was lavish and he spent many thousand pounds a year entertaining. Young gentlemen of the University were especially welcomed into his home, where he offered them tuition and showed off his four hundred pictures. Perhaps a greater incentive was the superb ballroom, its floor laid by German experts, especially since Rance had attractive granddaughters who enjoyed dancing and seldom found themselves without a partner. Many of his guests found themselves so enraptured that they failed to notice the passing hours and were locked out of their college.

Henry was a donnish Downing man who enjoyed a varied and busy life but who disliked visiting the barber. It was said that he never spent more than a shilling on a haircut and only had one every eight weeks. Nothing was the same after he left Cambridge.

For a while the Liberals used his former home for their meetings until they moved to a new club in Downing Street in 1906. The flat roofed building was soon dismissed as a "Folly". When news came of its impending demolition in 1957 as part of the redevelopment of St Andrew's Street by the Prudential group the CDN commented: "few will argue against the removal of the red brick 'giant' with its towering storeys and overblown construction".
[SCAN 9875 – RANCE'S FOLLY, ST ANDREWS STREET]

It was then being used as University offices. But what other uses was it put to? Mrs Carter believes it was a Post Office Engineering Training School in the early 1940s. She worked there for a year before being trained as a Telephonist.

Recently John Carter lent me a wonderful photograph he took of the building in its final days.
[SCAN 110.24 – JOHN CARTER'S VIEW OF REAR OF RANCE'S FOLLY]

John also has a snap that seems to show a Mayor inspecting a telephone exchange and then operating some sort of teletype machine. They were taken in the 1950s but can anybody give me further details. [SCAN 110.22 OF MAYOR AT TELEPHONE EXCHANGE AND 110.23 ON TELETYPE MACHINE]

A recent picture of the Hone Guard in the 1950s has brought a response from Jill Carter of Melbourn who spotted her father, Donald Elbourn who was platoon commander of Melbourn contingent. [SCAN 110.01 SHOWING DONALD ELBOURN - STANDING]

Details of how the Home Guard got their rifles is contained in a letter from Bob Jopling of St Bees in Cumbria. He writes: "Cambridge's rifles may well have been cleaned at the Corn Exchange, but those for the villages south and west of Cambridge were distributed still in their packing. I vividly recall the Sunday in May 1940 when two long boxes arrived at my father's house in Hauxton. At a village meeting (I think in the morning) he had been chosen to lead the local unit, and the boxes came in the afternoon. We heaved them on to the kitchen table and set to work.

"In each box were three Ross .300 rifles. They were buried in thick black grease, which had been poured over them hot. This had been done in 1919, in Canada, and the grease had protected them ever since. It took several hours, and many kettles of boiling water, to clean those rifles properly - and after that there was still the kitchen! But two rifles (with ten rounds each) accompanied Harold Board and "Pop" Hunt on their patrol that night, and two more were out early the following morning. I'm sure much the same would have been happening all over the county".

Bob will be fondly remembered as a teacher at Longstanton School and has continued his interest in local history in retirement. His 'winter project' has been to transcribe and edit the daily journal of the Hauxton Home Guard which his father kept. For a start the entries were jotted down on loose-leaf paper but when this ran out the entries were continued on the unused pages of a ledger in which the Cambridge Daily News had listed their 1930s deliveries to newsgagents – a valuable archive in itself!

Some of the entries from 1940 read:

“31st May. Military prepared weapon pits beside road block and sandbagged one half of the road. Decided to man post from sunset to after sunrise. Caps fitted. Unanimous decision that if a rifle per man is not forthcoming the detachment would close down. Agreed to fortify post on Monday 3rd June.

“1st June. Ten soldiers billeted in Mill Lane at work on fortifying the bridge. T.W.H. Jackson has not returned his rifle. Twenty-two volunteers attended for range firing. Best shots Wright, Hunt and Pressey.”

When complete, the transcript will be placed in the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library. But, he wonders, is there anybody else who could make use of it? You can email Bob at jopling@colthouse.freemove.co.uk or contact me and I'll put you in touch.

Somebody else seeking wartime information is Brian Sulman of Mildenhall. He is especially interested in HMS Walpole, the destroyer adopted by the Isle of Ely who collected nearly £260,000 for it in 1942. Brian's researches suggest that HMS Walpole was a destroyer launched in February 1918 and broken up in February 1945 after she was damaged by a mine. But why hold a collection for a ship that had already been in service for 24 years?

The full story has been told by retired Lieut.Cdr. G.B. Mason. In February 1942 Walpole was engaged in torpedo attacks on the German warships Scharnhorst, Gneisenau and Prinz Eugen; she developed a mechanical fault and whilst going to Harwich for repair came under air attack. The odd thing is that the attacking aircraft was a Wellington – one of our's – and it was driven off by a German fighter! Commander Mason's detailed account – which also includes HMS Loyal, Cambridge's adopted ship - is housed in the Cambridgeshire Collection. But if you can add more then please let me know.

Memories 1st March 2006, by Mike Petty

Alastair Green has emailed me from the United States. He writes: “I lived in Cambridge until 1982 at which time I moved to the States. Perhaps I should correct this by saying that my family had lived in Maids Causeway, but moved to Harston about forty years ago. Although I make regular trips back to England, Cambridge has lost much of its charm.

“Thankfully, due to many of the wonderful buildings, it will always be a beautiful city, but the centre is not as enjoyable as it once was. I mourn the passing of Eaden Lilley's, Joshua Taylor's, Bacons, and various other shops that were once there. Also, I do not like the Grafton Centre. [SCAN 100.77 – EADEN LILLEY'S, MARKET STREET, 1964]

“I have two of the ‘Down Your Street’ books, and these provide me with some comfort. Comfort may seem to be an odd word, but the photos in the books show what I think of as my Cambridge. That is, a market town. A place in which I spent many very happy years. Perhaps these feelings of melancholy are due in part to homesickness and in part to age, but I miss enormously the Cambridge I remember. Much as I would like to move back, I feel that I am better with my memories of a town that I knew, and not a town that I don't”.

Alastair asks whether there are any books with photographs of Cambridge in the 1970s and 1980s. There's the News' ‘Memories’ magazine and my ‘Memory Lane, Cambridge’ produced for the News back in 1999 is still around in some bookshops (at a knock-down price) but its expensive to post. So I thought I'd use this column to jog his memory.

It is difficult to realise that 1982 was nearly 25 years ago. What was happening that year?

Work on the never-ending Grafton area scheme was finally under way [SCAN 104.39 FITZROY STREET 1981] but W. Thompson & son furniture shop in Fitzroy Street closed after 150 years. Traylen, one of Cambridge's first self-service grocery stores decided to concentrate on butchery business claiming the new Beehive had killed its trade and Gallyons the gunsmith shut its Sidney Street shop after 198 years.

In the city centre Boots opened its extended shop in Petty Cury but Market stallholders announced their worst month's trading for 30 years, blaming parking problems, and traders were deserting Magdalene Street in face of rent rises up to four times their existing levels.

Things were brighter on the business front. Barclays Bank estimated there were now 250-300 high-tech firms in the area, employing more people & making a growing impact on foreign markets. But the main problem was space. The Cambridge Science Park was home to 24 companies but only had 20 acres left for expansion, though St John's College was seeking planning permission for a similar development immediately opposite. An eight-acre site near Shire Hall was attracting considerable interest but a number of established companies had been forced to move out to the villages.

One entrepreneur, Clive Sinclair, was developing his plans for flat-screen televisions and opened a new space-age HQ in Willis Road in 1982, using hot water from a deep bore hole (something in the news again). Now too the government is grappling with ways to ensure electricity supplies, but that year the old generating station in Thompson's Lane was demolished, having ceased to work in the mid 1960s.[SCAN 9127 ELECTRICITY GENERATING STATION, 1966]

New technology was revolutionising transport with the opening of a new power signal box near Hills Road bridge enabling a couple of men to control every train, point and signal for miles around. In the struggle to seek solutions to Cambridge traffic problems approval was given for computer-controlled traffic lights and street calming in the Gwydir Street area [SCAN 9129 TRAFFIC CALMING IN GWYDIR STREET 1982]. But debate continued over plans to rebuild Drummer Street bus station [SCAN 109.39 – DRUMMER STREET 1978], widen East Road and move the war memorial.

The biggest news for the motorist was the reopening of Magdalene Bridge. When constructed in the 1820s the cast-iron bridge was of an extremely revolutionary design and included ornamental railings cast by the Finch foundry in Cambridge. Their strength was tested in 1929 when a motor car crashed through them and hung over the river. By then the whole bridge was carrying far more traffic than ever intended and soon planners were talking about widening the road on either side to make a new thoroughfare straight into the heart of the town. In 1953 the bridge was restricted to 12 tons but by 1967 there was a two-inch dip in the centre; buses & lorries were banned and the Government announced plans to replace it by 1971. However supporters of the old bridge forced a rethink. In 1972 came news that it was to be preserved and strengthened. It was closed to traffic with a temporary Bailey bridge erected alongside. [SCAN 109.40 MAGDALENE STREET REBUILD, 1981] When it reopened in 1982 the costs had risen from an original estimate of £50,000 to some £545,000. But for that Cambridge kept one of its architectural treasures. It remains one part of Cambridge that Alastair would recognise.

In 1982 Cambridge gained two new radio stations when BBC Radio Cambridgeshire started broadcasting from studios at Hills Road, Cambridge in competition with Saxon Radio but Cambridge Community Radio was silenced for the second time in a year and Cambridge University Radio also ceased broadcasting.

Another aspect of Cambridge life that came to an end that year was the children's film show at the ABC cinema. But do you recognise any of the faces in this snap taken in 1953. [SCAN 110.26]

The office of Mayor of Cambridge is an ancient one, dating back for many hundreds of years. Once the recipient dons the Mayoral regalia he is transformed into the city's first most important citizen.

But one day in March 1956 the Mayor of Cambridge was literally outshone. Alderman E.T. Halnan's chain of office, though polished brightly, was dull in comparison, his official robes distinctly tawdry compared to those of a visitor; a visitor moreover who usurped his traditional role of opening a new development.

The occasion was the inauguration of a flats for old people at Honey Hill, off Northampton Street and the dignitary concerned was the Lord Mayor of London, Ald C.L. Ackroyd.. He came together with the mayoress, one of the Sheriffs of London and the Swordbearer. It was the first such visit and brought a glimpse of London pageantry to Cambridge.

The Lord Mayor claimed several connections with the city; his Mayoress had been educated at Girton and had a son at Magdalene College, while he had responded generously to the appeal for funds for New Hall.

The Honey Hill development was the result of hard work on the part of Ald H.O. Langdon, chairman of the Council's Housing Committee and the Master of Magdalene College, Henry Willinck, who was also chairman of the Cambridge Preservation Society. He reviewed the background to the scheme.

On the site had stood some of the oldest houses in Cambridge, some known as The Spotted Cow Yard. In 1936 the frontage was put up for sale and it was agreed that the council would buy it with a quarter of the cost paid by Cambridge Preservation Society and Magdalene College. But the war intervened, nothing was done and the area became a blot on the landscape. During the post-war planning process came proposals that the land should be developed for industrial use or a car park, both were rejected. It was Alderman Langdon's Housing Committee that came up with a scheme for old people's homes and the Cambridge Preservation Society chipped in £100 a flat for better-quality materials. Margaret Coleman from Cambridge worked in Rance's Folly when part of it was occupied by the Prudential. Lindsay Davies, churchwarden of Horningsea, has more details about it. The building was designed by Thomas Jekyll in 1870 - 1872. Jekyll has been described as "one of the least understood and most tragic Aesthetic movement figures in England". In 2003 the Bard Graduate Centre for Decorative Arts in New York held an exhibition of Jekyll's work - which featured "Rance's Folly" as an example of his "best and most notorious work". The mathematical ceiling in the dining room was described as one of his finest decorative arts works. Jekyll's other works in Cambridgeshire were two college sports buildings for St John's College and the restoration of St Peter's Church, Horningsea. Only his work in Horningsea survives. He became particularly well known for his wrought iron work and Horningsea church gates are a fine example. He also designed the gates at Sandringham that were given to the Prince and Princess of Wales as a wedding present in 1863. Jekyll's other "Cambridge" connection was that he knew both Mr Rattee and Mr Kett in Norfolk as a young man and in 1851 established his architectural practice at 19 Hills Road, close to their premises. Rattee & Kett introduced him to Pugin and through that connection he became involved with du Maurier and Whistler in London. During his lifetime Jekyll was often described as being "peculiar" or "eccentric" and he died in 1881 aged 54 having spent the last four years of his life in a lunatic asylum. The exhibition in New York was accompanied by a fascinating illustrated book on the life and work of Thomas Jekyll written by Susan Weber Soros and Catherine Arbuthnott in which details and illustrations of Rance's Folly and St Peter's Church Horningsea feature.

Mrs Gyneth Buck from Fordham tells me that she also saw the whale that was exhibited on Parker's Piece in 1954 – but she saw it in Penmaenmawr, near Conway. She says: I remember walking through and seeing all the ribs. It came to mind again when the whale entered the Thames and I spoke of it to my family, who thought I was making it up. Thank you for the proof!"

Mr A.J. Betson of Cambridge has sent me the order of service when the ensign of HMS Walpole was laid up in Ely Cathedral in June 1989. Seventeen old shipmates attended the reunion which included a dance, wreath-laying ceremony and a march to the Market Place where the salute was taken by the ship's former navigating officer, Lieut Charles Tooley

When did you last see an elephant in Cambridge?

A new Animal Welfare Bill, due to have its final reading in the Parliament this week, will probably outlaw such animals in travelling circuses and, for better or worse, another tradition will be lost.

John Carter of Cambridge has lent me a photograph he took in March 1952 which shows a grand procession of elephants from Chipperfield's circus as they made their way from the Cambridge railway station to Midsummer Common. There is just so much detail; there are the faces in the crowds, thronging Regent Street on that cold, damp day. Then what of the cars – who owned ‘GER 302’, one of those trapped in the traffic queue, and what was being conveyed in that back van, registration number VG 292? Then dominating the background is Herbert Robinson’s garage. But the elephants are the stars; there seem to be fourteen of them, walking trunk-to-tail and attracting all the attention. [SCAN OF THE 1952 PARADE]

Such shows captivated people for generations. Back in August 1898 the News reported how Cambridgeshire folk in their thousands watched a similar procession of the "greatest show on earth" when Barnum and Bailey brought their circus to town. "Before dawn Barnum-struck people could be found waiting for the arrival of the monsters and wonders of the world. And then for hours there was a steady traffic of all manner of men and beasts and creeping things. Huge elephants, endless teams of horses, lions, bears, wolves and hyenas in their cages, the keeper, calmly sitting on his stool, cynically surveying the wonder-struck lines of the town’s and country’s curious. Everyone is going to see the show. For hours the box office has been a Klondike"

In April 1947 there was another name topping the billboards: "Bertram Mills' tenting-circus is a circus-de-luxe. And as the animals are the backbone of the circus let us take a look at the Bertram Mills collection. First the horses - horses clever, horses dignified, horses graceful and all beautiful. Less graceful, but with their own beauty of their quiet grey colour were the six performing elephants, everyone a lady - but not lady-like enough to stifle the yawn with which they sat up after lying down to ‘sleep’ to the strains of dreamy music"

In 1950 they were back again The "News" reporter described the spectacle: "Have you ever seen dogs play football? Or a lion walk a double tightrope? Or elephants that do the elephantine equivalent of a handstand. It is surprising how graceful even an elephant can be when well-trained, though I hope that when they come again and see me sitting in the half-crowns they will shift me by trunk to the twelve-and-a-tanners." In April 2000 Mrs Pam Barlow of Impington shared her memories of the era when she wrote: "My husband was a police officer and always had complimentary tickets for his family. We always sat on the very first row. The elephants used to circle around, put one foot on the ring and raise the other front foot in the air. All of them had beautiful girl riders who used to be picked up by the elephant’s trunk and placed on their backs" [SCAN OF ELEPHANTS IN CIRCUS RING AT CAMBRIDGE c1962]

But on one occasion an elephant decided to pack its trunk, and say goodbye to the circus. In November 1901 while Lord John Sanger’s great show and menagerie were at Saffron Walden a keeper found that Miss Ada, one of the performing elephants had stolen away in the night. Several men were quickly in search of the missing ‘lady’. They found her battering a barn at the rear of Castle Hill where she had done a considerable amount of mischief. She dragged the gate off by the hinges and battered the doors down. She then attacked the brickwork, forcing it inwards. A great portion of the roof collapsed. But were elephants ever welcomed back there – and where did you see them?

In the early 1820s shows were performed in Cambridge on what was called Hog Hill, now disappearing under the building works for the new Grand Arcade. Posters in the Cambridgeshire Collection advertise Mr Drake and his miracles of nature. As well as ten-foot high elephants, there were onagra - like the zebra but larger, aurochos with two large horns growing from their forehead, polar sea-monsters, anaconda and panthers. But not everybody was happy to see them. Mary Ann Bones lived in a house nearby and was upset to hear the animals roaring all night. In April 1839 she signed a petition to the Vice Chancellor and Mayor trying to prohibit the ‘wild beasts’ from coming to the area. But it was not until the first Corn Exchange was built in 1842 that the animals moved to Midsummer Common. Now it seems they have gone forever. [SCAN OF POSTER FOR MR DRAKE’S CIRCUS, 1820’s]

There's another spectacle to be visited this weekend when the Riverside area of Cambridge stages a celebration featuring some of the changes over the last 1000 years, since the founding of Barnwell Priory and the Stourbridge Leper Hospital. The former brickworks, iron foundry, sewage pumping station, clay quarries, town gas works, numerous pubs have passed into history but will be recalled in exhibitions by the Folk Museum, an illustrated talk by John Durrant and guided tours by Alan Brigham between 11.20 and 1pm. The main event on the 18th will take place at Brickfields on Cheddar's Lane 1-3pm. (just off Newmarket Road, near to Tesco and the Museum of Technology).

Memories 22nd March 2006, by Mike Petty

Chris Jakes, Librarian of the Cambridgeshire Collection in Lion Yard Library spends his life helping people research the county's heritage. But even he gets stumped sometimes. The library has been lent a series of pictures that appear to show life in a workhouse-type environment but which one?

There were a number of such institutions including Mill Road Cambridge, Chesterton, Huntingdon, Royston, Saffron Walden and Ely – the later Tower Hospital.

Workhouse life was not an easy option: in July 1897 a casual inmate at Cambridge Workhouse was charged with refusing to do such work as was suited to his age, strength and capacity.

Fred Fordham, a porter at the Workhouse told the subsequent trial that the man was taken to a cell to do his day's work - picking 4lb of oakum. Defendant said he did not intend to do the work so Fred locked the door and left him there. Oakum picking did not need very good eyesight, and the cells were well lighted. Inmates were expected to do a day's work lasting from 7am to 5pm with stone breaking for men under 60 and oakum picking by those over. When Fred went back he found that the man had used a stone-breaking hammer to smash the door of his cell. Defendant said the cells were a disgrace, only a birdcage made of lathe and plaster. He was sent to prison for 7 days

Out at Huntingdon in May 1898 there was great excitement when it was became known that a murderous assault had been committed on an inmate of the workhouse known as "Tunkey" by another inmate alias "Curly". It appears that after dinner the men adjourned to they wood shop for the purpose of smoking their pipes when all of a sudden Curly seized an axe and dealt Tunkey a terrible blow on the head sending him to the ground. While other old men scampered away to acquit the porter, the assailant delivered other deadly blows upon the unfortunate man's skull. Curly then escaped from the back of the premises, and, crossing the common, was last seen by some boys making his way up Oxmire Lane.

In October that same year there was more tragedy, this time from Saffron Walden where the News reported a shocking murder at the workhouse. A tramp who was seen about the town soliciting alms was received into the casual ward. In the words of the time: he was conducted to the sleeping quarters and rose in the customary way in the morning and proceeded to the stone breaking quarters to break the usual eight cwt of granite. After breaking some of the stones he suddenly quitted the yard and proceeded to a section of the quadrangle where the tramp master was sweeping. Without the slightest intimidation he attacked with his hammer, and dealing him two or three blows with the weapon, felled him to the ground

No wonder people raised concerns, especially about the younger inmates. In October 1898 Cambridge Guardians considered removing children from the workhouse and placing them in one or more cottage homes. There was one family in the workhouse who had lived there almost the whole of their lives. They were firmly convinced that the workhouse was not the best place to keep children. One difficulty was in getting good foster mothers but Mr

Campkin said he knew of many instances where boys and girls went out into the world and took responsible situations which they filled with great credit to themselves. If they arranged for placing these children out at the expense of the ratepayers he failed to see how in after life there could be any practical difference with regard to the children

Authorities then had to account for every crumb: in June 1897 there were complaints of bread being wasted at Chesterton workhouse, the inmates had too much and put the uneaten pieces in their own little cupboards – elsewhere it was collected up and fed to the vagrant paupers. But from Holbech, Lincs, came complaints of government prying: the Guardians received a letter from the Local Government Board asking what number of currants were to be put into the children's pudding. It seems that the information is required for audit purposes. The master of a workhouse is a busy man, with no small weight of responsibility upon his shoulders. If he is to be compelled to count the currants, we fancy those tasty, but indigestible comestibles will be conspicuous by their absence. The Local Government Board is waking up - to trifles – commented the News in November 1897.

Nobody now will remember those distant days. It was just 50 years ago, in April 1956 that the Mr & Mrs Ditchburn retired as secretary and matron of Mill Road Maternity Hospital. They had been appointed in 1934 as matron and master when it was a 'ten-bedded' public assistance institution and, post-war, under their guidance had grown ten-fold to become one of the best maternity hospitals in the country.

Since then the old Cambridge workhouse buildings have been transformed and renamed Ditchburn Place in their memory. Others have been demolished or transformed to other uses. Now Caroline Norton is researching what became of them. If you can help then email her at chris@medlam.freeseve.co.uk or let me know and I'll put you in touch. Diana Hunt from Tilehurst near Reading writes:

"Many years ago I bought an oak cupboard with two drawers. On the back of one of the drawers was the inscription "Made by Alfred Coe Suckling. Finished July 1892. Aged 17 years". The cupboard is very ornately carved and all joints are dovetailed. The cupboard is much loved and has moved around with me over the years. I discovered that Alfred was born in Great Coggeshall, but moved to Cherry Hinton where he married Sarah Tansley in the then new St John's Church. They lived in Blinco Grove and afterwards in Rathmore Road. They had a son, Edward, in 1902, but I cannot find any further descendants. Alfred died in Fulbourn Hospital in 1939. I have not found out where he is buried as yet. I would dearly love to find a photo of Alfred and wonder if anyone in Cherry Hinton has one of him.

Memories 29th March 2006, by Mike Petty

After speaking to a meeting of the Fen Ditton Gardening Club last week I was shown a most interesting group of four photographs. They seem to have been distributed by the Ministry of Information, probably during the war, and two have a caption on the back. But these are somewhat unclear. They read:

“A modern village school. A junior school at Fen Ditton is a modern village school. There are at present 39 pupils (13 boys and 26 girls) between the ages of five and 11. They are mainly the children of agricultural workers. At eleven the children go on to a Central School, a Secondary School or a Senior School, whichever is best-suited to their ability”

But then they continue: “Another fine village school is the Junior School attached to the Village College at Bottisham. This school includes a nursery class for children less than five years old.”

One picture shows “Story acting, with a scene from Snow White and the Seven dwarfs performed in the class room”. Another is headed: “For those who need it, there is cold lever (yes that’s what it says!) oil and malt during the morning break”

A third captures a group of youngsters watching a girl setting the time on a paper clock fixed to an easel whilst a fourth, taken by Pictorial Press, shows a group of three girls, ribbons in their hair, tucking in to a school dinner.

But whether they were taken in Bottisham or Fen Ditton is unclear; can anybody identify the children or tell me why the Ministry devoted scarce resources to taking them in the first place? [SCANS OF THE MYSTERY SCHOOL PHOTOS] [SCAN 85.43 – FEN DITTON 1960S, SCAN 110.33 BOTTISHAM 1949]

The teaching aids used by the children at Fen Ditton school may have changed somewhat since those days. Today they’re probably collecting coupons for computers but back in May 1978 their ambitions were for something less technological, as the News reported:

“A fairy tale has come true for eighty children at Fen Ditton primary school. Their ancient record player is to be replaced with a brand new music centre despite none of their entries being successful in a recent News contest. It wasn’t for lack of trying. Every single child in the school, plus the teachers, had a go at winning something they have wanted for years. Pye Telecommunications, sponsors of the competitions were so touched by their enthusiasm they decided to contribute half the cost of a new centre and the News has chipped in the other half. ‘Everyone is thrilled and delighted about it’, said the headmaster, Mr A.M. Jones”

Now Fen Ditton villagers are anxious to capture memories of life in their community in those less frantic days before it was split in two by traffic thundering to and from the A14 junction. If you have tales to share, let me know and I’ll put you in touch.

The Leys School’s Clapham Society surveyed the village in 1961: Fen Ditton is becoming a dormitory suburb of Cambridge but still retains the flavour of an agricultural village. There is main water and most of the houses have electricity, but there is not much main drainage and much of the drainage is thought to go into the river. Hence the river is becoming a major problem because of the offensive odour and pollution, they found.

Despite this people liked to live beside the water: In June 1952 the Cambridge Preservation Society objected to the growth of chalets and caravans at Grassy Corner, Fen Ditton. They felt that haphazard development of individually respectable shacks had seriously spoiled this length of river. However the fifteen owners said they paid £14 a year rent for their plots and the land flooded in winter. Their gardens were well looked after and of similar layout to the “Plough” next door. Some of the chalets had been erected before the Town and Country Planning Acts came into force and if it was just the later ones that were removed the place would look like a mouth from which half the teeth have been knocked out. A gypsy encampment and rubbish dump on the opposite side of the river made it difficult to understand the Society’s objections.

Memories 5th April 2006, by Mike Petty

On Sunday motorists on the Military Road from Stretham to Wicken could have been forgiven for thinking that the end of the world was nigh.

For the skies to the west darkened as heavy clouds rolled in and the view to the east disappeared in a haze of dust as gale-force winds whipped up the fen soil and blew it across the road.

Such phenomenon are not new: there was a major blow in March 1895 and a series of them in 1929. More recently, in April 1955, the News reported: A storm of brown dust is blowing high into the air over the Swaffham Fen area. Growing seedlings have been uprooted and plants torn from the ground by the near gale-force winds that have been raging in the past few days. It has caused serious damage to crops and important drainage ditches have been filled in. Farmers are now faced with replanting their crops.

It was a scene repeated three times in Spring 1973 when the lighter peat soils in the Soham, Stretham and Mepal areas were carried away. But that was not as bad as in the previous year when more than 10,000 acres of sugar beet had to be replanted following a blow at roughly the same time. The winds were back in April 1976 and in May 1979 when Prickwillow, Coveney & Chatteris were buffeted, though fortunately a cloudburst dampened the fields after an hour's blowing.

The problems of the fen blow were examined by Arthur Astbury in 1958. He described how those living in the path of the clouds of fine soil secured their doors and windows as soon as the alarm was raised. But even barricaded doors and windows were not proof against the peat dust which is capable of penetrating into every nook and cranny of the house.

Those actually in the fields found work impossible because of the blinding and choking effects of the dust. Men had spent hours on their tractors preparing a fine seedbed for spring sowing, going home as black as sweeps from the dust rising from the rich peat of those days. Now they were forced to watch as the wind whipped up the newly-sown seed and blew it away

There was no option but to start all over again. It was no unusual thing for the farmers to have to plant sugar-beet seed two or even three times over, or having planted sugar-beet to harvest their neighbour's wind-sown carrots or onions, he recorded.

But there were other problems: the blown-away soil would often settle into the drainage ditches on which farmers relied for irrigation, necessitating more hours of work to clean them out again.

One answer to the problem was claying: digging down into the underlying buttery clay soil and mixing it with the lighter topsoil. This was labour-intensive work and contractors who used a dragline to bring it to the surface charged between £25 and £30 an acre for their service.

Astbury also commented on another phenomenon: the land might catch fire. When the peat soil was dry it could easily be set alight by a bonfire of unwanted straw. In 1871 the peat in Conington Fen had caught fire and burned for several weeks. At night the little hillocks of flame bursting from the surface of the burning soil gave a brilliant display which would be seen clearly by travellers on the nearby railway line.

Once such a fire had started it could spread through the peat for hundreds of feet and even with the resources of the 1950s fire brigades would take days for to put out. Left unattended they could burn for years, as at Mow Fen Drove, Littleport, where fire spread over hundreds of feet until it was stopped after nearly two years by a cross dyke. Finally the whole surface of the drove was reduced to a length of white ash.

Such fires could undermine the peat foundations of railway lines and were so common between Waterbeach and Ely that during hot spells the track was inspected regularly by fire patrols with small mobile pumps.

There were other problem: the buried trees that had been discovered as wartime farmers dug for victory, ploughing land that had not been ploughed before, could catch fire. The land also sometimes yielded buried bombs – but fortunately no peat fire had yet exploded one, he observed.

Whatever the problem to the farmer such blows are spectacular sights. Last year I was guiding a coach-load of folk through the fens on a beautifully bright day, the area was looking magnificent and seemed to have lost that reputation for boring flatness that some people ascribe to it.

But then as we left Manea the dark clouds rolled in until they almost reached down to the black soil with just a bright strip of brilliant light separating them. Then the fen started to rise up, sweeping soil across the road ahead of us. The driver turned on his lights, turned off the fresh-air intake and the atmosphere inside the coach changed as we witnessed the untamed side of fenland. At least we were in a coach, not on bicycle or on foot, as others have been when day turns to night in the middle of the afternoon.

Memories, 12th April 2006, by Mike Petty

The forgotten story of whippet racing in Cambridge has been revealed through a number of folded pieces of cards treasured by Royal Parr of Girton.

In January 1902 a rabbit coursing and whippet race meeting was held in a field near the Milton Road, Cambridge. There were some fine dogs in attendance and some good sport was witnessed. This was not the first such meeting but now people were advocating the idea of a society and the proposal was receiving considerable support.

By 1911 the Cambridge Whippet Racing Club had been established with their headquarters at the King's Head public house in Magdalene Street. When this was demolished by Magdalene College they moved first to the George Hotel in Thompson's Lane and then the Maypole in Portugal Place. The club organised an annual dinner when youngsters like Royal were invited, but not allowed to drink

The club initially offered a Challenge Cup to be competed for each year over a distance of 140 yards; soon a Puppy Cup followed over a course of 100 yards and a third 160-yard open handicap quickly followed. [SCAN OF WHIPPET CLUB MEMBERS WITH THE CUP]

Races were held on a straight track marked out in the fields on the right-hand side of Arbury Road. The lanes were designated with strings and any dog that left its designated lane was disqualified and the race rerun. At the start 'slippers' held the dogs by the collar and tail by the appropriate handicap line until the gun went off when the whippets raced to the far end of the track where their owners were calling them. There was no live bait and betting was officially banned. [SCAN OF RACE AT ARBURY ROAD]

Royal's father's dog 'Dots' came second in novice competitions on Easter Monday and Whit Monday 1911 before moving up the main competition on Boxing Day and again just being pipped for the main prize. But success came next year when it romped in first in the July open handicap. It was not their first win for another dog, 'Sonny', had taken the main prize on Easter Monday 1912. [SCAN OF CERTIFICATE, SCAN OF PROGRAMME OF RACES]

Competitions continued to be held on Arbury Road until September 1923 but by August 1925 the track had switched to Mr Grain's meadow at Station Farm near the Cambridge Cattle Market where a good crowd watched the racing on Good Friday 1928. That year a Greyhound Racing Club was formed and this heralded the decline of whippet racing. However competitions continued to be held at the Cambridge Mammoth Show and as part of the Conservative fete at Wandlebury House along with tennis, fixed-jack bowling, skittles, 'Ringing the Horse' and 'Cutting the Chicken' (whatever that was!)

Greyhound racing continued to thrive; in 1947 there were proposals for a greyhound sports stadium at Cherry Hinton; another proposal for a track on land off the Landbeach Road at Milton was lodged in spring 1951. There would be 104 evening meetings a year with floodlighting in the winter. It was opposed by the County Council who were worried it could have been developed as a speedway track. Chesterton Fen Estate was suggested as the site for a stadium in 1964 but it was 1968 when a greyhound track was laid out at the Cambridge City Football Club ground on Milton Road where meetings continued until 1984. [POSSIBLE CEN PICTURE]

But can you add to its story and do you have memories of going to the dogs?

Memories of Rattee and Kett – 19 April 2006 - Mike Petty

News of the closure of Rattee and Kett may mark the final chapter in a long history

In 2001 the dedication of a new Processional Way at Ely Cathedral marked the first major addition to that building for many centuries. It launched the Ship of the Fens into the 21st century, after much of the preceding century had been involved with the skilful restoration and repair of the original fabric. 100 years earlier another major religious building had been completed; this time the Roman Catholic church of Our Lady in Hills Road, Cambridge. One company links the two – Rattee and Kett.

George Kett was a Norfolk man who had worked on the restoration of Norwich cathedral in the 1830s, and then moved on to the new Houses of Parliament in London. Meanwhile in Cambridge another craftsman, James Rattee, had enhanced his reputation with his carving on the choir stalls at Ely Cathedral. He had also acquired a building site on the corner of ‘a little land leading to nowhere’. He chose a good spot for a few years later the railway reached Cambridge, and the lane became Station Road.

The two men struck up a partnership and a ‘Wood and Stone Carving Works’ was established. They constructed their stone and joinery works, builders yard and office beside Rattee’s house, Poplar Cottage at the end of the road. Their partnership was to be short lived, Rattee fell violently ill and died within forty-eight hours. Kett continued the business. The rest, as they say is history. Wherever there was restoration or stonework the company was there; in colleges, cathedrals, churches its craftsmen were employed. Huge blocks of stone were transported to Cambridge to be shaped and carved in the traditional way. But as the century moved on the old workshops became too small. A piece of land was bought at Purbeck Road and the stone works moved there; in the 1950s the joinery department also moved, leaving only the offices on the original site. Then they too moved.

The old house was pulled down and a modern office block, Kett House erected, with its distinctive emblem of the oak tree – a reminder of a much earlier part of the family story, the revolt of 1549 when peasant farmers had rebelled against inclosure. Kett House itself has now recently been renovated.

Meanwhile at Purbeck Road work continued. In 1963 the company was working on renovation of the Prime Minister’s residence in Downing Street and at the same time building the new Churchill College in addition to a miscellany of jobs such as tombstones, boundary stones, fountains and all manner of intricate stone and wood work. In wooden outbuildings the fine craftsmanship continued, and outside working hours the craftsmen took part in social and sporting activities, such as cricket matches. Their yard was filled with rough blocks of Purbeck and Clipsham stone offloaded by giant cranes from lorries that had negotiated the Cambridge.

Then at the end of the twentieth century Rattee and Kett were on the move again, this time to Longstanton. Their new premises did not have the quaintness of the original Station Road site but were designed for efficiency, the heavy blocks of stone transported by overhead gantries through the various processes of rough and intricate shaping. But the traditional craftsmanship remained with the ancient skill of stone carving now supplemented by men producing intricate pieces of sculpture or mouldings, but utilising a modern material, Codestone, to produce exact replicas of historic artefacts.

Rattee and Kett took their traditional skills into the Digital age, but do you remember the old days, did you work on the turrets or pinnacles of King's college; can you add some more personal memories to a history that is literally carved in stone?

MEMORIES 23rd April 2006, by Mike Petty

A recent Memories article has triggered poignant reflections for two News readers, Veronica Asplen of Cambridge and Betty Harling of Reach.

They each wrote that photographs of the 'Fen Blow' and digging out the bog oak brought back happy memories of their wartime Land Army days in the fens.

Veronica writes: "We would go off to work in old army lorries down to Swaffham Fen, or Soham and Isleham". Betty agrees: "Our driver was Mr Arthur Thompson from Swaffham Bulbeck and another local man as our ganger, Mr Ison. There were about 11 or 15 of us in each gang. We worked on all sorts of jobs: sugar beet, setting carrots, potato picking and fruit picking (our favourite)"

They both helped to dig out the buried trees known as bog oaks. Veronica recalls: "On the days we went to dig out the bog oaks we thoroughly enjoyed ourselves. It was very interesting, as we didn't know just how big the bog oak would be. When we had got it uncovered enough for the tractor men to secure it and pull it out we would all cheer". But that was just the beginning: "After they were dug out we had to saw them up into small logs, I can tell you that two of us, one each end of a two-man cross-cut saw was very hard work for two young girls", Betty adds.

Both remember the fen dust: "When the wind blew – it sure did blow. We had headscarves tightly on our heads but the black dust got in our eyes and up our nose and in the roots of our hair. When it really got too rough we got back in the lorry". "Even after having a good scrub you still didn't get rid of all that dust, it would be coming out of your eyes, ears and hair, you never seemed to get rid of it"

When work was done there was time to relax. "Some evenings we would wander into the village and visit either 'The Rose and Crown' or 'The Cock' and have a good old sing song round the piano and a half a pint of mild beer (four-pence-halfpenny a pint). They were certainly good days for me because it was in the Rose and Crown that I met this young soldier who was on demob leave and we have now been married nearly 58 years", Betty confides.

They were amongst 30 girls based at Swaffham Prior House, which had been loaned to the 'War Ag' for the duration of the war. It was large but not luxurious: "Old wooden staircases, no carpets on them and old iron baths – it was a scramble each day to get to the bathroom first. You had to look in your bed before you dare get in because the earwigs used to crawl through the windows out of the ivy", says Betty

Both ladies recall a wonderful return to their wartime home, Veronica speaks for both: In June 1985 Mr Michael Marshall and his wife gave us a very warm welcome to visit the house – we had not been back there since leaving it in 1948. We had food and champagne and were free to look all over the place again. Meeting up with all the 'girls' once more was lovely. At the time we said we would all like to meet again – but alas 21 years have now gone by. I'm 76 now and I was one of the youngest"

Betty has lent me some wartime snaps of the girls and a picture of them all at the reunion. If this sparks memories for you, then do let me know.

In days gone by Bank Holidays often meant excursions by railway train.

Neil Lanham has fond memories of journeys on the old Stour Valley line from Cambridge to Haverhill. He recalls: "At Cambridge you went on the platform far up to the right-hand end where all the fish was kept so there was very strong smell everywhere". But it wasn't just the smell that could be unpleasant in those days of steam locomotives: "As a little boy I would cry out 'Mum I've got something in my eye'. She would get the corner of a handkerchief and pull my eyelid back to get it out. The grit that came off those trains felt like a lump of coal in your eye. [SCAN OF A SMOKEY CAMBRIDGE STATION IN THE 1950S – PHOTO BY JOHN CARTER]

"From the train corridor wherever I saw people I waved and every single person always waved back. On one occasion our carriage did not have a corridor; the next thing was 'Mum I've got to go to the toilet'. Mum duly told the guard at Linton station where the whole train was made to wait for me whilst I got off and went to the station lavatory.

"At Bartlow there would be boxes and boxes of chickens from Lydite Chicks so you were held up there while they were loaded in the guards van. These little tiny chicks were in double cardboard hayboxes and were sent right the way across the country - you could buy them for a penny each.

"When Dr Beeching finally axed the railway out of Haverhill, myself, John Alderton, Bill Dobinson, David Hartless and two others dressed in top hats and tails and performed the duty of undertakers, carrying the coffin of Haverhill station to Cambridge. The coffin came back strapped on the top of a car as this was the last train" [CHECK FOR NEWS PICTURES OF THE HAVERHILL LINE]

Neil has continued his fascination with the railway and has produced a DVD of Cliff Pearman who worked as a fireman on the steam trains out of Cambridge from 1944 to 1957. Cliff was on the footplate of the Royal Train that carried the body of King George VI from King's Lynn to King's Cross in February 1952. He will be sharing his experiences together with other old footplatemen at a meeting of the Clare Railway Circle to be held in Clare Social Club on 8th May. Many readers have responded to my request for memories of Rattee and Kett, the Cambridge stonemasons

Ken Dean from Great Shelford started his apprenticeship as a carpenter and joiner in September 1947 at the age of 15. He was based at the Station Road site and worked on many beautiful buildings including, Trinity, Queens' and King's together with Eton College, the Houses of Parliament and Westminster Abbey where he was in charge of restoration work for four years. He produced joinery for St Paul's cathedral and the organ case for Cape Town cathedral. When the Station Road yard closed everything moved to Purbeck Road where there was a large joinery machine shop as well as a joiner's shop producing high-quality woodwork. It closed in the 1990s owing to competition from other joinery firms.

The stone department continued with stone arriving by rail right into the yard. After the line closed it was brought by lorry in seven-ton blocks and was sawn and worked by the carvers and stonemasons. One of these was D.G. Goodge from Cottenham who rode his bicycle through the gates of the site in Purbeck Road in April 1962 to start his five-year apprenticeship. He spent the first three years in the workshop learning how to work stones into shape ready for fixing on to buildings, then two years actually fixing them on site. He was involved in the major restoration of King's College Chapel in 1968, first repointing the vaulted ceiling then moving outside to repair the pinnacles, parapets and string course. The old stone work was dismantled and replaced with new prepared in the workshops.

These were but two of the specialist team of skilled workmen employed at Rattee and Kett. But it wasn't just men, as Jim Charles from Gt Shelford recalls. His aunt, Gladys Brant, worked for the firm in the early 1920s; as a recording artist she had to go onto the roof of King's College Chapel to draw the details of the pinnacles to ensure the accuracy of form when the replacements were needed. Her drawings may be preserved amongst the extensive archives of the company that were transferred to the new works at Longstanton – an archive that will hopefully be preserved as record on paper of the workmanship that will live on in the magnificent structures they have helped to save

Memories 10th May 2006, by Mike Petty

John Bowers' uncle Bert had a job that many lads envied: he was a signaller at Fordham railway station. "In the early 1950's I spent many happy hour with him in the signal box", John recalls. "He let me pull the levers sometimes, he taught me the bell codes for the different classes of train. He may have been training me to become a signaller like him and in later life I did", he recalls. "When the goods train came into the sidings, shunting the yard, I used to have rides if uncle Bert knew the engine driver and firemen. I also got to know Mr Jeff Reed, the station master, a real gentleman. My father worked on the railway too: he was a head shunter at Ely".

Fordham station now is just a memory. The last passenger train on the line from Cambridge to Mildenhall ran on Saturday 16th June 1962. Freight business continued for a couple of years until the station finally closed in September 1965. Bert's signal box lasted until 1973. John Bowers' recollections are recorded in his new book 'Greetings from Fordham' which is illustrated by old photographs and postcards and sells for £3.99. [SCAN OF FORDHAM STATION 1960'S]

Memories of another signal box survive in a photograph taken by John Carter of Cambridge in the 1950s when the traditional old levers had been replaced with something more modern. But can anybody recognise which one it is or name the signalmen? [SCAN OF SIGNAL BOX]

My recent article on whippet racing stimulated memories for Bernard Wallman of Shelford. After peering intently at a picture of the Whippet Racing club members he believes he can spot his grandfather, J.H. (Jack) Wallman, an avid whippet breeder and racer on the front row. One of Jack's dogs, "Nuff Said", ran with some success in the whippet races on the track at Arbury Road in the 1920s. [SCAN OF WHIPPET RACES AT ARBURY ROAD, CAMBRIDGE 1920s]. Kathryn Spark from Sawston records the success of a more recent whippet, her own dog North 2 South. Based in Cambridge, it was runner up in the National Championship and won over twelve titles during his racing career running on the race tracks in the North. "It is such a shame the track at Cambridge did not survive", she adds.

More details of early greyhound racing in Cambridge have come from an 80-year-old correspondent from Cottenham who filled the pages of his letter so full that he did not leave space for a signature. He writes: "The track I remember most was in Coldham's Lane in the 1920s. My uncle, Jack Pollendine used to keep it in order and was 'slipper' – he used to pull the rope that opened the traps to let the dogs out to race". The process of starting was quite complicated. The hare consisted of a rugby ball covered by a rabbit skin that was attached by a rope to the back wheel of an old London taxi raised on blocks. Last minute checks had to be made before each race. "Bert Rumbelow rode a motorcycle, with me on the pillion; when we got to a bend in the track I would hop off and make sure the rope was in the groove. We'd carried on round to the traps, drop the hare off and get back to the old taxi. Bert started it up and when uncle rang a large hand bell he's put it in gear and away they'd go. We got lots of 'no races' as it was difficult to get the right speed all the time, but the crowd enjoyed it".

Michael Taylor from Cottenham recalls one of his former workmates at Rattee and Kett, Mick Brignell. He loved his work, told funny stories & sang all day. His favourite song was his own version of an old Music Hall ditty 'I'm yearning for my dear old home again'. Mick's words:

'I'm yearning for my dear old watch and chain
It's in the pawn shop at the top of Thompson's Lane
I can hear the church bells chiming,
And I know my watch wants winding,
Oh! I'm yearning for my dear old watch and chain'

Michael's lent me a snap taken on a firm's excursion to Southend in Summer 1949. It shows Reg Darley, James 'Geordie' Quale, Bill Money, 'Morry' Rawlinson, Mick Taylor and Jack Kemp. Apparently they had visited several 'watering holes' by the time the picture was taken, perhaps it shows! [SCAN OF RATTEE AND KETT OUTING TO SOUTHEND]

Patricia Cooper has written from Rushden sending photographs and extracts from the 'London John' for June 1958 showing the firm's craftsmen working on a new High Altar for St Paul's Cathedral. Her dad Frank Fortin was amongst them, as was Terry King from Witchford who has his own series of photographs of the projects that he was involved with. Derek Pugh from Stevenage adds that during the war R&K made floating Bailey bridges and moulds for the Mulberry Harbours used on D-Day.

Wartime sacrifice was remembered last Sunday with the dedication of a restored memorial at St Paul's Church in Hills Road, Cambridge. Dr Simon Brook has been part of a team researching the background to the names inscribed on it. They have discovered details of all of the people commemorated, except one. The name of 'Leslie Johnson' is recorded – but can anybody shed any details about him and how he came to lose his life. You can contact Simon on Cambridge 564416 or email brook215@ntlworld.com

Danny Kaye, the world-famous American comedian and actor entertained Cambridge audiences twice in May 1956. He was on screen at the Regal Cinema in 'The Court Jester', hailed by cinema publicists as the most lavishly-produced comedy in the history of motion pictures. In this richly-mounted VistaVision production – whatever that was – he appeared against a backdrop of medieval England complete with gallant knights in clanking armour, lovely damsels in distress, dastardly plotters and heroic rogues.

Given such publicity, and with the fame of his appearance as Hans Christian Anderson still fresh in people's minds, it was no wonder that his personal appearance at the Cambridge Guildhall saw crowds packing the Market Hill, besieging his car, seeking autographs and causing a minor riot.

During the 50 minutes he occupied the Guildhall stage he promised to 'liberate' the wives of University Dons, laid on the grand piano to display the most startling pair of shoes seen in Cambridge for many years and sang popular songs such as 'Ugly Duckling' and 'Davy Crocket'. Before long the audience were rolling in the aisles with laughter

But his visit had a more serious purpose. He was on an international tour with a camera team making a film about the children of the world for U.N.I.C.E.F. He took questions from the audience about ways of wiping out disease and its impact on world overpopulation and pointed out that a sick child in Burma looks the same as a sick child in Cambridge. Then it was back to music before it was time for him to depart for another venue, promising to return another time to bring more gaiety into the lives of Cambridge folk.

But did Danny ever return – or did you see him perform? Somebody who did was 14-year-old Jacqueline Spring, one of a group of schoolchildren on the stage who he singled out for his especial attention. After a good deal of persuasion, she kissed him on the cheek. Were you there? [SCAN 110.36 - DANNY KAYE ON THE STAGE AT THE GUILDHALL]

Derek Stubbings from Chesterton has memories of an interesting afternoon spent in East Road in January 1978. He writes:

"Clearance of the run down east side was then well under way and amongst those properties awaiting demolition was Loker's newsagents who had been there since at least 1895. The shop stood at the corner of School House Lane; from the pavement it was an ordinary two-storey dwelling, but from the rear it was three.

"After Loker's moved out I was given an opportunity to look through the large amount of unwanted stock left in the building, so on a Saturday afternoon in January I entered the building to see what (if any) 'treasures' might be found.

"Treasure there was none but many items of use in other ways were found. The well known author Arthur Mee had produced a weekly children's' encyclopaedia in the 1930's and two large advertising boards depicting St. George fighting the Dragon were found. Both were in good order, one had been nailed to the wall to cover up loose plaster. One board went to the children's' section at the Central Library the other to the Folk Museum. A pile of Cambridge street maps, slightly out of date, was taken for the Cambridgeshire Collection for use by school parties whilst some cheap exercise books and many other items of stationery were cleared for various uses. Perhaps the most interesting, certainly the most colourful, was a large collection of birthday cards (then probably 30-40 years old) and very different in style to cards on sale in 1978. The Saturday afternoon was well spent. [SCAN OF LOKER'S SHOP, EAST ROAD]

Can anybody shed light on a picture taken in Mill Road in the mid 1950s. It shows the corner with Hope Street but who is the elderly gentleman peeping out from the half-open doorway of Wallman's shop; who is it waiting to cross the road on the Zebra and what did Camford Products produce. David Lupson was the first to his computer to solve the mystery of a railway signal box I featured last week. He recognised it as Cambridge South signalbox which was situated at the Hills Road end of the station. David worked there in the 1970s and signalled the last train out of Cambridge South before taking duty at the new Cambridge power signalbox in October 1982 where he still works as a signalling shift manager.

The Cambridge South box had been commissioned in 1926 along with Cambridge North and Immingham. They were unusual as they had small electrically operated levers as opposed to long manual levers like those at the signalbox at Coldham Lane - which David also operated. Memories 24th May 2006, by Mike Petty

It is amazing how things come together sometimes.

Bernard Wallman's family were involved in the early days of Cambridge taxis.

He has lent me a photograph of his great grandfather Charles Wallman with his horse drawn hackney carriages and another of his grandfather, Jack, with what must have been one of the earliest motor taxis in the town, taken he believes about 1913. It may have been earlier for the first ten licences for motor taxis in Cambridge were granted in 1908 and they soon became a familiar sight. Next year a taxi driver was fined for speeding – he'd reached a terrifying 12 miles an hour.

To meet the competition the hackney-cab men had to start working on a Sunday, something they'd not done before. But anti-social hours were always part of the job. Bernard recalls: "As a young boy, I well remember Christmas family gatherings being disrupted when the menfolk went off to the station to meet and pick up passengers on the only evening train from London."

This rang a bell with me so I searched some of the stories I've carried in my 'Looking Back' column. I was right: There was one Christmas when the family's celebrations must have been somewhat muted. A report in the CDN of December 1930 contains the details:

‘The booking hall at Cambridge railway station was the scene on Christmas Eve of one of the most extraordinary happenings ever witnessed. As a taxicab was being driven back to the station rank its driver suffered a seizure; the vehicle careered through the booking hall entrance and crashed into the collapsible iron gates near the ticket collector’s box. An eye-witness described the scene: “I was standing on the platform, quite close to the barrier, when I heard a tremendous crash against the iron gates. There was the taxi with the front crumpled up in the framework of the barrier and the time indicator smashed. When the taxi was dragged away a front tyre deflated. It must have entered the station at 30 miles an hour. The marvel of it is that there are only a few inches to spare at the sides of the entrance. If the barrier had been wide open it would have gone right on to the track, and a train was just due.” Three people waiting for a train were slightly injured and the driver, Frederick Wallman of Cambridge Place, recovered.

Then just as I was drafting this article I had a telephone call from John Franklin of Linton and whilst chatting it transpired that his father, Bill Franklin, had been the ticket-collector on duty at the station when this happened and told them all about it when his shift finished! [SCAN OF ENTRANCE TO CAMBRIDGE STATION AT CHRISTMAS 1954]

John also mentioned that he spent his early years at Ramsey station – and that tied in with another email from Chris Barringer who is seeking details of railway services in that area. You can reach him at chris.baz@mac.com. The station features in part of the displays at the wonderful Rural Museum at Ramsey where they are planning for a 1940s weekend to be held at the former RAF base at Upwood on 19th and 20th August. It promises to be a magnificent event with military and civilian living history and vehicle displays, dancebands and much more. For details contact Abbey Antiques at 63 Great Whyte, Ramsey – phone 01487 814753

John Franklin also knows all about the Cambridge signalbox I featured a couple of weeks ago while Mrs A. Stearn from Willingham has written to identify the signalman as her late father, George Webb, who died in December 1959.

But the Wallman saga is not finished yet

Bernard was back on the email to say he saw his late father's shop at 224 Mill Road in last week's Memories. He knows all about it: “The picture was actually taken for the Danish Bacon Company who had a local depot just off Cherryhinton Road. They commissioned it for use in a promotional campaign to show them delivering to a typical High Street grocer. You can clearly see the DBC Van parked outside How's Bakery and the DBC delivery man walking into the shop with a side of bacon over his shoulder.

“The man peering out of the shop goods entrance was a local man Mr. Coote who worked for my father as a part time general storeman. Another employee also in the photo (partially obscured by the Camford van and a parked bicycle) is Herbert Frost. He drove the order delivery van and in the photo one can just about be seen him pushing a sack barrow loaded with customers orders in boxes to load the van parked round the corner in Hope Street. Herbert lived in Argyle Street and helped my father for many years”.

John Merry from Cherry Hinton emailed to say he also recognised somebody on the picture: “The lady on the zebra crossing is my Grandmother Jessie Ayres. My whole family recognised the coat and even her poise while crossing the road, unmistakably 'Jessie'. She was born in 1898 in the Brookfield's Tavern and lived in Mill road most of her life. As a young girl she worked for the Co-op which is where the photograph was taken from. Jessie married Jack who served in the great war as one of the first tank drivers. They had one daughter my mother Peggy. During the late fifties Jessie also worked in the Dorothy supermarket in the town centre. She passed away peacefully aged 104 at Bottisham in 2002. Her sharp mind would even recall the news of the sinking of Titanic when she was a young girl as well as other family memories. Jessie was unique, her life spanned three centuries and will never be forgotten, even her coat,” he tells me

Memories 31st May 2006, by Mike Petty

Elaine Wheatley from Cambridge has written to recall an Anglo American Fair held in the Guildhall, in February 1958. It was to raise money for the restoration Little St Mary's church that was in dire need of repairs costing some £7,500 (approximately £100,00 in today's money).

The church contains a Memorial Tablet commemorating Godfrey Washington, thought to be the Great Uncle of George Washington, the first President of the American Republic and the family's Stars and Stripes' coat of arms.

Tony Hart the minister hit on the idea of celebrating the church's American connection by inviting local civilians and service folk to join them in a day of Americana with stalls and side shows from both sides of the Atlantic. The English stalls would be typically English and vice-versa. In the evening, there would be an original kind of soiree, with a hamburger bar and refreshments and a transatlantic exchange of entertainment.

Then he arranged for it to be opened by the wife of the American Ambassador. It meant they could arrange a guard of honour to receive her at the Guildhall and as she was known to the Royal Family the Queen wrote congratulating the organisers, the Queen Mother sent a case of dessert knives and forks and Princess Margaret gave a “delightful tea service”.

The evening saw floor shows by the ‘Footlights’ and from the ‘Broadway Revue’ consisting of various groups from the USAF stations. Sgt Leroy Rose from Corpus Christi, Texas, was caller for the Buttons and Bows, a square dance group from Alconbury, followed by the Rainbows Rhythm and Blues group all negro. Ed Masters from Cleveland, Ohio, played his accordion and then Hosea Hornbuckle from Detroit, Michigan, led the Playboys quintet in singing a song called ‘sexy ways’. Certainly, this was nothing in the usual run of church fetes and raised a massive £455.14.5 net (or about £6 to £7,000 in today's money).

Square Dances were popular: the CDN carried a photograph of one in progress at the Guildhall in February 1955 – does anybody recognise themselves or their mum? And can anybody explain another picture taken by John Carter while he was a press photographer. It shows a queue outside the Guildhall of men wearing Stetsons, but who were they and why what were they doing. [SCAN OF SQUARE DANCE IN GUILDHALL 1955 AND QUEUE OF ‘COWBOYS’ ON MARKET HILL]

There is no shortage of memories about Danny Kaye's visit to Cambridge 50 years ago (Memories May 17th. Jean Pope of Comberton remembers: “I was at the Danny Kaye afternoon in the Cambridge Guildhall. I was working as a nanny at the time and the lady I worked for knew I was a fan of his, so she got me a ticket and gave me the afternoon off to go. He was a very good speaker. It was a big thing to see a big American star in Cambridge at that time and it was a superb afternoon”. She still treasures the News cutting of the event

The man who filed that report was Peter Hoskison. He writes from his Fulbourn home:

“I well remember the visit to Cambridge during May 1956 of that great film star and entertainer Danny Kaye. I had probably the best seat in the house in the Large Hall of the Cambridge Guildhall- sitting right at the front edge of the stage at the press table!

“In those far-off days when I had all my hair and teeth (happy memories of the bygone era) I was a couple of years into a long association with the good and great in Cambridge, as a journalist with the then Cambridge Daily News, now the Evening News. I was chosen to cover Danny's visit because the news editor thought I wanted cheering up. And he was right - Danny was the perfect antidote for a dose of mid-spring Cambridge blues. I recall being asked by him in front of the whole audience of around 700 people if I was being well paid. Sitting right at the feet of the Hollywood legend, I had to say yes, because the paper's owner, the late Alderman Captain Archie Taylor was also in the audience!

“I found Danny Kaye a perfect gent to chat to after his show - far more pleasant than many of the stage and political personalities I was to meet in the following year. It's a pity we do not have a few more high-quality entertainers around like him today. Never a smutty word or innuendo - just an endless stream of funny jokes” [DANNY KAYE AND PRESS MEN – CANNOT SAY ITS PETER H.]

Albert Waldock of Fulbourn has more details of the VistaVision process used for the Danny Kaye film, Court Jester, that was being shown at the Regal. It was pioneered by Paramount and was one of the forerunners of the new ‘wide screen’ techniques without the outlay of big screens and expensive lenses. It was soon ousted by Cinemascope. Albert should know: he was a projectionist for over 30 years at the Victoria Cinema. [SCAN OF REVIEW OF KAYE FILM]

But in May 1931 another superstar was appearing at a local cinema: Cambridge professor and physicist Lord Rutherford, together with Prof E.D. Adrian and two local MPs were amongst a party of Royal Society scientists who visited Spicers of Sawston to witness a breakthrough in film technology. Less than four hours afterwards they saw themselves in natural colours on the screen. Experiments in colour movie film had been going on for two years and it was hoped that Sawston would become a complete film colony rivalling Elstree in importance. It was not to be – but what happened to that original film?

Memories 7th June 2006, by Mike Petty

Soon Midsummer Common will resound to the sound and excitement of the midsummer fair – as it has for centuries. In 1887 it was hailed as "probably best known fair in world" and much of its success was due to the roundabouts and gallopers belonging to Henry Thurston, son of Cambridge brickmaker and founder of a showland dynasty.

This year, as usual the Mayor will proceed in civic state, proclaim the fair, distribute coins to the hoards of bystanders. [SCAN OF MAYOR PETER WRIGHT PROCLAIMING THE FAIR IN 1972]

The present Mayor (ADD HIS NAME) would do well to learn the lesson of his predecessor in 1901, as the News reported:

Midsummer Fair, the delight of children and the pleasure of not a few adults was formally opened. On reaching an open space councillors in their carriages commenced throwing the coppers. A spirit of mischief seemed to be present in the first carriage for the coins fell thickest in close proximity to the crockery-ware stalls, one or two even finding a resting place amongst plates. The children pushed and hustled with such energy that a few of the articles were damaged, much to the disgust of the proprietor

The civic party will then proceed to the amusements where the Mayor will be photographed riding the dodgems or shooting at the rifle range – or whatever happens to be the latest trend to part punters from their pennies. [SCANS: MAYORAL LIMOUSINES AT THURSTON'S ROUNDABOUT AND THE MAYOR IN A DODGEM CAR – 1950s]

The fair was a little different a century ago as this report from June 1900 emphasises: Of roundabouts there are plenty and there are two resplendent switchbacks. Half-a-dozen shows include a menagerie and cinematograph exhibition and the remainder of the fair is made up of shooting galleries, coconut shies, toy and sweet meat stalls, cheapjack wares and drinking booths. There are no less than 15 refreshment saloons, some of which serve a double purpose in supplying thirsty ones and providing accommodation for dancers.

But there was another side: the horsefair. In 1900 animals of all sizes were put through their paces on the sodden grass. Business was brisk, cart horses and nags forming the major portion of the stock. Buyers from many part of the country were at the fair and quite an average amount of buying and selling was done.

The fair was a profitable venture, in 1904 it was calculated that showmen were taking about £650 in a single evening to say nothing of the amount expended during the afternoons. But this hit locals: Sir – every year our Midsummer Fair is visited by a number of itinerant merchants selling pots, pans, linoleum, furs, drapery and various oddments. They pay little rent and no rates and taxes and yet they take away hundreds of pounds which our to be spent in local shops. In many cases people actually pay more for the goods at these mock auctions than they would in a proper shop – Tradesman, 1905

There were other complaints:

Sir – is it not about time that the annual Bacchanalian orgy known as Midsummer Fair was abolished? On Saturday night men, women and even children intoxicated by drink were behaving like maniacs. There were 14 tents for the supply of intoxicating liquors whilst behaviour in the dancing tents is indescribable. – A.J.L.B.

Sir – may I protest against the needless pandemonium Chesterton residents are forced to endure during the Midsummer Fair by the hideous orchestrations attached to shows and merry-go-rounds, grinding out harsh and discordant sounds which make day and night a time of torture. No sane people can find pleasure in the ear-splitting metallic sounds emanating from these machines. Such a noise, coupled with the hooting of horns and the screeching of steam whistles render rest an impossibility – Nerves

It was this noise that was one reason that in 1931 the council decided to ban the fair from Midsummer Common and send the showman to Stourbridge Common where Cambridge's other fair was held – although by then in a very insignificant manner. But there were others: council money had been spent reseeding the grass and they didn't want the heavy traction engines and other fair equipment on it. It was considered extremely thought unlikely the fair would ever return. But showmen objected and arranged a separate fair on a meadow on Newmarket Road, opposite Ditton Fields. Next year it was back on its traditional site. It was discontinued during the early years of the Second World War, reopening in 1943 and by 1953 was back in full swing: [SCAN OF THE WALL OF DEATH 1925 – WHICH ADDED TO THE NOISE]

A miniature town of tents, side-shows and enormous gaily-coloured structures housing a thousand thrills for the venturesome has made its annual appearance on Midsummer Common. But this year the Fair seems to be bigger and brighter than ever; it offers a more animated scene than in the past and there is an air of friendly gaiety, shared by showmen and their patrons which suggests the influence of Coronation year. The Fair is the biggest in the Eastern Counties and can boast no fewer than 24 roundabouts. The 'Dodgems' are a special feature, reputedly amongst the best of any fair in England.

But by 1981 its future was once more in doubt as councillors and fairmen argued over rent increases, prompting one showman to admit. "The fair is quite honestly not that good – its large, but not well-attended". It was the last fair for Cambridge's master showman, Stanley Thurston who, aged 83, had never missed a Midsummer Fair in his life. The News photographed him wearing his customary bowler hat at the ceremonial opening – [NEG 2436 81 35]. SCAN OF STANLEY THURSTON – SCAN THE ORIGINAL NEGATIVE – 2436 81 25

Despite its ups and downs the mayor will be there again to proclaim open a Cambridge tradition – but when was your first fair, and what do you remember of the rides and attractions of the past?

Memories 14th June 2006, by Mike Petty

The news that parts of Ely Cathedral may have been destroyed in an earthquake over 500 years ago has brought such ground-trembling events back into prominence.

There have been other local earthquakes over the centuries, including August 1089 which, according to ancient chronicles, made the buildings jump up and settled down again. There was another in East Anglia in 1165 which 'overthrew them that stood upon their feete and made the bells to ring'. More followed in 1231 and 1343. Two struck in 1750, one in August the other September, and another in 1896.

Two examples in living memory came in August 1926 when earthquake shocks of unusual severity were felt on a Sunday morning. In Cambridge occupants were awakened by the rattle of windows, crockery and furniture and residents in West Road were aroused from sleep by the oscillation of their beds; a lofty wardrobe continued to shake and its contents to rattle for some time. Railwaymen on night duty said the telegraph poles rattled and the windows of signal cabins shook. Several residents of Huntingdon felt three tremors.

Then on a Sunday morning, 11th June 1931 came another. It had been a strange day in Wisbech with brilliant sunshine followed by a terrific hailstorm, the heaviest in living memory. Then in the dead of night people in the town were awakened by the rumbling of what sounded like heavy traffic passing along the streets and the sound of crashing crockery and falling pictures. March residents noticed two distinct tremors: the tower of the town clock shook violently causing the bell to ring incessantly. [SCAN OF MARCH TOWN HALL CLOCK]

At St Ives many people were so terrified they sought refuge on the Market Hill and could not be induced to return to bed. The rattling of windows, ornaments and beds was accompanied by a deafening sound, as slates, bricks and pieces of mortar clattered to the ground, and at Mr A.E. Smith's house in the Broadway tiles fell with such rapidity that the noise was likened to machine-gun fire. The complete side of one chimney stack collapsed on the Market Hill and the bricks fell through the roof of disused offices below and into a bedroom, so frightening a young girl, Miss Cannon, that her parents had difficulty pacifying her. Bricks from the chimney of The George Inn, Bridge Street crashed to the footpath leaving a deep imprint, though John Brundell, who resided at the Globe, slept peacefully through it all. Other resident claims to have heard the railway trucks in the sidings buffeted one against the other [I WILL TRY AND FIND PIC OF ST IVES FROM NEWS LIBRARY]

Inspector Evans of Arrington had been on late duty and was awakened by a violent shaking; he thought somebody was trying to break in so he struck a match and saw the dressing table dancing about. At Comberton ten rows of slates fell off one house and a washstand was completely overturned and the ornaments damaged.

In Cambridge it was a very gentle earthquake according to the reporter's prose: "suddenly in the silence of a calm and tranquil night there came a mysterious, slow, oscillatory motion, quickening and increasing in intensity. It seemed as if a giant hand had seized the bed and was shaking it, gently but with irresistible might". [SCAN OF HEADLINE OF 12TH JUNE 1931]

Dr Balfour Gourlay of Millington Road had been reading in a downstairs arm-chair when he was aware of gentle swaying movements at about twenty-past one in the morning. He had experienced other earthquakes in South America and knew what it was. H.C. Webb of Oakington timed the quake as lasting about 50 seconds and checked his clock by wireless time signal to confirm that it struck at 1.25 am.

Mr L.W. Jones of King Street, Cambridge, was a wireless expert on the staff of Pye Radio and had a transmitting apparatus on the premises. Working only in the dim light from his valves he was amazed to feel the whole house, an old structure, tremble and shake. The walls quivered and the old stairs creaked. The apparatus on the large bench covered with 'gadgets' began to jump and a large dry battery, weighing six pounds, was thrown off the table. [SCAN OF KING STREET IN 1960S SHOWING OLD HOUSES, NOW DEMOLISHED]

At Queens' College the tremor caused the great bell to ring and at Addenbrooke's Hospital some of the beds on wheels rolled forward and nightstaff feared that some of the extensive structure alterations, then taking place, had collapsed.

The Ely district was more seriously affected, shocks were keenly felt in the west end of the city, where beds and their occupants were shaken, crockery displaced and the foundations of some houses were heard to crack. One lady thought her last day had come. But it seems the cathedral survived unscathed.

Memories 21st June 2006, by Mike Petty

Ely cathedral was packed a few nights ago for Lakenheath High School's Graduation ceremony. Hundreds of proud American parents watched as their sons and daughters processed down the aisle in ceremonial robes and beribboned caps to take their place on the stage erected beneath the Octagon. They stood for the National Anthems and listened to orations and music before it was time for the actual presentation of diplomas: a moment to be captured by numerous digital cameras and televised to those parents on duty overseas.

There were some subtle differences in academic dress that differentiated the students in a ceremony that combined dignity with delight in achievement. But there was one little tradition that went unobserved by most. As many of the students received their certificate they slipped something into the hand of the principal. He in turn pocketed it. When it was all over one side of his suit was bulging, full of multi-coloured combs – a useful present for a totally bald man! It could have been worse: last year the students had handed over golf-balls!

I had been invited to see the way Americans did things – Cambridge University does it a little differently. In the splendour of the Senate House their students kneel before the Vice Chancellor who recites a Latin formula and there is no forty-word message from recipients thanking mom and dad, sister and boy-friend such as those that enlivened the Cathedral ceremony.

These days Cambridge degree lists are posted on boards outside the Senate House, but a century ago crowds of dons and undergraduates congregated inside to learn the results. The examiners stood in the gallery and read through the names in order of merit before tossing down printed lists to be scrambled for while the friends of candidates dashed off to impart the news to those who dare not come to hear for themselves.

The names of the Senior Wranglers – those receiving the highest marks in the Mathematical tripos - made headline news around the world, especially in India when in 1906 an affiliated student from the University of Calcutta was jointly awarded the top prize. When the morning came for him to receive his degree he was greeted with applause from undergraduates packed into the Senate House.

But it was the afternoon proceedings that attracted most attention. Then it was not the highest achievers that were acknowledged but those who, not so academically gifted, had nevertheless persevered and gained a degree.

In 1906. H.R. Bell and W.Crouch, both of Selwyn, were bracketed last in the Mathematical Tripos and were each rewarded with a souvenir – a wooden spoon. In earlier times it had been a shovel with the college arms hastily painted on the bowl but by then it was a thing of beauty, a handsomely decorated trophy which would not be out of place in the most artistic study. Each was painted with the Selwyn arms together with the recipient's name and along the handle a pretty view of the college or Senate House.

The two giant spoons were suspended by strings from the galleries that were packed with raucous undergraduates shouting remarks to those below. Selwyn College degrees were awarded near the end of the list and as the moment approached so the spoons were made to jig up and down. Mr Bell was the first of the wooden spoonists to be admitted and when he arose, a full-fledged Bachelor of Arts, the token of his achievement was lowered to the floor. He was handed a pair of garden shears, decked with the college colours; with these he cut the string, bravely shouldered his spoon and marched out of the Senate House accompanied by a perfect tornado of cheers. Mr Crouch followed a minute later to a similar response.

The hullabaloo of the Senate House must have matched the whoops and cheers that echoed around Ely Cathedral as another proud institution celebrated the achievement of its students.

The wooden spoon ceremony was not to last much longer; indeed Cambridge University had already been voting on a new way of announcing the results and the last spoon was awarded to C.L. Holthouse of St John's college in 1909. But who knows, perhaps our American cousins may adopt it next year.

The spoon ceremony has been illustrated a number of times but recently one News reader, Mr S.M. Robertson of Queen Edith's Way, sent me a couple of old printing blocks dating back about 100 years. Using modern computer techniques I have been able to identify one of the views as showing the announcement of the award in the Senate House – something I do not remember seeing before. If so then it has filled another gap in the recorded history of Cambridge University

We seem to live in a world of instant communication; in streets and cafes people have mobile telephones clamped to their ears or are busy reading their messages on the move. Last week I had to learn to read such messages.

It started after somebody hijacked my email identity to send out spam. So I asked our village's computer guru, Chris and whilst he set out to remedy the problem decided to open another email account. Chris suggested one that linked to my ancient mobile phone, which seemed a good idea at the time. The only thing was that as part of the process I needed to receive a text message; when it came through neither of us knew how to read it! In the end I worked it out and set up the new account.

All was fine until I switched on the mobile phone, when it just kept ringing and ringing as email messages poured into it. Eventually I found out how to read and delete them, only to receive another batch and then more. At least it solved the mystery of what everybody else is doing on their phones – deleting spam emails!

I logged back on to the company's website to try and stop it happening. I learned lots and lots of other things, but not that. So when I was in Market Street, Cambridge I popped into the phone company's shop to seek the help of the experts there. One young gentleman told me what to do – just what I'd done before. So I asked him to show me on his computer. Twenty minutes later he'd still not managed to log in. But, fully instructed, I made my way to the computers at Lion Yard Library. After thirty frustrating minutes I decided to return to the expert. Again he could not log in.

Meanwhile the shop was busy with people, some of whom were as inept as I, seeking help to add minutes to their pay-as-you-go account, others seemingly fully apprised of all the latest gismos and gadgets who just wanted the latest handset (which had sold out!)

Can there ever have been a time like it? Well yes: in September 1898 the telephone was being hailed as one of the most marvellous inventions of Queen Victoria's reign – though not as important as the phonograph. This was described as a bit of glass in a frame, a bit of sapphire, a waxen cylinder, a machine that revolved by clockwork, and a tin horn. Result, the human voice had been caught, imprisoned and made to repeat itself again and again for all time. Like the mobile phone of today this endless source of pleasure it had a serious side. No business office was up to date with out it. It was invaluable in answering correspondence, as it could be dictated to at any time as fast as you speak.

The telephone was soon playing its part in everyday life; by January 1902 the Cambridge Volunteer Fire Brigade's new fire station in St Andrew's Street was in communication via the National Telephone Company to the three permanent salaried firemen on duty. The police too were quick to realise its potential: in December 1903 Detective Marsh was informed of the theft of a bicycle from Mr Edwards of Emmanuel Street and given the description of the suspect. He telephoned to Bishop Stortford and Hertfordshire police arrested the man near Buntingford. The prisoner told the court "If I had had another hour I should have been in London".

Farmers were pleased to learn that in February 1929 a telephone had been installed at Bartlow railway station. Many of them sent pigs to factories by road because they could not get in touch with the railway to order a truck and the railway company were losing a lot of business by not having telephones at all stations.

But what happens if there's nobody to take the call. In 1951 a Cambridge doctor came up with the answer. He coupled a recordon dictaphone, various wires, amplifiers and relays, together with other improbable odds and ends to provide the solution. If there was nobody to answer the patient heard, "Hello. This is the automatic telephone speaking. The doctor is at the hospital. Goodbye". He was now turning his inventive imagination in the direction of an apparatus which would also record an incoming message.

Not all new developments are improvements on the old: in 1929 the Post Office was working on a new handset where the mouthpiece and the earpiece were combined – you picked it up and put it to your ears and you could hear and speak whilst only using one hand. But it did not deliver the same quality of speech as the ordinary pedestal telephones. By coincidence whilst drafting this article I received a telephone call from a lady, apparently in India. She was offering me a new mobile phone – she must be joking, I've only just learned how to use the old one!

The new phones allow you to watch television – so what! In 1910 you could listen-in to plays at London West-End theatres by telephone. The system was known as the 'Electrophone' and enabled you to choose your theatre and listen to the whole evening without interruption.

Major developments have occurred in more recent years. In 1980 an entirely new kind of telephone was announced by Patcentre International of Melbourn. It used a high-frequency radio link which would 'beam up' to a microwave receiver installed on an ordinary telephone poles or high buildings. A user wanting to make a call would simply stand under one, dial and speak. The company thought it had a real future but might take a while to get accepted. At the same time there was Prestel, a specially adapted tv set connected to the telephone. A remote control keypad enabled it to dial up the local computer and access material stored in its memory which travelled down the ordinary telephone line. In the future one might use on-screen displays to teach children, exchange letters and conversations by text displays, vote in general and local elections and transmit newspaper-type material to a domestic print-out facility, the News speculated 26 years ago.

Now all I have to do is email this to the News. The only thing is that since I set up that new email address I get phone calls to see that my articles are not getting through. Time to call on Chris again!

Susan Mackay from Linton has responded to my request for memories of how youngsters coped with school harvest holidays in the days before television and the computer.

She writes:

"For the children of Hadstock in the 1950s, the long summer holiday posed no problems; we were country children with the fields and fresh air in our blood and we enjoyed the freedom to roam the countryside at will. Teenage culture had not been invented – or had not penetrated our rural backwater. You were a child until you left school and started work, which for most people was at the age of fifteen. It was, therefore, a motley collection of youngsters ranging from toddlers in the care of older siblings to fourteen year olds enjoying their last six-week break, who would set off on the day's adventures.

“But there were usually jobs to be done first. Older members would be sent to the allotments to collect the day's vegetables or, carrying heavy galvanised iron buckets, they would collect the day's water supply from the stand pipes dotted round the village, frequently having their efforts frustrated by little ones trying to tip them over as soon as they were filled. Then there would be purchases to be made at the village shop with small children carrying money wrapped up in the shopping list. Sometimes there would be weeding to do or picking up potatoes which had been dug the previous evening. Harvest time meant gleaning: in the days before combine harvesters children were sent to comb the stubble fields for loose heads of corn for chicken food.

“Work completed, the rest of the day was ours. We would meet up with other youngsters and were ready for our adventures. The ‘drome’, the old Second War aerodrome, was our adventure playground; we would explore down steps into dark, dank, subterranean shelters or peer through the windows of Nissan huts where American servicemen had given children's parties. We would climb the steps to the first floor of the control tower – all the more exciting because it was forbidden territory – and the ‘heap of dirt’ a large mound which dominated the flat airfield for many years into which planes returning from bombing missions had fired their unspent ammunition.

“There were various cross-country routes along lanes which were as familiar to us as village roads. We might stop off at one of the village ponds, littered with fuel canisters that had been jettisoned by aircraft returning to their base. These torpedo-shaped capsules could be used as canoes. An opening was cut in the top, any holes were plugged with clay and they it was ready to be set afloat. As the boys climbed in we girls watched with bated breath for the inevitable moment when the vessel started to sink.

“Many a lazy, hazy summer afternoon was spent sitting on top of the bank at Back Hill, opposite ‘The White House’ where we idled away our time making daisy chains or whistles from cow-parsley stems. If the grass on the cricket meadow had been recently cut we would rearrange the bales into houses, chairs and pyramids before wandering to a low point in the hedge to watch the cattle in the adjoining field.

“Inspired by our literary heroes in ‘The Secret Seven’ or ‘Famous Five’ we made dens, spied and stalked passers by. Any ‘suspicious’ looking characters would be silently shadowed from the other side of the hedge in our attempt to uncover some dark and dastardly deed. Our only coup was when we observed the green and white Wrenn's fish and chip van pull up along the Linton road. A man alighted carrying a large wire basket of uncooked, chipped potatoes. He hopped over the bank at the side of the road and proceeded to wash the chips in the fast-flowing water of the ditch! I don't know if it made any difference to his sales in the village but we certainly related this incident at every possible opportunity.

“By late summer the hedges were laden with blackberries which were eagerly gathered to be turned into pies, crumbles, jam and jelly. Rose hips were made into syrup, crab apples into jelly and elderberries into wine. We knew the meadows where mushrooms would appear as if by magic overnight and any fallen branches would be dragged home to add to the winter wood pile.

“And so our days were filled. The fresh air and exercise gave us hearty appetites and ensured we slept soundly, dreaming of plane crashes, weird cattle and sinking canoes on village ponds.”

But what would the mother of today think of such escapades!

Other children had the excitement of a railway trip to the seaside. Terry Beaumont from Cambridge has lent me a picture of children from the Ditton Fields Sunday School on the platform at Barnwell junction for their outing to Hunstanton in 1951. Do you recognise any faces? – SCAN 119.38

Memories 12th July 2006, by Mike Petty

The recent funeral in our village of a lady who, with her husband, had run the local petrol station – cum – bicycle repair cum much else beside saw older residents turn out to pay their last respects. But in an ever-changing village there were relatively few people who can now remember back to the 1960s and 70s when they were in business.

Yellowing newspaper cuttings tucked away in drawers or pasted into scrapbooks are valuable aids to jogging the memories of days gone past. Last week I had the privilege of meeting a number of men and women at a Camsight meeting at Melbourn and although their vision might be now dimming their memories were bright. I shared snippets and stories that I’ve discovered whilst compiling my ‘Looking Back’ column and they remembered the incidents and people mentioned.

Now two local historians have been busy at work unlocking such stories for their community. Barbara Slade has concentrated on Hardwick, journeying to the Cambridge Central Library in Lion Yard where there are indexes to the stories reported in the Cambridge Chronicle between 1770 and 1900. She has then turned to the newspapers themselves and transcribed the entries.

There are reports of sales and fires, thefts and inquests – all the things that find their way into the papers. One man who features was John Jaggard of the Horse Shoe public house. He was returning home from Cambridge just before Christmas 1843 and when he arrived at the top of the hill before reaching Madingley turnpike gate, three men came out from a field, threw him down & filled his mouth with dirt. They then picked his left hand breeches pocket of some papers of no value to anybody but himself and some silver and halfpence. It was strange they should have chosen this particular pocket, for it was the one into which he had put money he’d just received from Mr Moore, the poulterer. But the villains were disappointed, for John had banked it before leaving town.

In their haste to escape one of the robbers left his hat behind. It was distinctive, as it had originally been a high-crowned hat but had been reduced in height and the crown fastened on again. It was a vital clue for the police – and John just happened to be father of Inspector Jaggard of the Cambridge constabulary.

Madingley turnpike gate however remained a dangerous spot. In July 1851 James Mills, the Hardwick pork butcher was returning home with his donkey and cart when he was stopped near there by two men who dragged him from his cart, threw him on the ground and robbed him of three pounds. Barbara Slade's researches show that he was then living in the High Street and had three children, David, Arthur and Ben.

Similar stories for Elsworth have been researched by Dorothy Bienek, except that she has examined the period from 1900 to 1943. This includes the Great War and the aftermath of the Battle of the Somme in July 1916. The paper records village casualties: Corporal George Driver killed and Arthur Dawston, William Braybrooke, Harold Allgood, George Day, Herbert W Driver, Edwin Lyon and George Rolt wounded on the 1st July. The paper notes that Herbert Driver was wounded in the thumb, George had been his elder brother. Having recovered from his wounds, Herbert returned to the front; in May 1918 he was awarded the Military Medal and promoted from private to lance-corporal, before in July going on a signalling course.

There was mixed news of another local lad, John Desborough, one of a large family who lived at Cowdell End. At first it had been thought that he had been killed in action, but in May 1915 his family learned that he was a prisoner of war at Renbahn, Munster. While his family mourned the death of one brother, Herbert, in August next year and the wounding of another, at least they knew that John was safe. But then came the news he had died in captivity. At first they were told he had been injured whilst working in a foundry but then The Times broke the true story. John had come to the aid of a French prisoner who was being bullied by a sentry and been told to go away. As he did so the sentry shot him in the back.

Dorothy continues the chronicle of Elsworth life through the hardships of the 1920s and 1930s and on into the Second World War when once again the village names are in the headlines. Corporal Douglas Desborough married in the November of 1941, by the April of 1942 he was listed as missing. His subsequent fate must be sought elsewhere, for this selection of newspaper stories ends in July 1943.

As for Herbert Driver: he seems to have survived the trauma of the trenches for in January 1924 he was listed amongst the mourners at the funeral of Thomas Driver, his father. Fourteen years later his mother died and in December 1938 when the newspaper reported: "Mrs Lydia Driver, widow of the late Thomas and daughter of the late Webster Brand, died aged 78. Mourners were Mr & Mrs H. Driver (son and daughter in law), Miss Driver, Mrs A. Desborough, Mrs E. Dawson, Mrs G. Dear (daughters), and sons in law."

It is such small details that enable the family historian to fit another piece in their jigsaw of the past.

Memories 19th July 2006, by Mike Petty

Where are you going for your holiday this year?

How about a holiday camp, where board and lodging for the week cost £6 for men, £5 for women, where packed lunches are provided, where sheets, blankets and pillows are supplied but you must bring your own Wellington boots and thick gloves if coming in June or July.

That was the attraction of Friday Bridge agricultural holiday camp near Wisbech in 1968 when they expected between 400 and 500 visitors during the peak harvest season. These visitors would then recover their costs by working in the fields, picking strawberries gooseberries or raspberries and later plums, apples, beans and potatoes.

This was part of the development of the agricultural revolution that had started a century earlier when Richard Bath hired Osborne Farm near Wisbech. By 1895 he had laid down 400 acres of raspberries and strawberries together with 27 acres of currants. This meant that at the peak season there was far more work than local pickers could handle - 30 to 50 tons of fruit a day employing up to 1,300 people, many of whom travelled down from the East End of London.

By 1925 it was usual for them to come for a month – men, women and children of all ages. The campaigners were scattered around the area. The headquarters were at Leverington, with tents for recreation, canteen, medical treatment and day nursery. They lived in "bunks" - a name which covered various types of accommodation - tin huts, old stables or converted, railway carriages. Those allocated to Mr Hickman's farm found in 1914 that there was only bare earth for a carpet. They recalled: "in dry weather we were plague by dust and in the wet we waded in mud"

But, unlike at Friday Bridge in 1968 where discotheques and television, billiards and table tennis were the norm, in the 1920s there were no such distractions. It was not the farmer's duty to provide amusements for his workers and the only entertainment was in public houses. Mothers brought their children but there was nobody to look after them in the fields, and the working conditions produced a host of minor ailments such a sceptic finger - to leave it untended would be dangerous, to go to Wisbech to the doctor would mean a day off work.

To cope with this and other problems, and to preach the gospel to the poor whom they thought had been neglected by the churches in their industrial homes, the Cambridge Fruiting Campaign was launched around 1910. University dons and undergraduates gave up their time to journey into the fens. Dr Swainson from Sidney Sussex college organised the canteen at Leverington and played the organ, T.C.C.M. Moor of Trinity was lantern operator and medical man, G.H. Hewitt from Fitzwilliam Hall gave recitations and lightning sketches whilst J.W.Fisher from Trinity taught boxing.

Today the fruit pickers tend to come from Eastern Europe, not the East End of London, but this weekend reports from Herefordshire speak of people working more than 14 hours a day, seven days a week, sharing cramped caravans with no medical care. Perhaps it is time for Cambridge University staff and students to pack their cases and head out once more!

However the fruit must be harvested and the prospects of earning money by picking are still there. But the statement in the Fruit Campaigners report for 1925 is still as valid as ever – "Don't come if the mere sight of work makes you go all of a tremble, we can guarantee plenty of work and we don't want you if you don't care about doing it" [SCAN OF GOOSEBERRY PICKERS NEAR WISBECH 1930s] [SCAN OF FRIDAY BRIDGE AGRICULTURAL CAMP 1950's]

Many Cambridgeshire folk remember all about hot sticky working in the fruit fields, with wasps buzzing round. But the orchards themselves can be attractive places to visit, especially in spring time. One village that appreciates this is Haddenham where the ‘Blossoms and Bygones’ weekend attracts large crowds. The News snapped a group of ladies touring Norman’s fruit farm in 1962 – do you recognise anybody? [SCAN OF HADDENHAM LADIES]

My mention of Dorothy Bienek’s survey of Elsworth events from 1900 to 1943 brought back memories for Hubert Desborough who was born in the village and started work as a lad with horses. He remembers many of the people mentioned and can recall the incidents described. But Hardwick researchers will need to be patient, for Barbara Slade tells me she is still working away on her transcript of their village stories. It will be well worth waiting for.

The last few weeks have seen local schools celebrating the end of the academic year with educational trips. Back in July 1956 as part of the 21st anniversary celebrations of Chesterton Boy’s School 320 boys and staff travelled by special train to London. Once there they spit up: some boarded a bus to London Airport and Kew Gardens, others were shown over Westminster Hall and the Houses of Parliament by Cambridge MP, Mr Hamilton Kerr. Then it was off to the Tower of London, to South Kensington Museum, the Zoo, the International Horse Show and a river trip to the Maritime Museum at Greenwich. Memories of the outing itself have probably dimmed over the years but will be vividly reawakened by a photograph taken by the News and preserved by John Carter. It shows a number of the lads posing on the front of the locomotive, with some even standing on the track. But who can put names to the youthful faces of 50 years ago? [SCAN OF CHESTERTON BOYS SCHOOL SPECIAL TRAIN, 1956 – PLEASE USE IT AS BIG AS YOU CAN]

Life was simpler in the days before cinema or television. Cambridge had a circus of varieties in Auckland Road which presented a range of talent. Joy Adams from Trumpington writes: “Amongst such acts were gentlemen who manipulated puppets and learnt to speak without moving their lips. My maternal grandfather (real name Alfred Shearing) took the stage name ‘Trillo’ and joined up with Ven and Quist – it was they who coined the name ‘Ventriloquist’ It’s a good story, and she has a photograph of ‘Trillo’ in action. But they were not the first [SCAN OF ‘TRILLO’ PICTURE]

The Cambridge Chronicle reported how Lee Sugg was on his way to a performance in Ely, travelling in his own coach, when he met a old man by the wayside who waved him down and begged a lift. They got on well together till they got to Stretham. There were children playing about the street who ran behind and climbed on the coach so Sugg ordered his coachman to stop and reprimand them. But as soon as they set off again the brats clambered round, hanging on behind. Then as they got past the windmill and picked up speed there was a cry from underneath the coach – a child’s voice begging ‘Stop the coach ... stop the coach’. ‘Carry on driver’ called out Sugg, now most annoyed, ‘that’ll teach them to climb up on my conveyance’. This really upset his travelling companion who urged him to stop, but Sugg would have none of it. Eventually the passenger leaned out of the coach and roared at the driver to pull over, which he finally did. Jumping down he looked underneath the vehicle – but there was nobody there. Fearing the child must have fallen off he looked back up the hill towards the village – but saw nothing. Then he heard the cry again ‘Stop the coach’ coming from underneath. Back under he went, still no body...” It was then he realised why Lee Sugg was famous, yes he was a ventriloquist. The date: November 1799

Old posters preserved in the Cambridgeshire Collection show that in the 1820s Cambridge enjoyed a wide range of entertainers: they included Mr Wheatley who appeared at the Wrestlers Inn, Petty Cury in the September of 1829. He could make cards walk, dance, fly or be visible or invisible at a word and took two eggs, out of one he extracted a live animal the size of a duck – and the other one danced the hornpipe! The act included ‘the extraordinary transformation of a piece of money into a child, who will sing a song and converse with any of the audience, in which several specimens of ventriloquism will be introduced’ [SCAN OF PART OF POSTER]

When Dr Seaton’s Animated Photographs and Concert Company visited Cambridge Guildhall on Boxing Day 1905 the pictures included the latest Japanese and Russian war films, “Life in Canada” and “The Kingdom of the Fairies”. But the performance also featured a high-class variety entertainment including Professor Carson, ventriloquist and mimic. In more recent times, Peter Brough the remarkable radio ventriloquist with his dummy, Archie Andrews, was a guest at the University Pentacle Club’s “Cavalcade of Magic” in February 1950. Other vents appeared regularly on the stage of the Cambridge New Theatre: Roy Chamberlain from Foxton recalls a show there in March 1955: “It was a very good do, but there were only 24 people in the audience that night. At the finish all the performers came off stage and talked or shook hands with all present”. The bill included Ken Morrison, a concert accordionist, Dudley Dale and his gang of boy singers, comedians Billy Winsor and Syd Wilton from “Workers’ Playtime” and somebody billed as “Ann Robinson, radio’s lovely soprano” together with Dennis Spicer, a ventriloquist, who was sadly killed soon afterwards in a road accident.

But there must have been other ventriloquists: were you one or who do you remember?

Memories, 2nd August 2006, by Mike Petty

Some times things just come together.

Last week I travelled across to North Walsham in Norfolk to give a lecture to members of their Civil Service Retirement Fellowship – something I do each year. This time I was talking about Cambridge during the Second World War and afterwards had time for a chat over tea. Amongst the thirty-or-so people were several with fond memories of Cambridge. Two were related to Captain Archibald Taylor, managing director of the News throughout the wartime years. They had come to see stories from the family’s newspaper. Another lady, Pamela Hudson, had been evacuated from Tottenham. She had wonderful recollections of being billeted in Fulbrooke Road with Mr & Mrs Fuller a porter at King’s College, and attending the Central School.

One other lady, Gill Brown, wanted to tell me of her wartime connection with Chivers, the fruit people. She worked in the laboratories in Huntingdon as well as at Histon, where she witnessed a bombing raid – with vivid memories of jam pulp being splattered across the cottages on the village green. I returned home to find a letter from Eleanor Whitehead of Histon describing that very incident: just before three o’clock on Easter Monday, 14th April 1941 a Junkers 88 dropped seven high-explosive bombs on Chivers’ barrel yard hurling sections of barrel and waves of fruit pulp. A small boy was slightly hurt. Did I know anything more, Eleanor asked. No, I replied – but I’ve met a lady who does! If you can help further then let me know or email eleanor.whitehead@tesco.net. [SCAN OF COVER OF CHIVERS MAGAZINE SHOWING HISTON GREEN] [SCAN OF CHIVERS LADIES c1964]

I’m also in Sheila Proctor’s good books. Her eye was caught by snippet that I featured in a ‘Looking Back’ column. It was a letter to the News published on the 14th July 1906 – one hundred years ago. It had been written by E. Peachey and described his adventures since he’d emigrated to Canada. Sheila writes: “I have been corresponding with a lady from Queensland, Australia, about the Peachey family from Fen Ditton. Diane Carr is trying to trace her family back to the village since her great-great-great-Grandad emigrated with his brother and cousin in 1856! I responded to a letter from her printed in the Cambridge Evening News and have spent an interesting couple of hours at the Shire Hall going through the Church records tracing them back to 1786. Unfortunately there doesn't appear to be an E. Peachey - was there any other information in his letter?" Indeed there was – in fact the letter stretched for almost a column and reveals that he landed in Regina on 20th April 1903; I will forward the full article in case it helps to locate another distant branch of the family. [SCAN OF ARTICLE HEADING 1906]

I may also have solved a mystery for the parishioners of Lode. When I spoke in the church, reading some of the village extracts from 'Samuel Pickwick's Cambridge Scrapbook', my eye was caught by some tapestry panels bequeathed by the Fairhaven family. They really knew little else about them. I suspect they were made by the ladies employed at the Cambridge Tapestry Company in Thompson's Lane from which Lord Fairhaven commissioned a tapestry for Anglesey Abbey in 1934. Back in April 2000 Sylvia Clark of Cambridge, told me how the firm built up a great reputation for the production of 'period panels' and lent me pictures of the girls at the works, which closed in 1941. [SCAN OF LADIES AT THE CAMBRIDGE TAPESTRY WORKS 1936] [SCAN OF THOMPSON'S LANE 1930's]

Now I can't promise to answer everybody's questions – but I'm delighted to try and have a wonderful team of researchers amongst News readers.

For example David Jones has emailed to identify two of the ladies visiting Norman's fruit farm at Haddenham in 1962 whose picture I featured in 'Memories' on 19th July. They were members of the Arbury Townswomen's Guild, one was his mother, Muriel Jones who became Federation chairperson, and the other Vicky Parr. Sheila Turner from Cambridge agrees and adds a third name, Jean Frost.

Frankie Patterson from Lee-on-the-Solent emails about a different section of the same article: "Last week I was visited by a distant cousin (in both respects) from Oakington who happened to be in Hampshire, where I live. During the course of conversation we talked about Friday Bridge agricultural camp, where I had gone in 1960 for a cheap holiday after leaving school. It was the 60's version of a gap year, I suppose! Three or four of us went off on our adventure and the memories are still vivid today. It was a glorious summer, and the photo in the paper was really good to see. It was exactly as I remember it, and that could have been me walking down the path! It was educational, as we met people from all over the world on that holiday - French, African, Indian, as well as from all over Britain. We had a wonderful time, and I remember it with great pleasure. It was really good to see the picture"

Mrs Eileen Byrne (nee McDonald) from Sawston knows all about fruit picking in the fens. She writes: "My family and I have always worked around Wisbech. I first went with mum and dad and brother when I was about seven or eight until we left the area when I was about 14. Mum and dad went back over the years until he died and she got too old to do it any longer. There were 23 in my gran's family; some died at an early age but the others that were left still did it until they were too old, or died. They were very good times and our memories are very good ones indeed." Her cousin Carroll Golding also helped with the harvest; she was born a Thorald, a family well-known family in the Wisbech area.

During a recent visits to our Norfolk hotel hideaway the place has been busy with trainee ambulance men and women; sometimes they have been being lectured at, sometimes busy revising for forthcoming examinations and sometimes making practical use of the ambulance service themselves, following a too-vigorous game of rounders!

The role of an ambulance man came under the spotlight in the Cambridge Daily News back in 1956 when Philip Osborne conducted an in-depth study into their working day. This was his report:

Ambulance men are quiet men and the rather vigorous little collection of pin-ups they have stuck on the walls of their rest room at the Ditton Walk Headquarters seems to have been put up more for the amusement of visitors who might expect it in an all-male community.

They certainly have not much time for looking at pin-ups. A normal day brings in 60 or 70 calls and requires 1,000 miles driving in the eight ambulances and five sitting-case cars that serve Cambridgeshire. It is a point of pride that there is no office staff – everyone from Supt. A.D. Prior down to the most recent recruit is ‘operational’ and likely to be called out any moment.

They go out in pairs – driver and attendance – always working in the same couples since the business of carrying a stretcher needs perfect co-ordination between two men who know each other’s movements from long practice. It is easy to fall foul of the ambulanceman’s occupational diseases – rupture and strains – in picking up the stretcher. And see how they do it, finishing with a straight run up the steps into the ambulance without the slightest pause, and the stretcher safely locked into its place on the runner-rails on the floor of the car. “It’s a knack”, says Mr Prior and leaves it at that

There is no lack of recruits to the service. Cambridgeshire is limited to a personell strength of 24 and if only someone would retire there would be room for at least one of the 30 eligible men whose names are on the waiting list. But no one ever does, except for reasons of age. It must be the variety, or simply the promise of action and service, that they find attractive. Their jobs may vary from carrying a patient down the twisting stairs in a country cottage, to delivering a baby while the mother is on the way to hospital. About once a month, on average, one of Cambridge’s ambulance men must turn midwife. It used to happen much more often, but the modern ante-natal services make sure a mother’s time is better-judged. Yet there is one of the fleet of pale-blue ambulances which, on its first run out, was the scene of the birth of twins recently – the first baby at the Histon crossing and the second at Parkside. There are official instructions limiting the action an ambulanceman should take in such cases, but – Supt Prior lifts his hands – “You can’t just sit there. You must do something.” I got the impression that a mother could hardly be in safer care.

There is a gentleness about these men that belies their strength. They will tell you about the way they helped a mother, and of the 19-stone patient who had to be brought downstairs from his home at Willingham in the usual carrying-sheet and placed on a stretcher to be brought to Cambridge. And what distress they may have to witness significantly makes no part of their conversation.

Their training in hygiene leads them to keep the ambulances in a spotless condition. In showing me inside one Mr Prior would not even walk on its polished linoleum floor, but knelt on the crimson cushioned seat that runs down one side of the car and usually carries the attendant and the patient’s relatives. Its woodwork shone like a mirror and the metal fittings glistened with hard polishing. Inside and out it would have done credit to a French polisher’s houseproud wife. A long-distance ambulance is thoroughly stripped, cleaned and disinfected after every journey, and a short-distance one gone over thoroughly every day. There is competition between drivers too: there are few things more delectable than a spotless engine.

Three-quarters of the work consists of taking patients to hospital for treatment, either in an ambulance or in one of the dual purpose cars that sitting cases can use. And 70 per cent of the night-time calls are maternity cases. There are malicious calls but they are very few and come in when schoolchildren are on holiday.

Most of the street accidents that need attention from Ditton Walk happen between 12.30 and two o'clock in the afternoon and five to six-thirty in the evening, 'when the cyclists are about'. Then there are cases who suffer seizures in the streets. And at this time of the year, the week-ends are the worst time for car crashes, with people going on holiday. In winter months it is rugby or soccer casualties. And in the rare moment when nothing is happening the ambulance men can watch their own television set in the rest room. But when I saw it it was covered over with a cloth.

I suspect things have changed somewhat since those days when everybody was operational with no office staff – but were you an ambulance man – or woman – with memories of the service?

Memories by Mike Petty 16th August 2006, by Mike Petty

The recent heavy wind and rain has beaten down the crops along the lane outside our gate, just one more problem facing the farmers at this harvest time.

The late Frank Turner of Swaffham Bulbeck knew of the trials and tribulations at first hand; some twenty years ago he set down his memories:

The fields which lately stood so full of corn are quickly reduced to stubble by using today's methods. Many of the large combines devour five hundred tonnes and more of grain in a day and at least seventy acres of crops will fall every day to each of the larger machines. [SCAN 55.42 - SIX COMBINE HARVESTERS WORKING IN FIELD OPPOSITE PRIORY PARK, ST NEOTS IN 1960S]

But the harvest TODAY should be compared to that of yesteryear. I remember those of the 1930s and 1940s when all the work was done by hand and horse and the labour was hard indeed for very little pay. Full-grown men earned thirty shillings a week in those days but at harvest men worked on contract; one month's work for twelve pounds, which was double their normal pay

For the first two weeks during which the corn was cut and stooked, the day started at 6.30 in the morning and finished at 7.30 at night. There were two fifteen minutes break for morning 'docky' and tea in the afternoon and a break of an hour for lunch when all the workers bar one bicycled home to have their main meal. Only the man on the binder rode back to the farm with his team of horses, seated on one of them, so that they could be rested in the afternoon. [SCAN 12068 'DOCKY TIME' IN 1920's]

During the second fortnight the work went on an hour longer. This was the period of carting and stacking the corn. The times were the same for masters and for men &, speaking for myself, my father and brother, we worked alongside our employees and just as hard. The sweating was the same for all of us.

At the start of the harvest each field was 'opened up', which means that a path wide enough for the horses pulling the binder was mown all around the field by hand scythe. We used two teams of three horses; one started at 6.30 a.m. and rested in the afternoon, working again in the evening. The other team worked in the afternoon and again next morning and so by reversing the order every day, each team of heavy horses did two stints every other day. [SCAN 122BIN – HORSE-DRAWN BINDER]

After the cutting by the binder the men stooked the corn and a long, hard, dusty task it was. It should be noted than far from waiting for the crops to lose moisture as we do today, so that one sees the golden fields of grain, in days gone by we always cut it on the green side otherwise the ears would shed too much of the grain. Winter oats would be the first crop to be cut and we had to leave the stooks for three Sundays clear before they were ready for carting.

We had six horses and carts to bring home the sheaves; one cart would be on the field, one would be being unloaded at the stack and two would be coming and going between the farm and the harvest field. Village lads were employed to lead the horses, walking home with the full load but riding back in the empty cart to start the task yet again. Each lad, in turn, would be in the field moving the horse and wagon forward after each stook was pitchforked onto the load. He was expected to call out to the men on the load each time the cart was moved forward to prevent the loader from falling off as the sheaves piled higher and became more unstable. The shouting youngster was called the 'Hodyea' boy – meaning 'Hold ye' or as we would say today, 'Hang on'. A good, strong man working hard, could pitch ten acres a day. [SCAN 122.93 BOY LEADING CART LOADED WITH BEANS]

The carted sheaves were stacked in the farmyard and I've seen as many as twelve great stacks in Mitchell Hall stack yard. When finished they were thatched and left to dry out and the grain to harden. Then during the winter months came the time for threshing. Off came the thatch and the stakes which had held it in place were used to put up a fine wire netting fence about a yard high and about the same distance from the sides of the stack. This was to catch the rats which had been having free board and lodging. As the sheaves were pitched down to the threshing machine out came the rodents and down came heavy sticks wielded with good will to dispatch the creatures. If any escaped the wire, a terrier or other farm dog made short work of them, but as a safety precaution, the labourers always tied their trouser legs below their knees as it was not unknown for a rat – or mouse – to run up an unguarded leg. Sometimes a leather strap was used instead of string and the straps were known as 'lallygags'. When the grain was threshed it was put onto the barn floors where it lay like a golden sand dune until it was sold.

Yes, the days were long and hard, but all trades and work in the village was manual. We were all in the same situation but we were strong and healthy, though we hadn't much spare flesh or spare cash. But we were a community of neighbours.

Memories 23rd August 2006, by Mike Petty

The issue of unmarried mothers is nothing new, but does anybody have memories of a special centre in Bateman Street, Cambridge. News columnist Erica Dimock reported in May 1963 how a home for unmarried mothers and their babies had been established by the Ely Diocesan Association for Social Work in the 1920s and was nearly always used to capacity. It had a matron who was a qualified midwife together with three assistants, including a trained nurse and midwife.

Most of the girls were from the local area; they entered it about six weeks before their babies were due, were taken to hospital for their confinements and then returned to the home until their babies were six weeks old, giving the mothers adequate time to plan for the future.

The home was not run as an institution but had the atmosphere of a family, each mother being responsible for the care of her own child. Family prayers were held in the chapel night and morning. Careful plans were made for the future of the babies, about 50 per cent of whom were legally adopted through one of the Registered Adoption Societies. Others went home with their mothers, into residential nurseries or were placed with foster mothers.

In many cases the mothers returned to see the Matron, Erica noted, adding that this was an indication of the happy atmosphere which prevailed at the Home, and the fulfilment of its purpose in training each mother in the care of her child and the development of her character. It closed after 50 years due to lack of demand in July 1971. Now Chris Basey from Norwich is wondering if anybody can add further information. Write to me and I'll put you in touch.

Helen Harwood also seeks assistance: she is undertaking a dissertation about the Cambridge area in the 1930s. It is about people and how they fared in that turbulent decade and she would like to chat to both town and gown, college servants and country people with memories of local life and politics at the time. Email her at helen_harwood_uk@yahoo.co.uk or drop me a line.

For anybody trying to put that period into context there is a new book by Dr Jim Charles. It's a study of the life and times of his father between 1887 and 1932. This was a period of great strides in scientific research in Cambridge following the publication of Einstein's Theory of Relativity, when J.J. Thomson at the Cavendish Laboratory was discovering the electron and Rutherford worked on nuclear physics. J.H.V. Charles was one of a largely-unsung body of men who in spite of a meagre education went on to play an important part in the rapidly-developing scientific world as a laboratory technician. But he was also instrumental in obtaining proper employment and pension conditions for University Assistants and helped in the development of the New Museums Club. The wide-ranging book also charts his father's friendship with Clarence Howes, whose family ran the famous cycling business. Clarence served in the Machine Gun Corps Motorised Division during the Great War with a machine gun mounted on a motorbike and sidecar combination. Dr Charles himself is Emeritus Reader in Process Metallurgy and a Fellow of St John's College – the college where his great-grandfather was groom – and thus spans both town and gown. His own passion for Cambridge's history means that all proceeds from this book 'One Man's Cambridge' will go to the Cambridge Folk Museum from which copies are available at the special price of £10 (plus £3 if posted). (ISBN 0-9544818-2-8)

Recently News readers have once more proved that there is a wealth of assistance just waiting for researchers to tap into. In Memories of three weeks ago I featured a wartime raid on Chivers. Now Valda Smith from Impington has written with her memories of the bombs that fell on the factory at Histon in 1941: she recalls that all the houses in Poplar Road were covered in jam pulp – they looked as if they had been pebble-dashed. Mrs Yvonne Andreou emailed to say her grandfather Kenneth Baldwin-Smith was a designer at Cambridge Tapestry Company in the 1930's. In the late 1970's she took him round Anglesey Abbey when to her surprise he pointed out the tapestries that he had designed. She still has two miniature folding screens painted in watercolour which were designs for tapestries made by the company.

Even more exciting is a letter from Mr Richard Bradfield of Bottisham who has knowledge of a correspondent to the old Cambridge Daily News in 1906. Back then an E. Peachey had written from Canada describing the opportunities open to prospective emigrants and I included a snippet in my 'Looking Back' column. This brought me a letter from Sheila Proctor who was researching the Peachey family on behalf of an Australian lady who had written to the News seeking help. This is where Mr Bradford comes in: his own family emigrated to Canada in the early 1900s and still farm out there. Amongst their archives are a series of diaries kept by his uncle Bowyer Bradford in which he mentions some of the famous names of North American history such as Sitting Bull and Geronimo who moved north after the battles at Wounded Knee and the Little Big Horn to seek the shelter of the 'Big White Queen', Victoria. One name that crops up is that of E. Peachey who had been head postmaster in the Regina area for some years.

Memories 30 August 2006, by Mike Petty

Two readers have written in seeking your help.

Allan Brigham, the Cambridge street sweeper and tour guide is starting to investigate the way the Romsey area of Cambridge has changed in the last 40 years. He has some pictures of Mill Road, and a few of side streets, but none of gardens or house interiors showing how the 19th century houses have been improved and adapted to fit modern life style and modern gadgets.

[Even kitchens built in the 1930s sometimes had the table-bath rather than a separate bathroom, and there was certainly no room for fridges, freezers, or washing machines. So what he's looking for are pictures of unimproved houses, pictures of modernised houses, and especially pictures of people in houses or gardens over the last 40 years. If you have something suitable Allan would love to hear from you on Cambridge 212189 or via email - \[allanbrigham@hotmail.com\]\(mailto:allanbrigham@hotmail.com\)](#)

John Carter of Cambridge has lent me two photographs taken in the 1950s that I think are just what is needed – but I'm not quite sure where they show. One shows York Street, off Sleaford Street but a second one has me stumped. I suspect it's somewhere in the vicinity – but do you recognise your old front door?

Sleaford Street was one of those featured in Sara Payne's 'Down Your Street' articles back in October 1982. She described how Co-op milk floats and petrol tankers then rumbled down it. The Co-op dairy had opened in 1927 and was soon selling 400 gallons a day soaring to 100,000 bottles daily by 1979. In earlier times the milk was then delivered in horse-drawn milk floats and Donald Nelson remembered that the horses and ponies were stabled in Sturton Street and were washed down every night. "There was a big harness room and all the horses had their names up. The dairyman wore caps and livery", he recalled.

The dairy was joined by a model bakery opened by the Co-op in 1932. It was equipped with the most modern machinery and 500 sacks of flour arrived each week from their own private railway sidings close by. But demand soon exceeded production; it was rebuilt in 1952 and was later taken over by Spillers-French. By 1977 the Sleaford Street bakery was baking about half of the bread sold in the area but closed two years later.

Sara chatted to one of the oldest residents was Mrs Hilda Sells who had been born in 1908. She could remember a field with a donkey in it that stood at the bottom of York Terrace – but if you have memories or family snaps that capture the ambience of this part of Cambridge in more recent days then please let me know

Jean Weston has also emailed me. Her message speaks for itself: "I always read your column and find local history very interesting. When I was passing Sainsburys in Sidney Street the other day I realised I couldn't remember what used to be there. Could you ask readers for their memories of anything previously on the site", Consider yourself asked!

C.J. Reid has responded to my request for memories of the hostel for unmarried mothers in Bateman Street. she writes: "An undergraduate at Girton 1961-64, one Sunday I joined a Sunday morning service at Little St Mary's. I slipped into a space near the back, was passed a hymn-book, found my place, and then had time to glance at my neighbours. I was greatly startled to find the back three or four rows were filled with very pregnant friendly-looking young women of my own age-group.

Later I was told, by an obstetrician that they would have come from the establishment for unmarried mothers in the Lensfield Road area. (I now presume, that at Bateman Street.)

Those that wished to go to church on Sundays could do so, sitting at the back to avoid being stared at. I was told there were communion services at the home as well, so that those that wished could receive communion without the risk of embarrassment that might have occurred if they had walked down the nave."

I have discovered another story of the problems of unmarried mothers that appeared in the Cambridge Daily News on 23rd August 1906. It told how a woman of about 30 years of age journeyed to Cambridge to meet the man who was the author of her 'trouble'. In the words of the time: While she was in the train alone the child was born but on arrival at the station she behaved with such extraordinary circumspection that none of the railway officials suspected anything unusual had occurred. Carrying a bundle wrapped in underlinen under her arm, this extraordinary woman walked the length of the platform, hailed a cab and asked to be driven to the Workhouse. There her strength gave way and when the Master, Mr L. Hosegood, was called to his office, he found a swooning woman on the floor with a newly-born babe beside her. The News commented: "It speaks volumes for the prompt and skilled attention she received, as well as to the remarkable vitality of the mother and child, that notwithstanding their adventures they are both doing well".

Memories 6th September 2006, by Mike Petty

It's just 25 years ago that social life in the fens changed forever with the final auction of cattle and pigs at Ely. During the previous few years business had dropped off as farmers switched from animals to more profitable arable farming, so Cheffins, Grain & Chalk, the auctioneers who ran the market the time had come to close. It was a particularly sad day for the auctioneer, Mr John Grain, the third generation of his family to be involved in the market, who had first started work at the market exactly 48 years ago to the day. It had been founded by his grandfather, Mr Arthur Trett Grain and continued under his father's guidance until he took over.

At 10.45am on 7th September 1981 Mr Grain rang the bell for the last time to summon farmers, dealers and onlookers to the final cattle sale. This time there was only one animal to be sold – a black Hereford brought along by Mr Sidney King, a Littleport farmer. It tipped the scales at 680kg and was bought by King Brothers of Holbech, Lincolnshire for 100p a kilo. Then 78-year-old Mr ‘Nibs’ Lee of Ely – a market hand for 63 years until he was forced to retire – was called to ring the bell to herald the start of the final pig sale. The bidding was brisk for the 50 pigs on offer, the last one being sold by Mr William Darby of Haddenham. Entering into the spirit of the occasion the bidders pushed the price up to 290p per kg, when it was bought by Mr Sidney King junior, of Littleport. The other part of the weekly market at Ely, the poultry, produce and furniture auctions continued for a while but then it too passed into history. [SCAN 59.392 OF THE FINAL CATTLE MARKET AT ELY – CEN NEG 3508.81.35]

The Cattle Market at Saffron Walden lasted a little longer but closed after its 121st Christmas Far Stock Show and Sale in December 1981. There had been a cattle market in the town for several centuries and in the 1960s farmers would come to market once a week to sell their stock and do their shopping. But times had changed and it was down to 40 cattle a week. CEN NEGATIVE D969 81 12 SHOWS MRS JENNY FURZE WITH HER DAUGHTER KAREN (THEN TWO) AND MRS JACQUELINE MONK WITH SON NIGEL LOOKING AT THE LAST CATTLE IN THE MARKET

But such markets were more than an agricultural convenience – they were a chance for young and old to see the animals and watch the bidding. At Ely cattle market the fat pigs were sold at 10 am, then live poultry followed by dressed poultry and produce, furniture and dead stock and more furniture. Sale by auction was a jolly bantering and time-consuming affair. When the News visited in July 1979 it reported: “The crowd are mainly old hands, but that doesn’t guarantee rock-bottom prices. Quite often they went above prices in the nearby general market. On occasions this was loudly pointed out by a member of the audience who nevertheless appeared to be tolerated as an unavoidable part of the proceedings and often started the bidding, albeit well below the auctioneer’s asking price. Bidding is usually done on the basis of the price per single cabbage or pound of strawberries and there is no obligation to take the lot. Most people take two or three items and bidding starts again for the rest.”

Besides there was always the possibility that something exciting might happen. In December 1902 the landlord of the Boot Inn, Histon, was tossed by an infuriated bullock at Cambridge Cattle Market. The animal, a Scottish beast with very long horns, was being driven into a pen when it broke away, caught Mr Vialls with its horns and threw him over the rails into one of the pens. The horns penetrated his trousers and made a scratch about seven inches long. The wild beast was eventually safely secured and sold to Mr Mills of Cambridge without being brought into the auction ring.

Sometimes animals actually ran to market as in December 1979 when a bullock destined for the slaughterhouse went on the rampage in Cambridge for several hours, terrifying pedestrians and threatening to bring rush-hour traffic to a grinding halt. Armed police were called in and combed the city looking for it until a panda car driver spotted the animal running along the road in front of him. It charged in and out of the Eastern Counties bus station in Hills Road, knocked a pensioner off his bike and attacked two pedestrians in Station Road. Then with three police cars on its tail it was cornered in a garden at Highsett but escaped by leaping over a panda car and the chase started again. A wall was partly-demolished and three police cars damaged before it was finally herded into the cattle market pen [SCAN OF CAMBRIDGE BUS DEPOT, HILLS ROAD 1954 – DO ANY READERS REMEMBER IT]

But do you have memories of the cattle market?

Readers have been quick to identify the mystery picture I featured last week. Frederick Smart from Cambridge and Bryan Foreman from Comberton called to say it's Brandon Place at the bottom of City Road and on the corner is the Free Press pub. Betty Shaw agrees: "We lived half way down by the gas light in the 1930s. City Road ran along the far end with Adam and Eve at the other". Tony Miller FROM knows the area well but he asks "Where are all the people/children who lived in Brandon Place, not even any children playing, was it taken on a Sunday when we were all at Sunday school? As kids we used to talk to the very friendly chap, on his bike with his pointed ladder over his shoulder from the Gas Company, who came to wind the clocks up in the gas lamps. Such friendly people then. Mums even used to leave their baby in their prams out in the street/front gardens. How times have changed."

Jean Weston's appeal for a reminder of what was in Sidney Street Cambridge before Sainsbury's moved in has also brought a picture from Paul Silk who emailed: "You asked what was on the site of the Sidney Street Sainsbury. Part of it was P. H. Allin & Sons radio and electrical shop. My farther Tom Silk is the tall one on the left of the picture the other person may be one of the Allins". [SCAN ALLIN – PAUL SILK'S PICTURES OF ALLINS RADIO SHOP, SIDNEY STREET] .Mrs Lesley Roper writes: "I know that along there behind the present row of shops Eaden Lilley had a furniture shop and a workshop where beds and mattresses were made. A Mr Charles Allen ran the workshop and a Mr Harley was one of the workmen and Miss Rose Haynes and Mrs Dorothy Beilby were the ladies who sewed the covers for the mattresses". Did you work there?

Memories 13th September 2006, by Mike Petty

Chris Basey's request for information on the Bateman street home for unmarried mothers has bought a response from Janet Howard of Cambridge.

She writes:

"As a young girl who grew up in Cambridge, 48 Bateman Street was a formidable place, as it was drummed into us that if we played around with boys and got pregnant that would be where we could end up. It was made to sound like a really awful place, that was enough to put us off having sex at a young age. How times have changed.

"I visited the home in the early 1960's when I was a student nursery-nurse at The College of Arts and Technology in Cambridge, now The Ruskin University in East Road. I remember the visit very clearly. The young mums were busy doing the household chores whilst their babies slept in their cots in the large communal nursery, these babies were looked after by those mums still waiting to give birth, obviously to gain some experience before having their own. I remember it being very clean and airy but sparsely furnished with bare floorboards. I felt great pity for those young mums having to care for their babies, some even breast fed for a few weeks they had with them. I couldn't have imagined bonding, caring for and loving my baby and then having to part with it.

"When I finished at college I worked as a nursery nurse at Mill Road Maternity Hospital in Cambridge, where I came into contact with mum's from Bateman Street. They generally stayed in hospital for nine days then, and part of my job was to give help and advice in caring for their babies" [SCAN OF STAFF OUTSIDE MILL ROAD MATERNITY HOSPITAL 1968]

But, unbeknown to her then, the Bateman Street home was to play a more personal part in her life, as Janet explains

“My late mother-in-law had the misfortune to become pregnant at the very young age of fifteen. She wasn't a local girl, she lived in a small Norfolk village near Mundersley called Paston and was 'sent' to Cambridge to have her baby at 48 Bateman Street. On 28th May 1935 she gave birth to a son Paul, his surname Morris. Paul was adopted and due to the circumstances of the pregnancy my Mother in law was persuaded to stay in Cambridge where she went into service.

“My husband has had, and still has a great desire to meet his half brother. His mum wanted no part in this, as she had no wish to bring back such painful memories, so he had to promise not to try until after she had died.

“Since her death in August 1998 we have obtained a copy of Paul's birth certificate, until then we didn't even know what she had named him. Unfortunately, all avenues we have been down have drawn blanks. We were told by social services that their records don't go back that far and, because we have such little information, organisations we have contacted offer very little hope of my husband ever finding Paul, as his adoptive parents may well have changed his name. We have registered with Norcap in the hope that Paul may try to look for his birth mother's family, but time is not on our side as he would now be 71 years old, ten years older than my husband. If there is anyone who knows of other avenues we could explore to help us find Paul we would certainly appreciate it”

If you think you can help then please contact me and I'll put you in touch with Janet.

Readers were quick to recognise a 'mystery street' as Brandon Place. Now more letters have come from Mr J.D. Williamson of Cambridge who used to walk that way when attending the Central Boys School between 1935 and 1938, Mrs B. Shaw of Waterbeach used to live beside the gas lamp and remembers an air raid shelter being built at the Adam and Eve Street end during the war while D.A. Dilley has written all the way from Kilbirnie in Ayrshire with his memories of the area. Mrs Gillian Smith from Girton has conclusive proof; she has lent me a picture taken by the News in the early 1960s [SCAN OF BRANDON PLACE IN EARLY 1960S]

Meanwhile my mention of Hilda Sells and her opposition to petrol tankers trundling down Sleaford Street has sparked memories for Mrs R. Hunt who now lives in Bar Hill. She writes: “I lived a few doors from Hilda and was quite worried to see the Amoco tankers trying to negotiate the turn into York Terrace. A group of us decided to make our feelings known so attended the council meeting about this in the Guildhall. Armed with a banner which we draped over the balcony and chanting ‘Tankers Out’ we were quickly escorted out of the chamber. I am now 80 and can hardly believe that I demonstrated”

Mention of petrol tankers prompts me to seek help identifying another picture taken in the 1950s by John Carter. It shows a Mayor of Cambridge inspecting a new Esso distribution centre. But where was it, who is it in the picture and can anybody tell me more? [SCAN OF PETROL DEPOT]

Memories 20 September 2006, by Mike Petty

Now that many societies have started their autumn series of meetings I have found myself trundling back from talks at Girton, Denver, Wimbotsham and March. All too often I have had to strain my eyes against mis-aligned oncoming headlamps, waiting for the times when I can switch to main beam and see the fenland roads more clearly.

But who remembers the important role played by Midsummer Common in the development of car headlamps. Just 55 years ago, in September 1931, representatives from the Ministry of Transport and Scotland Yard, chief constables and scientific experts joined hundreds of local folk to witness the biggest demonstration of anti-dazzle devices for motor cars ever held in this country.

Cars fitted with 100 different inventions were drawn up in line with their backs to the river and turned on their lights to illuminate white posts set in the grass in front of them. Sadly the demonstration was marred by the crowds who clamoured around, more interested in the vehicles than the posts they were supposed to be looking at.

Then the cars were driven off around a route marked off with white stakes, but again the spectators got in the way and several drivers got completely lost, ending up on the wrong side of the common! Of course, being Cambridge there had to be cyclists without lights – although for safety's sake, these were just dummies.

All-in-all the experiment, organised by the Royal Automobile Club, was deemed a success. Even though 'experts' seemed to favour a British 'dip and switch' device the Association was adamant that other systems should have an opportunity to prove their worth. What they really learnt was that it was the spectators who could not see where they were supposed to be standing - although things did improve greatly after many of the little boys present were taken off to be put to bed!

Cars need fuel and Alan Purr has emailed to say he recognises last week's picture of a petrol tanker: he think it is the former Redline Oil Services Depot that was situated in Cromwell Road, Cambridge and closed in the Seventies. The site was next door to Ridgeons Builders Merchants and is now a block of flats.

My appeal for memories of cattle markets has prompted various readers to write in.

Jim Charles from Gt Shelford recalls the Cambridge cattle market. He writes: "As a boy in the 1930's I went often with my maternal grandfather, 'Jasper' (J.G.) Bryant whose whom was in Rustat Road. He was a much-lved Cambridge gents hairdresser whose saloon was above Millers Music Shop in Sidney Street. As I recall market day was Monday and livestock would arrive in a variety of vehicles but with some, mostly sheep, on foot. Fortunately traffic was light in those days! A feature of the market in later years was the increase in stalls of a non-agricultural nature such as those selling crockery from side-opening display trailers, with much banter and showmanship."

June Mitchell from Gazeley used to work for Comings' in a wooden office in the corner of the Ely cattle market. Once the hammer had fallen the successful buyers would bring the sales sheet to her and settle up. George Comings sold the pigs which were often bought by dealers on behalf of farmers. One day a foreign gentleman who had a restaurant in London journeyed down and bid £10 for a litter of eight very small pigs. Only when he came to pay did he realise that this was the prince per animal, not for the entire lot and refused to take them. George Comings was furious and tore him off a strip as the market was now closed, then passed the animals on to the bacon people. He was a real character, quite at home with the farming community, but less so with a young lady like June. She was paid £3 a day for her work and eventually after eight years picked up the courage to ask for a rise. George pondered then declared that no – that was all the job was worth.

Miss Margaret Skempton from Coton remembers the cattle market in New Street, St Neots. It was run by S.V. Ekins and son on Thursday, the same day as the general market on the Square. She recalls: “I worked in a bank in St Neots in the ‘60s and all the farmers came into town, and the bank, on Thursdays. My brother, who was handicapped with Downs Syndrome, loved to go to see the cows and bullocks whenever anyone would take him. The buildings have now been demolished. There was also an auction market for produce further along New Street just before the common gates, run by Shaws. This may have been on a Monday afternoon. I can remember my father going and coming home with 20 or 40 lbs of cooking apples which he had bought for a few coppers. There was also an egg packing station on this site and it was possible to buy cracked eggs for much less than shop prices for sound ones. They could not be boiled (the white came out into the water) but were perfectly good for other purposes. They were a boon for my mother and others on a tight budget”

Memories 27th September 2006, by Mike Petty

There have been remarkable developments following an appeal from Janet Howard. She wrote to ‘Memories’ in response to another reader’s request for information on the Bateman Street Home for Unmarried Mothers and described how she had visited when a trainee nurse.

She then went on to say: “My late mother-in-law had the misfortune to become pregnant at the very young age of fifteen. She wasn't a local girl, she lived in a small Norfolk village near Mundersley called Paston and was 'sent' to Cambridge to have her baby at 48 Bateman Street. On 28th May 1935 she gave birth to a son Paul. Paul was adopted and due to the circumstances of the pregnancy she was persuaded to stay in Cambridge where she went into service. My husband has had, and still has a great desire to meet his half brother. His mum wanted no part in this, as she had no wish to bring back such painful memories, so he had to promise not to try until after she had died”.

Janet described the steps they’d since taken to track Paul down, without success.

John Capes from Sawston is a regular reader of ‘Memories’ but happened to miss that particular article. Luckily a neighbour brought it to his attention and John has been in touch.

Incredibly he remembers Paul: as a lad he had lived in Paston next door to a young teenage girl named Rene who suddenly disappeared from the scene. A few weeks later a new baby appeared in the home of a married couple just down the road, he was called Paul and took that family’s surname. But nobody remembered the wife being pregnant.

John went to the same school as Paul for a time and played football with him. He remembers him as a reserved boy who stayed on in the village until he did his National Service in the Royal Air Force and then got a job on the buses, moving up to Lancashire. There for the moment the search for Paul rests but there are now extra clues for Janet to follow up that she would not have discovered were it not for a News reader. And her husband Roger still treasures hopes that he might one day meet the older brother he has been searching for all his life.

Can we do something similar for a Swiss student? Lilian Dutoit from Brunnen is researching the suffragette movement and would like to hear from anybody whose family were involved in the campaign.

A Women's Suffrage Association was established in Cambridge in 1884, numbering Mrs – late Dame - Millicent Fawcett and Mrs Heitland amongst the founder members with support from the Vice-Chancellor and Mayor. Generally the struggle for the Parliamentary vote was conducted by serious political lobbying and debate, but such meetings passed largely unnoticed whilst the more extreme "Suffragettes" made the news.

Cambridge's first experience of such protestors came in 1908 when in what the male reporters described as a "very exciting incident" one struggling female had to be carried out of a meeting. They would soon find out that Cambridge was not a congenial place for this sort of activity, the News warned.

Mrs Emmeline Pankhurst, the leading militant, was greeted with hostile demonstrations when she visited in 1910 while 1911 saw women walking the streets to avoid being counted on census night and a local minister's wife being arrested during a suffragette raid on the House of Commons. In 1912 the University Men's League for Women's Suffrage was lobbying on their behalf and the Conservative Women's Franchise Association was formed but it was the militants who hit the headlines. They tried to set fire to the Varsity rugby pavilion, disrupted a garden party at Magdalene College and generally caused such mayhem that Colleges closed their gates during the Long Vacation. They even landed by boat at St John's College to paint the gates purple, green and white and daub "Votes for Women" on the stone work – or did they? Later a male student was to claim that three undergraduates had done it, deliberately leaving a woman's shoe at the scene.

But the major incident was in May 1913 when early one Saturday morning two plain-clothed policemen spotted smoke coming from a newly-built houses in Storeys Way. They called for the new motor fire engine which roared off from St Andrew's Street, followed shortly afterwards by firemen, some cycling, some running and some riding in a covered van. They were too late to save the roof of the first house but did manage to prevent serious damage to the second.

Detective Sergeant Marsh discovered somebody had broken in through the study window, poured paraffin over sawdust and packing cases and set them on fire before moving on to the adjoining premises and repeating the process. There were three clues: bloodstains from broken glass, footprints and a ladies gold watch. On Wednesday he travelled to Norwich and arrested a schoolteacher.

The suspect, an active Suffragette, admitted being in Cambridge on the evening in question and she had a fresh wound on her hand. The crucial evidence was the watch. It had been a present from her uncle, a Norwich policeman who recognised it and agonised about what to do before shopping his niece. She was sentenced to 18 months hard labour but went on hunger strike and was released in October.

What other tales do you have in your family archives that can add something to the struggle for the vote. Drop me a line or contact Lilian direct by email – sekretariat@theresianum.ch

Memories 4th October 2006, by Mike Petty

Dave Howchin from Hill Road Cambridge and Ian Wells from Haslingfield have written following a picture I featured of a Cambridge oil terminal; both worked there during the 1950s and 1960s.

It was a new depot in Cromwell Road, Cambridge that started operating in February 1955 and was formally opened by the Mayor, (Ald E.T. Halnan). As the News for 21st June 1955 reported: "The site as it appears today is a marked transformation of an area formerly used for allotments ... providing Cambridge with an enterprise serving a very wide area and likely to continue to expand as time goes on. The aluminium painted storage tanks have a capacity of 216,000 gallons with supplies brought from the Purfleet terminal in five vehicles working on a double-shift basis"

The dignitaries were shown around by Esso managers E. W.Hardiman, J.R.Payne and E.G.Caink with the Supervisor, C.H.Loveday pointing out some detail. The lorry was a Bedford SA tractor unit coupled to a Carrimore trailer capable of carrying 2400 gallons of petroleum spirit and driven by D.E. Cook who is standing on top. It would have been virtually brand new at the time, hence the shine on the tank. [PHOTO OF THE INSPECTION]

Ian adds: "These wagons looked particularly splendid in their deep red livery. I spent much of my childhood in the cab of a lorry looking down at motorists in their (what seemed) tiny cars. The 20 mph plate on the back of the lorry was considered a joke by most of the drivers, a far more realistic speed was 30mph laden, 40mph unladen.

"Both my father, Cyril and my Grandfather Alfred Reginald (Reg) Wells worked for Esso clocking up 78 years service between them! Granddad started at the Ely depot moving to Chatteris, then to Huntingdon where he retired. During the war years he worked for Pool Petroleum at their Buckden depot. Dad moved around as well, starting at Chatteris, moving on to Buckden, then Huntingdon, Cambridge and finally King's Lynn where he retired. The reason for all these moves was as the trucks became larger, bigger terminals were needed. Lots of changes of schools for us three children!"

"The depot at Cromwell Road was closed by Esso in 1965/6 when our family moved to King's Lynn. After that it became a depot for home heating oil delivery. When I moved back to Cambridge in 1993 it was being used by Flitwick Oils. I believe the site became vacant sometime during 1994, it is now housing"

Ian has lent me other photos of Esso lorries including one taken in the late 1940s showing Reg with a Bedford lorry. [SCAN OF REG WELLS WITH HIS LORRY]. But there's something else: an extract from the 'Esso Employee News' of April 1954 showing the launching of a new super-tanker, the 'Esso Cambridge'. What became of it?

The transport of petrol brings its dangers; October 1976 was a particularly problematic time: a petrol tanker overturned on the A11 outside Audley End House and in seconds turned into a raging inferno. Flames shot 50 ft into the air and a thick, black column of smoke could be seen miles from the scene,. Grass verges for 100 yards on either side of the tanker were scorched and a passing motorist came close to being trapped in the blaze. A ten-yard length of the flint wall was demolished and 60 square yards of the forest was destroyed by flames. It was the second tanker disaster on the A11 in just over three years. The first had been a collision between a 6,000-gallon diesel tanker and a lorry at Quendon in March 1973, then two weeks later a tanker carrying 6,000 gallons of aviation fuel collided with a car at Audley End, but there was no fire.

Petrol is inflammable as Mildenhall discovered to its cost in September 1897 when fire broke out in the warehouses belong to Messrs Firth Bros, grocers and drapers and seven barrels of petroleum exploded. As it threatened a nearby bank the manager thought it best to remove all the cash elsewhere. Mildenhall Fire Brigade was promptly on the spot with their two manual engines and tamed the blaze after two hours hard work, but it was a narrow escape for the whole of the side of the Market Square. [PERHAPS FIND PICTURE OF MILDENHALL MARKET SQUARE IN NEWS LIBRARY]

Such concerns were uppermost in the minds of councillors when considering the erection of petrol pumps in the centre of Cambridge in 1922. The Mayor could not understand what the problem was: all other towns of any size that had them and it seemed a most extraordinary thing that an enlightened borough like Cambridge still refused to allow a pump to be put up on the footway. However a News reader enlightened him: "Memories of past Cambridge 'rags' should have convinced him of the danger. Many an 'undergrad' would simply love to tear it from the pavement and cart it in triumph to his lodgings, and when he went down to take it home and say, 'Look, mater, what I did'. No, sir, undergraduates' pranks are bad enough already and no one desires to see a flaming chariot of burning wood deposited near a petrol pump" he warned.

But another correspondent allayed his fears: "Has he ever seen a petrol pump and, if so, has he ever tried to root it up? Let a dozen or more of the strongest of these super-men try to uproot a petrol pump and its impassivity would resemble that of the celebrated and disappointing Sphinx. Let their fiery chariots smoke all around the pumps and there would be yet another proof of their immunity to fire."

Petrol pumps soon arrived, and King and Harper's filling station in Bridge Street quickly became so busy that queues of motorists started attracting the attention of the police. So In June 1925 the firm opened a new depot in Hills Road offering four different kinds of petrol and nervous drivers could wait to be filled up in comparative calm. These days the idea of cars parking beside city centre streets and taking on petrol seem incredible but do you remember them?

Memories 11th October 2006, by Mike Petty

These days there seems to be a constant fascination with cops and criminals. Almost every evening some television channel follows some upholder of the law as they track down dastardly villains. But how much of the dramatic chases and daring-dos really reflect the role of the average Bobby, and what was life like for the constable of the past.

50 years ago the Cambridge Daily News sent out a cub reporter to discover the truth of a policeman's lot. Armed only with his notebook a young man named Rodney Tibbs set off to try and make his name as a journalist. He can't have done too badly for Rodney's articles – mainly now on motoring – are still published in the News to this day.

But that of 12th October 1956 was perhaps his first: “To some he is an enemy, to others a music-hall joke but to the vast majority of the public the village constable is a familiar and reassuring figure – the man who knows what to do when things go wrong. He attracts little of the glamour usually given to the C.I.D. or the high-speed radio-controlled precision machinery of his fellow-officers, yet he remains the most important man in the police service. But although he is so often seen pedalling along a country lane, the public idea of his full duties is very scanty”, he wrote

So Rodney borrowed a bicycle and set off on patrol with one of Cambridgeshire’s most experienced beat men, PC Ebben, who was responsible for the area around Comberton, Hardwick and Toft. It hardly made headline news: The first call was on a smallholder whose pig had died, a veterinary surgeon had examined the animal but the cause of death was not yet known. PC Ebben was able to refer the farmer to a pig expert living in the village who could give valuable advice.

But sometimes things got more exciting: the constable told how he had once been called from his warm bed in the early hours of the morning and cycled several miles through bad weather to visit an elderly lady living by herself who complained she could hear noises in her bungalow. Inevitably the noises stopped as soon as he arrived, but they started again as soon as he left. Determined to spot the trouble and anxious to get a complete night’s sleep, he pulled up the floorboards and found a hedgehog beneath.

As they biked they paused at a telephone box, a convenient meeting place should anybody need to get in touch with the constable whilst on his beat. But nobody arrived and they moved on.

One evening the bobby had been cycling along when he noticed somebody walking unsteadily by the side of the road: it transpired he had taken an overdose of pills. In pouring rain PC Ebben had taken him to a shelter and arranged for a doctor to attend. Impressed by the kindness shown, the suicidal man decided not to take his life after all and now had a different job, his worries behind him.

Every policeman was fully-trained in first-aid and even his wife had to be prepared to cope with emergencies. Once Mrs Ebben had been called to the door to find a young child covered in blood – he had been kicked in the face by a horse; she made him comfortable until more experienced help could arrive.

The intrepid duo had now reached Toft church, looking picturesque and charming in the failing light. For anybody on the run, a church offertory box makes an ideal target and it was part of the policeman’s routine to check to see it had not been tampered with. He then checked business premises and private houses before continuing to Comberton cross-roads where they were met by the Sergeant who had come along to see all was well.

It was a fine evening but, PC Ebben observed: “I have been out on cycle patrol wearing extra pullovers and socks, with a flask of Bovril and a flask of coffee in my bike basket and I have still felt frozen to the marrow within two hours”

But by 1956 the days of the bobby on the bike were beginning to pass and Rodney joined him in one of the mobile patrols in a black Austin A90 driven by PC Clarke, a full-time police driver. They waited just off the built-up area of Harston watching for speeding traffic – a warmer but less appreciated form of policing.

Once back at the very smart Police House at Comberton it was clear that the constable was on duty all round the clock. Even when the normal work of the day was done there were still such things as accident reports to be made out – and it helped if the policeman could type. His was becoming a multi-skilled role and “taken all round the public get excellent value for money”, Rodney concluded, adding he would watch out for the friendly form of the village constable next time he saw him on his rounds (not to mention the black Austin beside the road)

Rodney Tibbs will be speaking of his memories of 50 years behind the News at the ‘Fenland History on Friday’ meeting at Ely Library on 3rd November, 10.15 to noon. All are welcome.

The Lord Nelson inn at Upware, better known as the ‘Fives Miles from Anywhere, No Hurry’ was one of the riverside pubs that once served the needs of the bargees bringing goods to Cambridge. It stood on the River Cam near the junction with the Lodes which lead down to Burwell, Wicken and Reach, a remote and peaceful area of fenland.

Not that the pub was always peaceful for in the 1850s it was home to the ‘Upware Republic Society’ a gathering of undergraduates who took advantage of the solitude to boat, shoot, skate, fish and enjoy themselves in their own vision of a sporting paradise. Its members included James Clerk Maxwell who was to later achieve fame as first director of Cambridge University’s new Cavendish Laboratory and Henry Arthur Morgan who went on to become Master of Jesus College. [SCAN OF THE OLD PUB – THERE WILL BE MODERN VERSIONS IN THE NEWS LIBRARY IF REQUIRED]

Ten years later the former site of a ‘Republic’ had a King in Richard Ramsay Fielder, an undergraduate of Jesus College who lived and lounged at the pub for many years, fighting any who disputed his self-proclaimed title. In his red waistcoat and corduroy breeches he built up his reputation for drinking, never far from an enormous brownware six-gallon jug of punch.

During the Great War the ‘No Hurry’ was the base for German prisoners, during which time the windows which had been inscribed with the names of generations of drinkers were broken, and over time the thatched roof was covered over with corrugated iron.

It remained a regular venue for boating parties such as that of the Eagle Tavern Children's Outing in September 1947 when an exciting day out was enjoyed by 70 youngsters. On arrival they sat down to an excellent sandwich lunch, and then managed to consume fruit and five gallons of ice-cream. An exciting sports programme followed in which every child received a prize, and then sat down to an excellent tea after which they sang themselves back to Cambridge

But in October 1956 the old pub was badly damaged by fire which destroyed the roof and charred timbers in the bedrooms. Charles Jolley, who had been licensee for over 30 years, told the News that by the time fire crews arrived the roof was well alight and difficult to extinguish due to the covering of corrugated iron on top of 18 inches of thatch. Earlier in the day painters had been at work on the inn. The building stood derelict for years until it was rebuilt in more modern style and still provides welcoming place to break a journey whether by boat, bike or car – or increasingly on foot as walkers trek along the Fen Rivers Way. [SCAN OF HEADLINES FROM 20TH OCTOBER 1956]

These days there may be music on the terrace but gone are the old characters such as Charlie Crisp who was recalled by James Wentworth Day. "I can see him now, ruddy-faced, mischievous-eyed with his whiskers greying, his clay pipe glowing, leaning back on the wooden settle in the bar of the "Five Miles," with his long-legged spaniel snoring at his feet, while he declared solemnly to a sucking undergraduate: "Lor' bless you, sir, that were so hard here one winter and that many geese up the river that they come over the house-top one night like a troop o'hosses. I no more to do but stuck me owd gun up the chimbley and fired her off when I heerd 'em honkin' over. Blarst, boy, when I run to the door, I couldn't git that open. Shut fast." "Snow?" inquired the innocent. "Snow! Blarst! No. Dead Geese! A cart-load on 'em. Them what I shot out o' the chimbley!"

Are there such characters with tall tales to tell – if so please share them with me.

Vera Campbell from Somersham has written following my appeal for memories of cattle markets. She writes: "I visited Cambridge Cattle markets during school holidays and when I worked for my father, Fred Papworth who owned cattle lorries. On the front of his lorries was painted in large white letters 'Here Comes Papworth' [SCAN OF PAPWORTH'S LORRY]

"Monday morning were an exceeding busy time for hauliers as both Cambridge and St Ives had cattle markets and there were quite a few loads to take. I remember arriving at farms and small holdings early that morning with a clean lorry full of fresh straw, collecting sheep, pigs and cattle. Sheep were loaded into the section over the top of the cab, pigs on the top and bottom deck partition, leaving half of the lorry floor for the cattle.

"Several different auctioneers had sales areas. A.T. Grain and Sons were auctioneers of cattle, Tom Chalk sold pigs. A hand bell would ring to tell buyers and sellers an auction was to begin and while the sale was in progress the lorries were being mucked out and washed down with a hosepipe. Then it was a case of waiting for the farmers, butchers and dealers to bring the sales sheets so we could load the lorry and deliver the animals to the farmers and many slaughterhouses in the area.

"There were several other hauliers making a good living in those days. At Cambridge cattle market you would see lorries carrying various names, amongst which were K. Speechley of Madingley, Wilkerson Bros of Duxford, R. Warboys of Elsworth, Warner Bros of St Neots, A.E. Cope of Buckden, F. Wilderspin of Pidley, R. Sillis of Abbotsley and Wright Bros of Stretham"

Vera continues: "After I married I started a florist's business and our delivery vans had 'Here Comes Campbell' on them, reviving happy memories of my father's lorries"

Dawn Mills has emailed following a picture I published of a baby competition in 1947. She writes: "I am the baby as was with my mother in the front left hand side. My name was then Dawn Wilkinson and I believe I was the baby who won the competition. I would like to thank you for printing this photo as I have never seen it till now. My aunt who lives in Cambridge saw it and sent it to me as I now live in Lowestoft". The same article also contained a picture of Petty Cury and this too caught Dawn's eye for she adds: "the little girl is my aunt, so it was a double treat for us both!" [SCAN OF BABY SHOW]

Memories 25th October 2006

My Memories article of October 11 on the village bobby has prompted Marjorie Hillier from Cambridge to share her memories. She is the widow of Sergeant E Hillier who joined Cambridgeshire police in 1934 at the age of 21.

She writes: "It was a pleasant surprise to see the photograph of PC Louis 'Bill' Ebben; he was indeed a real policeman. He told us of one incident when he was stationed at Longstanton in the mid 1940s: he went to quell a reported disturbance outside the Black Bull public house where a crowd of travellers from Willingham Fen were causing trouble. He was quickly surrounded and pinned up against the pub wall.

"In those days the police had no radios or any means of summoning help so he drew his truncheon and managed to hold them off while the landlord phoned for assistance from Cambridge.

"We lived in police stations at Linton and Bottisham with their court rooms and cells and police houses at Harston and Longstanton. My husband being on call 24-hours-a-day, six days a week with one weekend off in five, I frequently found myself in charge of the station, taking telephone calls and dealing with emergencies (all unpaid of course). A telephone extension to the bedroom made sure no call went unanswered. At Bottisham there were many accidents on the main road and my husband's 'going-out' attire was frequently his pyjamas with his uniform over the top.

"Husbands and wives worked as a team and solved many domestic difficulties and other problems. It was an immensely interesting life, so many things happening, comic and tragic, something different every day. We were dealing with people, the most rewarding thing one can do."

Janet Collett, from Over, also knows all about police houses - she lived in six different ones, starting at Swavesey where she was born the daughter of PC Shanks who'd joined the force in 1930. In those days officers were moved every two to three years and they next moved to the police house attached to the magistrates' court at Caxton, where they looked after all the police dogs which were held there. Then it was on to Bassingbourn where her father became a motorcycle policeman - something quite special in those days. The next move saw him promoted to sergeant at the police headquarters on Castle Hill, Cambridge, when he would take prisoners held in the cells meals that her mother had cooked - so they ate really well. A couple of years later and it was off to the house in Station Road, Histon, then on to a brand new police unit at Now Road Impington.

Margaret Cream, from Cambridge, can solve the mystery of the unknown bobby with the bike that I published. It was Mr Poole of Trumpington outside her father's cycle repair shop. She remembers him as a very pleasant and likeable man. The old police house was on the corner until replaced by a new one facing Maris Lane in the mid 1920s.

Dawn Mills has emailed following a picture I published of a baby competition in 1947. She writes: "I am the baby as was with my mother in the front left-hand side. My name was then Dawn Wilkinson and I believe I was the baby who won the competition. I would like to thank you for printing this photo as I have never seen it till now. My aunt, who lives in Cambridge, saw it and sent it to me as I now live in Lowestoft." The same article also contained a picture of Petty Cury and this too caught Dawn's eye for she adds: "The little girl is my aunt, so it was a double treat for us both!"

Violet Ryder, nee Payne, from Cambridge, recognised her brother, Ted - Edward Payne - among the King and Harper staff of 1932; he was apprenticed as an upholsterer for seven-and-six (38p) a week. As the family lived at Hill Farm cottages, Lolworth, he had to cycle along the Huntingdon road to work each day. The exercise came in useful for he won cups, a gramophone and a cutlery box in the cycling races at the village show. During the war he served with the R.E.M.E. in Egypt and used his upholstery skills to repair their seats and canvas bags and belts.

Do you have memories of cycle races at local sports?
Sometimes it was the slowest cyclist who won, as in this picture taken at Pye's sports in the 1940s. Do you recognise anyone?

Now we need your help: Peter Norman has a marvellous collection of old pictures of Newmarket which he shares with groups at slide shows. But he's seeking a view of the Cheapside Menswear Store that used to stand in Wellington Street, Newmarket, on the site of which is now the Pork Shop. If you have one please phone him on (01638) 663179.

Memories 1ST November 2006, by Mike Petty

Cambridge has been busy in recent weeks as the start of a new University year has seen the mass arrival of hundreds of undergraduates settling in to their college rooms.

But actually finding somewhere for them to stay has always been a problem. When the pioneer scholars fled from rioting in Oxford in 1209 their first concern was to find lodgings – and townsfolk were happy to oblige, since this brought in a useful extra income. But within 20 years there were complaints of profiteering and King Henry III ordered the Cambridge Mayor to ensure houses were inspected and that a fair rent was charged.

When in 1973 Margot Holbrook was appointed Secretary of the University Lodging House Syndicate it was part of her job to inspect accommodation and resolve any disputes. This took her into houses across the city and into contact with a remarkable group of people who were continuing the tradition of care for the young men allocated to them.

Not all potential landladies had the best interests of the students at heart; Margot visited one prospective digs in Histon Road: "It was so cold in the room - there was no means of heating. Still more, there was no furniture. An old black gas-stove stood next to an old-fashioned china sink, and had two chipped mugs and a tin kettle on its hob. Behind it a filthy uncurtained window gave on to a scruffy back- yard brown with the weeds and husks of winter. Round the walls were ranged perhaps six or seven black plastic dustbin bags stuffed with - old clothes perhaps? A few scraps of newspaper littered the bare floor. One crazy wooden chair with broken slats leaned at an angle. A box of tea-bags and a half-full milk bottle stood on the draining-board. A white shape skimmed softly past my head and then another swept in a diagonal across the room with a whirr, and as I looked up, a third and fourth fluttered in the far corner making cooing expostulations: they kept a tenuous hold on the picture-rail. 'Oh they're just our doves' the woman said carelessly, much as though everyone kept pigeons in their kitchens. 'What about this student then?'" This was not one that made its way on to the approved list.

But many undergraduates did approve of their landladies and have recorded their appreciation. Agnes Smith of St Clement's Gardens, Thompson's Lane lodged students from the First World War until the early 1970s. She let four sets to male undergraduates at King's College but loved people to pop in for coffee and thick slices of Victoria sponge. On Sundays she always made enough food for whoever turned up & usually between five to eight people would enjoy her roast joints and caramel custards. Like all landladies she was under instructions to lock her front door at ten in the evening and keep a log of the men who came in late. But the back door was always open and as she went to bed at 9.30 she could always plead ignorance about what happened after that.

Margot has now published a book on the history of the college lodging houses and garnered many reminiscences of what one lad described as these 'uncrowned – or uncanonised – saints'. There are tales of the Lord who ate bread and dripping at night before he went to bed but had a valet who came in the morning to lay out his clothes and descriptions of lodgings in David Street off Mill Road, in Alexandra Street off Petty Cury, Grantchester Street and King Street.

But there is more, for Margot has investigated other issues connected with bedrooms, providing a detailed account of the notorious Spinning House where the University imprisoned women it suspected of prostitution. Her book fills a gap in the social history of both town and gown and makes compelling reading for anyone who has had connections with Cambridge college lodging houses, whether upstairs or downstairs literally emptying the chamber pot

Albert Waldock from Fulbourn writes with his memories of the Cambridge Cattle Market: "When I was a nipper my grandfather, being in the meat trade, would take me to the Cambridge cattle market from Royston. He was a good judge of meat on the hoof so the farmers used to ask him to check cattle, and abided by his choice. They dropped him a few florins for his beer money. We would park me on the railings by the market 'train spotting' till 11 o'clock then take me into the pub for a lemonade and packet of crisps while he and the farmer did their business. Then it was back to the bottom of Brooklands Avenue to catch the old 108 bus back to Royston and granny's tea"

Doris Wright from Cambridge recalls life in the York Street area and has lent a snap showing her brother and sister outside the Co-op showing the door from which the night-watchman used to guard the gates - the smell from the bread at night was lovely. "The horse-drawn milk floats used to go out very early and when we came home to dinner they would just be returning; we used to jump on the step at the back and have a ride”, she recalls. [SCAN OF CHILDREN OUTSIDE THE CO-OP DAIRY]

Memories 8th November 2006, by Mike Petty

Carol Reeve worked for a while a Bowes and Bowes bookshop whilst "resting" during an acting career that saw her progress from standing around in the freezing cold to roles on television. It was there that she met her husband Brian and they were married in St Edward's church between David's bookstall and the Arts Theatre (very suitable) on a Monday, because so many of the staff wanted to be present, so Saturday was out! Now Carol, the actress, has become a writer, setting down her memories of childhood at Bottisham where she was born the daughter of a village G.P., a Pole whose naturalised name was Albert Gilbert – but who everybody called Dick

In their large home, Carol's was a life of some style. She attended St Colette's Preparatory School in Cambridge which was run by two sisters, Miss Burns whom the pupils all feared and Miss Beryl whom they all loved. The school was a single-storied wooden hut with wider verandas where they took their lessons in good weather. Most of the children could read before they were six. It was here she was introduced to the stage, being chosen to be an angel in the Nativity play wearing a flimsy pink tunic with matching pink knickers for the performance at the ADC theatre – only Carol discovered that her's had been left behind and had to go on without them!

Life at home changed dramatically with the arrival of Jewish refugees from Austria. They turned up clutching brown paper parcels and carrier bags and soon dominated the household. A few days later the 'one or two things' they'd managed to bring from Vienna arrived in a large van. Amongst the crates was an over-sized kitchen cabinet containing a long row of dusty shelves, each one labelled and containing an amazing variety of herbs, spices and rice. The kitchen had to be rearranged to accommodate it. These visitors soon departed, to universal relief, but they were later to be replaced by cockney evacuees with their mother who commandeered the kitchen, wearing a scarf around her curlers and smoking a cigarette. Carol and her brother sank their own differences to declare war on these invaders who soon decided they'd sooner face Hitler on their own ground rather than in that godforsaken dump.

The next invaders came in tanks, one of which demolished their front wall as they trundled to the grounds of Bottisham Hall where they disguised themselves under camouflage netting. Later came Americans bringing oranges, chocolate and teddy bears. Soon the village children were chewing gum and saying 'gee' and 'shuck'. Older girls started wearing nylons and coach loads of 'chicks' were brought from Cambridge for Saturday-night dances. Inevitably her father became very busy as the birth-rate increased dramatically. When the Yanks went, Belgian airmen took over the camp to be replaced in turn by Polish schoolboys

Carol's own schooldays continued at Byron House School in a rambling old house on Huntingdon Road. She journeyed there in a single-decker bus whose seats had been rearranged to make more room, with people sitting around the sides facing inwards to the stifling crush of strap-hanging passengers who swung in unison as the bus swerved and accelerated. It was here that Carol made a new friend in Anna Jooss whose father, Kurt, was establishing a ballet company with a free expressive style. Carol joined in and learned how to dance – something that would stand her in good stead in her later career in entertainment. Back home life was not always easy, her parents' marriage hit a rocky patch that would end in the divorce courts and Carol left for a boarding school at Barcombe in Sussex

The Bottisham that Carol knew has changed tremendously. But when she returned in 2005 to give a talk to the Women's Institute there were still familiar sights and faces to welcome her back and now her published memories of the distant days of wartime have added an extra dimension to the story of village life.

My appeal for reminiscences of cycle racing has brought an early response from Terry Chapman who emails: “The picture of Pye’s Sports Ground, down near the river, brings back memories. I first won the Cole Cup awarded to the novices of the then Cambridge Town and County Cycling Club in the early 1950’s. I rode in the Team Pursuit at the Anglian Rally at Attleborough with Rodney Smith and the late Bill Ives and Terry Sewell and was fortunate enough to win the shield for this race.

“Other cycle track meetings were at Rowley’s Field, Histon, Shelford, Ely, Fordham, Soham and Littleport and on the city football ground. These events were well supported and often run in conjunction with the Amateur Athletics Association. Many of your readers may remember the late Jack Woollard, Cambridge Town & County Cycling Club Starter and the late Ossy Neal, our timekeeper”

If so drop me a line.

Can anybody recognise faces in this picture of the Cambridgeshire police cricket team, taken on Parker’s Piece probably in the 1920s. It was lent to me by Debbie Mason of Witchford.

Memories 15th November 2006 by Mike Petty

Stories of growing opposition to the war in Iraq are reminiscent of reports that were appearing in the News of 50 years ago. Only then the war was over Suez. Those protests seem now to have been largely forgotten but make interesting reading:

At the start of November six hundred undergraduates demonstrated at a ‘No War on Suez’ debate in one of the rowdiest meetings ever held in the Union Debating Chamber. Every inch of space was occupied and people even piled up on the window ledges to hear two MPs, Kenneth Younger and Anthony Wedgwood Benn who were the butt of deafening ridicule, shouting, catcalling, hissing and yelling from supporters of Prime Minister, Sir Anthony Eden. But things got really heated a few days later.

A Suez protest rally was organised by the Cambridge Labour Party on Parker’s Piece. Eighty marchers set off from Alex Wood Hall but were met along the route by smoke bombs, water from upstairs windows and counter-cries from undergraduates. Once on the Piece the back of a lorry provided a speakers’ platform on which Geoffrey de Freitas, MP and Canon Mervyn Stockwood of Great St Mary’s church called on Cambridge people to condemn the government's action as an act of naked aggression which endangered world peace. But the crowd of some 1,500 people could hardly hear through the constant hubbub of a group of dissenting undergraduates who carried slogans tacked on long-handled brushes saying 'Eden acts where U.N.O. fails' and 'Non-intervention is Suez-cide'.

Whatever the merits of the current war the debate is somewhat more peaceful than that of 1956! But did you take part during the Suez operation, either as a member of the armed forces, or a protestor – and what are your memories? [SCAN OF SUEZ PROTEST CUTTING]

Recent Memories articles continue to prompt letters:

Sheelagh Neal from Gt Shelford writes: "It was nice to see my dad, Ossie Neal's, name in your Memories article on cycle racing. I can remember going with him to the '3As' sports meetings held in the City Football ground in the 1950s. They always included cycle races such as sprints and my favourite, 'Devil take the hindmost'. He would also do the timekeeping for most of the locally-held time-trials and long-distant events. We would get up at five in the morning, load the 'tea-van' so that mum could provide cups of tea for officials and make our way up to Madingley Hill which was the start for most of the races. Dad had done a lot of racing cycling in the late 1920s and 30s and won medals and certificates; he also held several tandem records for 25 and 50 mile time trials (with, I believe a Harold Grimwood). He was also well-known for his motorcycle exploits; he took part in road-racing, sprints and hill-climbs until well into his eighties and was timekeeper at the local scrambles, such as Elsworth, Arrington and Balsham. Dad died nine year ago now, but its good to know he is still remembered!" He may well have been amongst the competitors photographed by John Carter at a meeting at Elsworth in April 1955 when one of the riders lost control of his machine and crashed into spectators. St John Ambulancemen tended the injured. [SCAN OF AMBULANCEMEN TENDING INJURED RIDER]

Bernard Cornwell from Histon has lent me a number of programmes of sports meetings of the time Ossie was competing. They include one of the first horticultural show and sports meeting organised by the Cambridge Co-op Society at Arnold's Field adjoining the Town Football Ground in August 1931 and another of the Ely Flower Show and annual sports on the City Recreation Ground on August Bank Holiday 1929. They kept some events for locals, including a Tradesmen's Carrier Bicycle Race for Ely shops only. There was also a motor cycle musical chairs with a lady passenger either on the pillion or in a side car [SCAN OF NAMES AT ELY CHALLENGE CUP 1929]

Mary Hills of Cambridge enjoyed Margot Holbrook's account of College Landladies; she was one herself until she gave up in 1988 when her husband was poorly but did enjoy looking after undergraduates and has many memories of those days. Her house was at Mawson Road and she started taking students in 1961 with three lodgers from St Catharine's College. She had to sign gate bills to show whether the students had spent the night at her house. But by the time she finished the regime had changed, then they could be out until two in the morning and were more grown up – she treated them like young ladies and gentlemen.

Dr Neville Silverston from Bottisham writes: "I read with interest your piece on Carol Reeve's book, "From Bottisham to Barcombe". I took over her father, Dr Gilbert's, practice in 1958 having purchased the "large house" from him. My wife (now sadly gone) and I left the village nine years ago. I could relate many details of "Dickie" Gilbert's private life which, if made the theme of a novel or film, would be regarded as too unbelievable to be true"

Memories 22nd November 2006, by Mike Petty

Gas was a development which caused great excitement during the Victorian period. At Christmas 1868 Haddenham was looking forward to the streets being lit up for the first time. Other places had preceded them: Huntingdon saw the light by gas in 1832, the long dark and dreary streets of Soham had been metamorphosed into pleasant and safe thoroughfares in January 1849, in 1867 Littleport began to raise the £2,000 required to light their streets this way. Sutton tried to emulate their neighbours in 1870 but a lack of public support caused the newspaper to comment that “the inhabitants of Sutton will be quite safe from the horrors of gas explosions during the present century”

The worry of explosions was always present. Ely was nearly devastated by a gas explosion just before Christmas 1951. Newspaper headlines reported the heroism of a workman, Chris Lee, who noticed that fire had broken out in equipment controlling the supply of gas from the holders to the mains. Standing within a few feet of the flames he telephoned for the fire brigade and the station manager before the telephone was incinerated. The manager, Claude Staniforth leapt out of bed, clad only in pyjamas, hastily donned a coat and shoes and tore down to the works in Back Hill where firemen managed to extinguish the flames, preventing a serious explosion. Mr Lee was awarded a Rolls Razor in recognition for his devotion to duty.

The Ely gas works have now passed into history and few will remember them. One who does is the son of the last secretary and engineering manager. Claude Staniforth was appointed in 1933 and saw it through the problems of wartime and nationalisation in 1949 before ending his career in Cambridge. His memories, supplemented by much research in original records have now been published in a major addition to the literature on gas supply, ‘Can you smell gas’.

Smell indeed was one of the ways in which the presence of gas was detected. When the underground main broke – as they did frequently opposite the Lamb Hotel – the workers made holes through the tarmac at regular intervals where the smell was most prominent to try and locate the break.

But the production process was not without its aroma, nor was it quiet, as Michael Delanoy remembers. He lived opposite the works and has three vivid memories of the plant. “The unique coal tar/gas oil smell which pervaded the air completely obliterated the chlorine smell from the nearby open-air swimming pool”. (It also masked the damp pong from the river, the smell from the brewery and the pervasive aroma of the sugar beet factory, all of which combined to make the riverside area of the city somewhat less attractive than it is today). Then there was the noise, especially audible in the long night hours. Mike recalls: “The coal was taken up to the top of the building, it being a vertical retort, in an external steam driven lift which produced a ‘chugging’ sound. When this stopped there was a clatter of sliding doors and a pause before the falling of the coal made a considerable noise which would have woken anybody not used to it”. But there was some tangible benefit of living near. Saturday morning was coke-day when local residents queued to buy coke which they transported home in a variety of containers that helped keep the home fires smouldering.

Another by-product was ammoniacal gas liquor, which was toxic and difficult to dispose of. At one time it was piped to the nearby river and loaded into barges which took it to King’s Lynn where it was refined to produce a fertiliser. The same thing happened at Cambridge. But new processes rendered this obsolete. It could not just be dumped into the river or sewers – though some did find its way into both. For a while it was spread direct on agricultural land then dumped into a very large pit in the fens out of harms way. [SCAN OF AMMONIA WATER BEING PUMPED ON TO BARGES AT CAMBRIDGE GAS WORKS]

But there were perks of being the manager. For one thing he was entitled to anything that ran on gas. Paul's childhood home was full of appliances – lights, fires, washing machines, fridges and cookers. Special cookery demonstrations of these were arranged and his father even persuaded a manufacturer to personalise two low-price models, named Ely 1 and Ely 2 which were sold for the low price of one shilling a week on hire purchase. Gas cookers revolutionised the kitchens of many homes and are now museum-pieces. [SCAN OF ENID PORTER AT CAMBRIDGE FOLK MUSEUM RECEIVING AN OLD GAS COOKER AS AN EXHIBIT – WHO ELSE IS IN THE PICTURE?]

And then there was the boardroom with its table. Around this the Directors, Horace Martin, Owen Ambrose and Lt-Col. Archer would formulate plans to cope with day-to-day issues, whilst in wartime it became a make-shift bed where Claude would sleep ready to sound the alert on the gas-factory hooter to warn citizens of an impending air-raid. But occasionally it was transformed into a ping-pong table where father and son would play in a rare moment of family-bonding.

For as Paul makes clear, life was far from idyllic, his father being a committed Methodist gave virtually all his salary to charity leaving his mother to support herself and her son through her income as history teacher at the High School. The book touches on many social issues but principally draws on reminiscences from employees as well as customers to produce a detailed account of the production and distribution problems facing a small gasworks. Other places had such facilities, very few have such a comprehensive history.

Even though the caption was squeezed off a picture that I featured in Memories on 8th November, readers have been quick to come forward with details and to recognise faces. It was of the Bottisham Home Guard and featured Dr Dick Gilbert in the front row. A couple of ranks behind him was John Brasnett's dad, Thomas. Barry Lawrence contacted me to say that his father, Harry Lawrence, also recognised a face. I emailed him a full copy of the picture and he spotted some more. Harry was a member of the 7th Camouflage & Decoy unit which was stationed in Lincolnshire under Colonel Parker. He was involved in the making of dummy aircraft and visited the Elstree studios where they were made. Later he was sent to Belgium to man the refuelling & rearmament dumps as the air attacks were focused on Germany towards the end of the war. Harry feels sure there was a "Dummy aerodrome" near to Bottisham and some of the men in the picture manned it. [SCAN BOTTISHAM HOME GUARD]

Dozens of dummy airfields were built, as well as dummy factories, dummy towns and various other fake targets to attract enemy bombs. Some were 'day-time' dummy airfields containing replica buildings and aircraft made by the film industry, though they were quickly seen through by the Germans and as a result attracted few bombs. Then there were 'night-time' dummy airfields consisting of arrangements of lights to simulate runways and moving aircraft. One was constructed to divert the bombers away from the marshalling yards at March with standard lamps, signal lights – even the open fire box of a steam locomotive glowing in the dark. But do you remember this or others in Cambridgeshire?

Two neighbouring areas of Cambridge have come under the spotlight in two contrasting publications.

Chesterton Local History Group has worked with Cambridge City Council's Community Development team to record the memories of people who have lived in that area for some time. Well-known characters like Derek Stubbings, Pam Fry, Mo Tyrell, Marion Colthorpe and Bernice Wadsworth are amongst the contributors together with children who now attend St Andrew's Primary School.

John Impey's family came up by horse and cart from South London in the 1920s to take over the bakery in the High Street where children would call in for a freshly-baked cheese roll on their way to school. Mick Speed was born in Kendal Way and played in Brown's Field – now a youth and community centre whose opening is commemorated by this publication.

Mrs G. Stearn recalls wash day. She remembers: "When I was a girl, washday was always on a Monday, wet or fine. Mother used a wooden tub to do her chores. The clothes were boiled in an iron pan set in brick copper, with a fire under it, using coal and coke. Water came from the tap; soap was 'Sunlight' or 'Windsor', which cost about 6d. Soap powders were in the shops but too expensive for many people. We also used 'Robin' Starch, and a Dolly Blue Bag. An old wooden roller mangle in the shed outside was used to wring out most of the water. The clothes were aired on a clothes horse in front of the fire; we also had lines across the ceiling where Mother would hang the clothes over night to finish drying. The lines were not used during the day as it was thought to be unhealthy to have damp clothes in a room with people. When I married in 1936 our house had a gas copper in the outhouse, but I also used a zinc bath or our big sink. Soap flakes and powders (like 'Persil' or 'Rinso') were popular by then. An Acme wringer made that job a lot easier, and an electric iron was a wedding present. A lovely airing cupboard did the airing for me, but if clothes were still a bit damp they would be left in front of the fire. Before the war few women had washing machines. I never had one, preferring to hand wash, which I think is best.

Washday memories also feature in a study of the Romsey area by local historian, Allan Bringham. Sue, who was born in Great Eastern Street in 1959 told how her mother did all the laundry by hand, hanging it up to dry over a pulley above the coal fire in the middle room. "We didn't have a washing machine, there was a Butler sink, and my mum would get me to turn the handle on a mangle". But change was in the air: "I remember a woman down the road called Hilda, she got this little square washing machine, and that's all it was, a square washing machine, and it had a mangle, an automatic mangle on the top. I can see myself pushing this square washing machine from Hilda's to our house so that we could borrow it. And that was amazing, it had a separate spinner, so the clothes were washed, and there was this automatic mangle on the top, then you spun them out afterwards."

In the 1960's days facilities that are now taken for granted were just not there. The toilet was out the back: "It was a brick toilet, painted black and white with just a loo in it. If we went to the loo in the night we had a potty." Nor was there a bath. "The bath tub hung up on a hook out the back, and sometimes my mum used to do the sheets in it. Baths twice a week. The water was heated with an Ascot. I remember it was a big old white thing... I had two elder brothers, so I always got the clean water, that's another thing I can remember. I always got first, because I was the girl, and they had to go in after, together. "

Allan uses such memories to chart the transformation of an area that has undergone improvements that not everybody welcomes. Jeanette and her husband moved to Romsey in 1979 because they could afford a house there. It was in a poor state, much of the flooring was rotten; there was a bathroom but it opened into the kitchen. However there were council grants that helped make it into a comfortable home in an area where council policies ensured that such properties were renovated, rather than knocked down and replaced.

But it is not all good news. Landlords bought up the relatively cheap properties: "they don't care what it looks like ... they're just in it for making money". Some are rented to students, noisy neighbours made life miserable and it no longer feels like a good place to bring up children, say some. Others appreciate a wonderful sense of community.

Allan Brigham's study was published as part of a report entitled 'Bringing it all back home: changes in housing and society 1996-2006' produced for the Chartered Institute of Housing's conference at Cambourne earlier this month. Copies are available from Mill Road bookshops or from Allan on 01223 212189 for £5. 'Memories of Chesterton' is available free from Brown's Field Youth and Community Centre off Green End Road; contact Louise Appleton on 01223 420309 for details.

Memories 13th December 2006, by Mike Petty

Harry Bye of Ely has responded to my appeal for memories of washing days in time past.

Harry was brought up in the 1920s on a racing stud near Snailwell where his father looked after three Suffolk Punches on Lord Derby's estate. One weekend his father told the family: 'I am coming back on Monday and bringing you a new mother,. Harry recalls: "My stepmother did the washing on Mondays using the vacuum washer. This was a brass thing with a glass marble in the cylinder on a long handle. The linen was placed in the tub with the soap and you bounced it up and down and the 'boom', 'boom', 'boom' would echo through the plantation. Sometimes we had to do the bouncing in the old tub and also turn the mangle. Later on we took the sheets and blankets to a lady in Snailwell who did it for 2/6d. (12½ p) a week.

Harry went to Snailwell school where Nellie Smythe was his teacher and Miss Bilton the head. She was nice at times, but if she got into a temper would bang the lid of her desk until she cooled down. She was particularly incensed after children moved her boyfriend's motor bike that he'd parked in the school playground when he'd come courting. It was later found outside the pub.

If there was any trouble with the pupils she would inform the parson, Rev Ernest Powells, who would put things in order without sending for the policeman. The rector combined many other roles: he managed the stud which belonged to his step uncle, Lord Howard de Walden and collected rents from the tenants of his thatched cottages' he was a member of the local fire brigade, and even swept the chimneys. His best friend was Mr Downham, the landlord of the 'George and Dragon' who sang bass in the church choir. They did renovations in the church and went rabbit shooting together.

While out on his rounds one cold day the rector found a lady and her family shivering in their cottage with no fire. She told him they had no money to buy coal. On returning to the rectory Mr Powells rang a coal merchant in Newmarket and within the hour a ton of coal was delivered free of charge to the grateful lady. Later he was to visit Harry's house on a sad occasion, to christen newly-born twins in the bedroom. As anticipated they died when a few weeks old.

One day the district nurse visited and said their front door needed replacing as water was coming through. It was reported to the sanitary inspector who sent a complaint to the estate office. They responded by sending his father a month's notice.

The family packed their belongings into a large van and set off for a new life in a nine-roomed farmhouse deep in the fens on the Chivers estate at Shippea Hill. Harry recalls: On arrival my stepmother went across the road to the Plough and Duck pub cum shop cum post and telegraph office and came back with a gallon of beer". The van driver and his mate both drank a pint, and Harry had a taste – but did not like it. Instead he drink soft water or dyke water, that they boiled.

Nor was he too keen on the school to which he was conveyed in a covered horse-drawn wagon called the 'kid cart'. The head, Mr Crowther was very strict and someone had the cane most days. The tortoise coke furnace did not heat the school very well so the teacher took them outside for drill to warm them up; the schoolyard that was cinders and on windy days the children got black faces. But at heart he was a kind man. Some of the children had to walk three miles to and from their home at Golden Ball Farm. One day after a party at school one of the boys began to cry, saying “I’m afraid to walk home to Redmere in the dark”, so Mr Crowther accompanied him on the lonely journey, carrying a stable lantern.

Harry Bye is a mine of such stories and has now been encouraged to set them down in print. His memories of ‘A life in the fens’ has now been issued in a booklet costing £4 plus postage which is available from the Littleport Society at The Barn, Main Street, Littleport, CB6 1PH Knapwell is a small village and does not have its own war memorial. But now the churchwardens would like to commemorate those men of the parish who served in the two World Wars.

The names of the fallen are known: from the first war John Hinson of the Rifle Brigade was killed in September 1918 and is commemorated on a memorial at Vis-En-Artois. Two other local lads are known to have joined up, one may have been a member of the Rolt family who served in the Machine Gun Corps and the other an Utteridge. They are thought to have survived, but what became of them afterwards?

George Desborough and Benjamin Ellis fell during the 1939-1945 conflict. George was a member of the Herts Regiment and was killed in June 1944 in Italy; Ben was a Gunner who is buried at El Alamein.

But does anybody have further details or photographs or know if there were other Knapwell men. If so can you contact Irene Abraham on 01353 740002 and help a small village fill a big gap in its history.

Memories 20th December 2006, by Mike Petty

One ever-present Christmas gift is something smelly. In December 1927 the News advised that “Many a charming gift can be purchased at a chemist’s shop. Ladies always find scent very acceptable and at Messrs Campkin and Sons, Rose Crescent, Cambridge, there can be obtained a choice selection of perfume. Soap and bath salts in dainty packages are suggestions that may help to solve the gift problems for those whose pockets are not very deep”.

But who remembers that Cambridge used to have its own manufacturer, the Castle Soap Company in Albert Street – later renamed Young Street – off East Road.

Few needed a map to find their way there: you could follow your noses, despite a giant chimney designed to take away the appalling smell, or follow the butchers’ carts delivering rancid fat or the fishermen flocking for tins of maggots.

The News conceded in January 1907: “The tallow manufacturing side of the business is the least attractive. There seems little affinity between the seething mass of brown liquid emitting strong, malodorous fumes from the iron receptacle in which it is being boiled and the immaculate and fragrant bars, tablets and cakes that result.”

The resulting soap was pumped into large rectangular moulds to set and then cut by wires into slabs which were placed on a machine that divided them into bars. There were various types – washing soap, carbolic soap, Brown Windsor and thirty other sorts of more elaborate toilet soap. This was not just the ordinary yellow soap with the addition of colour and perfume, but a separate product. It used finest quality ingredients and more elaborate boiling to produce a perfectly white and odourless soap which then went through a milling process during which perfume and colour were added before it was put through a machine that polished the surface.

Finally designs were imprinted by gun metal stamps. In addition Castle Soap produced a transparent variety which if boiled on January 1st would not be on the market before the following year. Even then it had to be washed before it could be sold. [SCAN T2269]

The premises were later used by Peaks Furnishers, but does anybody remember them. And if you do want an unusual local soap-related product, then turn to the internet where you can buy, if not a bar of soap, then at least a bill that the Castle Soap Company sent to the Commercial Stores at Brinkley in 1909. A recent mystery ball picture has brought memories flooding back to Betty Tolbrigg from Comberton who has a copy of the picture in her photograph album captioned “The Youth Club Ball”. Betty is third from the left in the front row with her fiancée (later her husband) just behind. She also recognises several faces in the crowd. Frances Ison of Madingley used to ENJOY a number of similar functions and writes: “I attended the Police Balls for a number of years with a group of civilians and members of the police force, held early in January. I also went to the Firemen’s Ball held at the Dorothy Ballroom in February. I used to make my own dresses (too expensive to buy) and had to have several – you couldn’t wear the same dress when with the same people! I still have one to remember those days, cherry-red taffeta worn with black jet jewellery and black mittens. I made my own evening bags from the dress fabric. They were lovely occasions, looked forward to for months. Tickets were £4 or £6 – how times have changed. Sadly few of us are now left to remember”

John Carter has lent me another photograph of a Christmas dance, this time with a model of a Premier Travel bus which carries the name ‘County of Cambridge’ below the windscreen. The real vehicle was a Daimler double-decker coach named by the Chairman of the County Council in April 1950, so presumably this ball was at the end of that year. Thus we know the what and probably the when, but where was it taken and who does it show? [SCAN OF THE PREMIER TRAVEL PARTY. Memories 27th December 2006, by Mike Petty Christmas is not what it once was – but then it probably never has been.

“A good old-fashioned Christmas when the brightly-blazing Yule log, or its modern equivalent, is necessary to counteract the efforts of King Frost is as a rule so old-fashioned that it seems to have existed only in the picturesque imaginations of the novelist and pictorial artist. So also is the Christmas-card Christmas with the country covered with the white mantle of snow” – or that was what the News thought as Christmas 1906 approached.

But then the climate varied; “the mercury experienced a rapid drop on Christmas Eve, hard roads took to themselves more or less the appearance of quagmires, drizzling rain set in and all the chances seemed in favour of the familiar state of mud for the holidays. By the time, however, the carol singers had for the last time urged the Christians to awake and salute the happy morn, the frost asserted itself, and the Eastern part of England saluted a morn marked by an atmosphere just sufficiently frosty to be pleasant, and a wind which was a trifle too piecing for the fancy of all but the most robust.

“With thankful hearts the populace tripped to church or chapel, or sought enlarged appetites before the holidays concluded. Good attendances at church, each in its festive dress of winter blooms and evergreens were one of the results of clean comfortable locomotion. As the bright sun sank behind ominous clouds in the west the thoroughfares became less and less frequented until for the most part the police patrol had Cambridge and environs to themselves.

“Then were sounds of merriment from many a family party audible in the quiet streets. Christmas was being celebrated in the good old-fashioned way in good old-fashioned weather.

“While the merry-makers were peacefully slumbering there was another variation. Many a party who had planned outdoor recreations for Boxing Day were dismayed to see the earth covered with several inches of snow, with the prospect of more to follow. Here was the Christmas-card part of Christmas. This meant the abandonment of football, walking, cycling, motoring and outdoor recreations in general, unless clearing away snow from footpaths can by any stretch of imagination be held to be a recreation. For the most part Boxing Day was an indoor Day and of the indoor public amusements ‘The Christian’ at the Theatre and the pantomime at the Guildhall were the chief.

Yet another change was experienced. “Frost returning with renewed vigour covered roads and paths into a state approaching badly-kept skating rinks. Frost, thaw, rain, frost snow and frost again, such as has been experienced during the last three days is almost a record for even the English climate. Such a Christmas as has just been experienced in Cambridge occurs but few times within a lifetime”, the News commented 100 years ago [SCAN OF TRUMPINGTON STREET CAMBRIDGE TAKEN AFTER THE SNOW OF 1906. SCAN OF ELY CATHEDRAL IN SNOW – FROM A CHRISTMAS CARD]

One Christmas tradition is to sit around the fire and tell ghostly tales. Such pastimes have been part of the local scene for centuries, as a recent translation of a very old book recalls.

Back in the 11th-century very few people could write and when they did it was in Latin. The ‘Liber Eliensis’ is an ancient history of the Isle of Ely from the seventh to twelfth centuries written by a monk who’d sat down to record the life and times within the abbey of Ely that has just been translated by Janet Fairweather.

There are many details of religious devotion, bequests and hard times, there is an eye-witness account of Hereward the Wake and what happened after William the Conqueror had finally proved successful.

But there is an amazing amount of other happenings. For the monks were sure that St Etheldreda, the twice-married virgin mother of their church, was still to be seen amongst them, even though she had been buried not once but twice – and the second time her body had been better preserved than it was in her lifetime.

She had appeared to pilgrims, to those seeking her cure for illness and to a villain named Gervase who had sought to purloin abbey land and keep it for himself. The scribe recorded how, as Gervase lay sleeping St Etheldreda appeared in his room, together with her two sainted sisters; “And she lifted the staff she was carrying and implanted its point heavily in the region of his heart, as if to pierce him through. Gervase ... with his terrible groaning and horrible screaming disturbed the whole of his household and said ‘Lady have mercy’. On hearing this the servants came running and Gervase said to them: ‘Do you not see St Etheldreda going away? How she pierced my chest with the sharp end of her staff ... And look, a second time she is returning to impale me, and now I shall die’. And with these words he breathed his last”

But it was not just saints that troubled the monks. One young man called Edwin left a service before it was over raving against everyone, making wild threats, flailing and trying to hurt some of the men who tried to constrain him, kicking with his feet and biting with his teeth. One of the monks saw someone black, like a boy, holding firmly on to his cowl and dragging him forcibly after him - it was, they believed, a spirit who had been damned.

The abbot ordered that the lad spend a night of vigil by the tomb of St Etheldreda diligently praying for her help. The chronicler recorded what happened next: "For some time he behaved in horrible way, now shouting out, now tearing his tunic with his teeth, till the approach of day he fell asleep for a while, recovered his reason and shortly afterwards, coming to his senses, gave word to the guards that he was now feeling well and had completely recovered in all other respects, except that the internal looseness of his stomach was torturing him, and was in need of evacuation in a privy.

"After being taken to the necessary place, he experienced as great an efflux as if all his bowels were being poured out and such a stink of the stomach was ejected that the air throughout all the nearest domestic buildings was scarcely bearable, as the polluted exhalation spread itself through every nook and cranny, and scarcely anyone escaped its vapour.

I hope it does not put you off your turkey! [SCAN OF ENGRAVING SHOWING THE DEATH AND INTERMENT OF ST ETHELDREDA, LATER, MONKS BELIEVED SHE APPEARED TO GERVAISE AND PRODDED HIM WITH HER STAFF] [ENGRAVING OF GRAVEYARD AT ELY CATHEDRAL]

Memories 7th January 2007 by Mike Petty

WHO remembers that Cambridge used to have its own soap manufacturer, the Castle Soap Company in Albert Street - later renamed Young Street - off East Road?

Few needed a map to find their way there: you could follow your nose, despite a giant chimney designed to take away the appalling smell; or follow the butchers' carts delivering rancid fat or the fishermen flocking for tins of maggots.

The News conceded in January 1907: "The tallow manufacturing side of the business is the least attractive. There seems little affinity between the seething mass of brown liquid emitting strong, malodorous fumes from the iron receptacle in which it is being boiled, and the immaculate and fragrant bars, tablets and cakes that result."

The resulting soap was pumped into large rectangular moulds to set, and then cut by wires into slabs which were placed on a machine that divided them into bars. There were various types - washing soap, carbolic soap, Brown Windsor and 30 other sorts of more elaborate toilet soap.

This was not just the ordinary yellow soap with the addition of colour and perfume, but a separate product. It used finest quality ingredients and more elaborate boiling to produce a perfectly white and odourless soap which then went through a milling process during which perfume and colour were added before it was put through a machine that polished the surface. Finally designs were imprinted by gun metal stamps.

In addition Castle Soap produced a transparent variety which if boiled on January 1st would not be on the market before the following year. Even then it had to be washed before it could be sold.

The premises were later used by Peaks Furnishers, but does anybody remember them? And if you do want an unusual local soap-related product, then turn to the internet where you can buy, if not a bar of soap, then at least a bill that the Castle Soap Company sent to the Commercial Stores at Brinkley in 1909.

A recent mystery ball picture has brought memories flooding back to Betty Totbrigg from Comberton who has a copy of the picture in her photograph album captioned "The Youth Club Ball". Betty is third from the left in the front row with her fiancé (later her husband) just behind. She also recognises several faces in the crowd

Frances Ison of Madingley used to enjoy similar functions and writes: "I attended the Police Balls for a number of years with a group of civilians and members of the police force, held early in January, I also went to the Firemen's Ball held at the Dorothy Ballroom in February. I used to make my own dresses (too expensive to buy) and had to have several - you couldn't wear the same dress when with the same people! "I still have one to remember those days, cherry-red taffeta worn with black jet jewellery and black mittens. I made my own evening bags from the dress fabric. They were lovely occasions, looked forward to for months. Tickets were £4 or £6 - how times have changed. Sadly few of us are now left to remember."

John Carter has lent me another photograph of a Christmas dance, this time with a model of a Premier Travel bus with the name "County of Cambridge" below the windscreen. The real vehicle was a Daimler double-decker coach named by the Chairman of the County Council in April 1950, so presumably this ball was at the end of that year. Thus we know the what and probably the when, but where was it taken and who does it show?

Memories 10th January 2007, by Mike Petty

At this time of year it is traditional to look back. But sometimes its more interesting to see what people in the past considered that the future would hold.

Edward Law had emailed me about a book he recently acquired. It comprises 21 postcard-sized photographs pasted onto linen-hinged pages. They are pictures of cartoons relating to Cambridge University and are signed "Dod". They seem to date from about 1887 and one of them looks forward, being captioned 'Cambridge in 1977'.

By then, Dod anticipated, the age of admission for undergraduates would have plummeted, with men taking their degree before beginning life at Public School. On arrival they would find that women were dominant, all the tutors, lecturers and proctors would have been replaced by experienced ladies from the neighbouring University of Girton.

Perhaps he got some of his predictions wrong, but can anybody shed more light on the mysterious illustrator and his work? [DOD CARTOON OF LIFE IN 1977]

DARTS

With coverage of darts filling the television screens again, Mrs Joan Nutcombe (nee Burton) of Waterbeach, who worked in the IBM punched card office at Pye, has sent me a picture taken at their Social Club in St Andrew's Road. It shows the Pye ladies darts team final in 1959. Joan is the one in front with the bracelets – which she still has - and can remember the Christian names of some of the other girls – Laura, Jean, Betty, Ross and Veronica. But where are they now? [SCAN OF PYE DARTS LADIES]. And can anybody identify faces in another of John Carter's pictures from about the same date, this one showing a men's darts match, and where was it taken?. [MENS DART PHOTO]

FAMOUS BACKS

In the past News readers could not only identify faces, they could name people from behind. In the 1930s the Cambridge Daily News ran a regular weekly series showing the back view of a local person and invited readers to identify him. In December 1931 they featured the head porter at Addenbrooke's Hospital. Their postbag was filled to overflowing with almost everyone identifying him. They were convinced that he was the most popular man in Cambridge.

Mrs Flory of Isleham vicarage described him as 'the jolly old porter', Miss G. Hephner of Swavesey called him "Mr Bright Buttons", Miss Peters of Whittlesford "the Old General" while a fellow villager, J.W. Pryor said he had a smile and kind word for everybody adding, "I am writing this from experience as I lay for just over six months in Tipperary Ward".

G.E. Cooper of White Hart Lane Littleport asked that if his was the successful name pulled out of the hat the prize money should go to the Hospital. So did Florence Green of Saffron Walden, Gertrude Robinson of Truro House Impington and Mrs M. Gray of Derby Street who described herself as a "very grateful patient". Her daughter, Lilly commented "I saw him very often when I went to see my mummy when she was ill".

With such a response, the News decided to be generous; they quadrupled the number of five-shilling payments; two went to Lily Gray and Mrs Goldspink of the Council Houses, Fulbourn whilst the other were donated to Addenbrooke's Hospital Building Fund and the Robin Cot Fund.

The gentleman's name was William Darnell and he was the grandfather of Kathleen Collins from Cambridge who spotted a brief snippet I included in one of my 'Looking Back' columns just before Christmas. The News featured another picture of him, front view – a copy of which I have sent to Mrs Collins. [SCAN OF WILLIAM DARNELL, THE MOST POPULAR MAN IN CAMBRIDGE IN DECEMBER 1931]

SNAILWELL

Harry Bye's recent recollections of the Rev Ernest Powells at Snailwell has jogged memories for Mrs Heather Richardson of Cambridge. Her mother worked in the rectory for a number of years as a nurse to his granddaughter, Betsy, whose parents were away in India. It was a very grand life as the rectory was well-supplied with milk, eggs, butter and cream. It was there that she met her future husband when he cycled over from Burwell to be organist in Snailwell church. Heather's mother reached her 100th birthday last August and died in November. She'd kept in touch with the family and a picture of Betsy when she was presented at court was proudly displayed on her wall. She often visited her after she developed multiple sclerosis later in life and lived at the Sue Ryder Home in Ely.

Memories 17th January 2007, by Mike Petty

Joan Jackson (nee Holmes) emails from Brampton to share recollections which are echoed by other readers. They all agree my article on the Soap Company brought back some quite indelible memories.

Joan writes: "As a child I spent a great deal of my time with my grandparents, Mr and Mrs Zack Holmes who lived at 11 Staffordshire Street. Our garden ended at the wall of the soap factory". June Prime was a near neighbour whose garden also looked out on the factory.

Edmund Foulser from Cherry Hinton tells me his brother worked there; he tells of the skins that used to come by lorry and the 'juice' running from the sides. Joan vividly recalls the pungent fragrance which emanated from the soap works, and so does Barry Hobbs from Caldecote: "the appalling smell didn't go away. I presume it was the result of boiling down animal bones". It didn't however stop June playing in the old soap barrels that were stored on some waste ground.

Joan and June particularly remember the huge chimney that was supposed to remove these smells from the immediate neighbourhood. "I don't know how tall that chimney actually was, but we could see it very clearly from our back garden. There was an iron ladder which went to the very top of the chimney and every now and then a man would ascend to its summit. I was always dreading that he might fall, since he would simply crash straight to the ground & would watch him with a combination of fascination and fear", says Joan. June agrees: "I remember a man climbing up the chimney to clean it, and the day they dismantled it was something else". But when was that?

Barry adds some other details: "One morning I was on my way to school when a low-flying German aircraft came into view over East Road and began machine-gunning the Castle Soap site. When it was eventually demolished I was told that bullet holes were found in the metal chimney stack". Can anybody confirm this, he asks. Mrs J. Willis tells me her dad, Art Curry, used to be a fire-watcher for the Soap Company during the war and drove their lorry to London daily.

Joan's house was the end one of a terrace of three, and next door was a yard with stables. "But in the actual stable adjoining our house a dancing bear was kept. When lying in bed one could hear this poor animal moving up and down, his chain rubbing against our wall. It was exciting as well as frightening to see him led out and dancing in the street. This was in the 1930s". Do you remember it?

She continues: "Staffordshire Street was never one of the most salubrious streets off East Road, but there were worse! In Gas Lane there was a large rag and bone merchants' premises. My father kept rabbits, and so a nice rabbit stew or pie often formed part of our diet, and I would be despatched to Gas Lane to sell the skin! I think I was given two or three old pence. Glass jars and bottles were disposed of in the same way. The funny thing was that in those days I remember that one of my very favourite Christmas presents was a pair of fur-backed gloves - I don't suppose that I ever associated them with the rabbit skins!"

Every trade had its own specialisms; in December 1925 the News reported how Percy Wheatley a skin merchant of Staffordshire Street took two bundles of rabbit skins to a Cambridge court; one were what is known in the trade as 'fresh pulled' skins and the other 'summer rubbish'. He explained how he'd agreed to pay 4s.6d. a dozen provided they were fresh pulled off., but he found 90 per cent of the skins were 'summer rubbish'. He held up the skins for the judge's inspection, pointing out the difference and his honour agreed he'd been cheated.

But if the smell of the soap works was bad, there was worse just across the road, as Joan explains: "On the way to school (the Central School for Girls) I walked along East Road and through one of the side streets where there was a slaughterhouse. The smell was atrocious and there were vermin and flies. I was always thankful that my grandparents didn't live there. It was a rough area, and they were hard times. My five granddaughters can hardly believe the things that went on when I was young".

But in 1953 Staffordshire Street hit the headlines in a positive way when Mrs m. O'Dell was awarded a special prize of £5 for the best decorated private house in Cambridge at the Coronation. Shortly afterwards there were plans for a drastic redevelopment of the area and now there are few reminders of the bad old days.

Various researchers have appealed to Memories readers for help

Daniel Spencer is working on a television programme which will feature a vast collection of films made by the late William King that are now housed in the East Anglian Film Archive.

There are various scenes associated with Cambridge that he can identify, but there some that feature visits organised by the ‘SS Club’. This may have been connected to the Cambridge Motorists Social Services Association but he needs to know more and if possible track down the names of its members. Can you assist?

Mr King’s films were very popular in the 1950s. In March 1956 1,400 motor cycle enthusiasts attended two shows at the Guildhall. But he had been taking films long before that.

In 1956 a tattered and broken reel of film was found in a cellar at King and Harper’s garage in Bridge Street and overhauled by Mr J. Dyer, the chief projectionist at the Playhouse Cinema. It featured the firm’s depots at Hills Road, Milton Road, Thompson’s Lane and Bridge Street in about 1932 showing pedestrians wearing cloche hats, shapeless coats and furs draped round their necks while a post office telegram boy pedalled past (– whatever happened to them?).

But it was the cars that were the stars: one gentleman was shown proudly seated in the 1930’s idea of an up-to-the-minute sports model, which appeared very comical to 1950’s eyes, whilst a lady was being shown over the latest in six-seater saloons. The price ticket attached to the roof gave its price at £205 brand new!

Does anybody know what has happened to this film now – it’s not amongst those tracked down by Daniel and he’d like the opportunity of giving it a wider audience. You can contact him on 0771 4510514 or email danielspencer@curwens.wanadoo.co.uk – or through me at the News.

One man with great memories of postwar motoring is Rodney Dale of Haddenham. His father enjoyed a rich variety of vintage cars including Bentleys, Rolls-Royces and Rovers. But probably the most bizarre was a Cluley that was spotted from the top of a bus. It was on the back of a lorry at Jack Branch's yard at Waterbeach. Rodney's dad bought it for £22 10s. and restored it to full working condition. The only thing was that the first time they drove it they discovered a slight mistake; for the sporty two-seater roared away with three reverse gears, and only one forward one! Rodney will be sharing such recollections at Ely Library this Friday morning at 10.30 – if you have similar tales to tell then come along or drop me a line.

Whilst to some the roar of an engine is something musical, others find enjoyment in street musicians. Cambridge has had a tradition of these over the years – Jerry Bol and the Cambridge Buskers being the most obvious. But Sheila Mann is trying to learn something about a much earlier entertainer known as the 'Gambaloney Man'. He's mentioned in a 1931 novel entitled 'Haste to the Wedding' by Aelfleda Tillyard – but its set back in the early 1800s. Now its unlikely that even News readers remember back over 200 years – but does anybody have a copy of the book tucked away on their shelves. There doesn't seem to be one in the Cambridgeshire Collection nor at the Cambridge University Library.

Another correspondent, Neil Potter from London is also on a musical quest. When his grandfather, Harry Collins died in 1926 the CDN obituary mentioned that as well as being a lay clerk member of King's College Chapel Choir he had also been one of the earlier members of the Magpie Concert Party before the Great War. But what was this, he asks

During my plod through the back files of the News for my Looking Back column I have spotted two mentions of this ensemble. In June 1923 they enlivened the Pymoor and Oxloade annual sports, supplementing the selections played by Manea Silver Band. Then in December 1956 at the closing down of the Playhouse in Mill Road Raymond Bennett, the talented comedian and theatre manager recalled that it was there he'd made his debut as a single-turn music hall artiste. In those early days it had a small orchestra and had one artiste each week with the pictures. He added, "Many readers will recall appearance of Godwin Hunt, baritone and humorous vocalist – George Gass, comedian of the 'Magpies', a concert-party run by Godwin Hunt – and Sydney Pratt, conjuror." But can anybody add more?

Memories 31 January 2007, by Mike Petty

When Hope Skinner of West Wickham opened her copy of the News on Wednesday 17th January she found her memories sparked into life. But it was not my article that did it!

The story that she spotted was that millions of pounds were being spent transforming an historic building in Trumpington Street into a plush new Hotel du Vin with 41 bedrooms and suites, some with private gardens, as well as a bistro and champagne bar, library and private cellar dining rooms.

But Hope knew it way back during the Great War.

She writes: "I was born there in 1915. My parents moved from number 19 to 17 as they already had four children and mother was expecting twins. My father, Dr Henry Roderick, was a surgeon during the First World War – he seemed to be always delivering babies. I can remember the basement so well, the old kitchens, the old 'Donkey' - a huge range which the maids used to light with coal which the coalman used to drop through a hole in the yard. The basement was a very frightening place with two lots of stairs to it and my father would go round late at night with a hockey stick killing the cockroaches down there. I still hate cockroaches

“The garden went down to Tennis Court Road and there were stables to the left. The first was for my father’s car, the second for Dr Budd’s car and the third for Dr Wright’s car. The fourth was for ‘Duke’, the horse, the fifth for the chauffeurs, the sixth was the apple room and the seventh a woodshed.

“We lived there until 1937 when half the garden was bought by Addenbrooke’s Hospital for building, so my father sold it for £4,000. I wonder if the huge mirrors that were in the drawing room are still there?”

Denis Frucot, general manager of the new Cambridge Hotel du Vin says they have kept all the original features and restored them, including a baker’s oven which is now a focal point in one of the suites, while two wells will be glassed over as a focal point for one of the larger rooms.

In April 1923 Speaking to Cambridge Rotary Club Dr H B Roderick compared Addenbrooke’s Hospital 50 years before with then. In 1872 the average stay in hospital was 37.87 days and in 1922 to it was 27.46 days, so that with practically the same number of beds they were able to deal with a considerable number more patients, owing to the more rapid turnover due to shortened convalescence. In 1922, 2,376 operations were performed, and 2,231 in-patients and 4523 outpatients were treated. This great increase in work naturally involved increased demands both on the medical, surgical, and nursing staffs of the hospital, as well as on its financial resources. The present operating theatre was constructed in 1897 and today it was out of date. Two theatres, on modern lines, were urgently needed in order to cope with the ever-increasing work. However much things change, some things still seem to stay the same!

Addenbrooke’s Hospital used to have a convalescent home at Hunstanton – perhaps you remember it. But can anybody shed light on a picture of what appears to be a railway promotion featuring nurses outside ‘Bowtell Station’ that appeared in the News in the 1950s? [NB BE SURE TO INCLUDE THE PICTURE]

More information has come through on William Darnell, the Addenbrooke’s Hospital porter in Dr Roderick’s time. Hilary Ritchie, the Hospital’s Archivist has been trawling through their records and discovered from the salary files that in 1908 he was paid the princely weekly sum of £1.2.1 (£1.10) with board and residence. When he retired in 1936, aged 73 and with 43 years of service behind him, the committee awarded him a pension of £1.10.0 (£1.50) a week. Ann Blunt from Cambridge has emailed me a photograph of him in uniform

Whilst on medical matters, can anybody help with any information on a private nursing home for elderly clergy at Madely Court, Hemingford Grey. It was run by Ms Marguerite Selby in the 1950s. Tom Bekers is undertaking research and would be interested in any information on her charitable work in the village, especially a picture of her and the building she used. You can contact him by email at bekerstom@hotmail.com or drop me a line and I’ll put you in touch

David Messier also seeks your help. He emails: “Going through old letters I put away long ago, I found one from a relative in England in 1952 who said that his son was attending a day school in Cambridge called Shrewsbury. I do not know more than that. Now, almost 60 years later, I have searched for the school over the internet and made numerous inquiries, but I have found no trace of it.” Can you assist. You can email him at dmessier2004@yahoo.com or drop me a line.

Memories 7th February 2007, by Mike Petty

Cambridge’s George IV Street was part of the New Town that grew up on the west side of Hills Road following the enclosure of the Barnwell open fields in 1807. It is just off Coronation Street and joined by Queen Street to Prince’s Street. The names have strong Royalist connection but need to be put in the context of the time

Before his accession George had been Prince Regent during the madness of his father, George III. He’d married Caroline of Brunswick in 1785 but their relationship was not an easy one: he accused her of adultery and left her for a Mrs Fitzherbert who he’d secretly married ten years earlier. When he succeeded to the throne in 1820 he tried to prevent Caroline from attending his Coronation at Westminster Abbey. Many Cambridge people believed ‘Queen’ Caroline had been badly treated and there were town and gown riots on Market Hill with 250 special constables sworn in to try and keep the peace. Although the University voted a loyal address they also voiced their detestation of infidelity.

The fascinating history of the development of New Town has been told by Peter Bryan and Nick Wise in the Cambridge Antiquarian Society Proceedings for 2005. Now some most interesting photographs of the area taken in the late 1950s by architectural historian, the late Tony Baggs, have been passed to me. His picture of George IV Street itself shows a number of children; can you identify them or do remember the properties in Coronation Street with St Paul’s church at the end. [SCAN OF GEORGE IV STREET AND CORONATION STREET BY TONY BAGGS]

Nigel Brown has emailed me a copy of another picture of a Cambridge street scene. Having studied it and checked copies of Cambridge Street Directories I am pretty sure it shows shops on the Cherry Hinton Road in Cambridge, between Rathmore Road and Rock Road. The 1904 Spaldings Directory lists E & C Stallan, milliners and drapers, but not Jennings whereas the 1913 Spaldings Directory lists H.E. Jennings, fishmonger, but not Stallan. Somewhere in between the two were doubtless side by side. But what was the event? Nigel thinks it may have been a non-conformist children’s procession. Does it mean anything to you? [SCAN OF PROCESSION IN CHERRY HINTON ROAD]

David Messier also seeks your help. He emails: “Going through old letters I put away long ago, I found one from a relative in England in 1952 who said that his son was attending a day school in Cambridge called Shrewsbury. I do not know more than that. Now, almost 60 years later, I have searched for the school over the internet and made numerous inquiries, but I have found no trace of it.” Can you assist. You can email him at dmessier2004@yahoo.com or drop me a line.

George Ginn from Soham has a problem too. For many months he was a regular sight in the Cambridgeshire Collection at the Central Library, Lion Yard, where he has been plodding through back issues of the ‘Cambridge Chronicle’ newspaper, carefully copying down every reference to events in Soham in the early years of the twentieth century.

His labours have now been crowned by the publication of a booklet entitled ‘Soham Chronicle 1899-1907’ with transcripts of the everyday events, anniversaries, obituaries, marriages and accidents that were reported throughout that period. Some issues seem familiar: we’ve heard of mad cows but in October 1904 Soham had two mad bullocks. George notes: “As two bullocks, the property of Mr. Boyce of Soham, were being loaded at Soham station, one suddenly displayed symptoms of madness and escaped, rushing through Clay Street and Fordham Road where it got into the fields. A great many attempts were made to capture the animal by driving a herd of stock around it, but the tactics failed. It was ultimately shot.”

So now George knows a lot about Soham – but the mystery remains. Just who was it that originally wrote the reports that appeared in the paper. It may have been a gentleman named A. Edmunds who apparently played the cello and was secretary to the Choral and Horticultural Societies – but can anybody add further details. If so can you contact George Ginn at 7 King’s Parade, Soham. His book is available from Soham Bookshop at £3.95 or by post (50p extra) from the compiler.

Memories 14th February 2007, by Mike Petty

Last week David Messier sought assistance. He had been sorting through some letters from the 1950s one of which mentioned the ‘Shrewsbury’ school in Cambridge. Now various readers have written to suggest that this is probably a misreading of the former Shrubbery School.

Mike Dawson emails: “Having lived in Cambridge all my life, and, indeed being in the same class at the County (now Hills Road 6th Form College) as a lad called Eric Wainwright, whose father was Headmaster at the Shrubbery, I know a little about it. It was, as far as I can remember, an Independent Day-school, with lessons, of course, on Saturday mornings. I am not sure now after all these years of the average roll in the School, or indeed the precise age group it catered for, but as Eric's secondary Education took place at the County, I can only assume it catered for pupils of primary school age.”

Jean Cox recalls that the pupils wore a grey uniform while Geoff Leyshon says it was situated on the Barton Road near the Hat and Feathers pub in a three-four storey red brick building

Writing in 1963, Erica Dimock traced the school’s history. It had been founded in a private house on the Barton Road in the 1860s moving some years later to Hills Road where its Kindergarten and Junior departments were then still based. In 1942 the Rev and Mrs Living-Taylor took over the school from the late Mrs Fulton who had been Principal for about eight years and at this time there were some 60 pupils on the register.

Numbers rapidly increased and, wishing to expand the Senior Department, the Rev Living-Taylor moved into the Zion Baptist Chapel on East Road where the hall and several rooms were made available for use. In 1947 due to a further increase in pupils it moved again, this time to 32 Barton Road.

The school was co-educational. Pupils in the Junior Department were prepared for the Secondary Schools Entrance Examination while fifth-year pupils were expected to take the Oxford and Cambridge General Certificate of Education 'O' level examinations, for which the school was a recognised centre. Several fourth-year pupils took an entrance examination for full-time preliminary courses available at the Cambridgeshire College of Arts and Technology.

The Shrubbery then had a flourishing parent-teacher association which had recently provided a prefabricated assembly hall, a science laboratory and various pieces of scientific equipment for the senior school together with a radio, record player and stage at the Junior. In 1962 Mrs and Mrs Wainwright took over as Principals, both having been on the staff for a number of years.

In 1984 Shrubbery School closed its door to senior pupils due to falling numbers. But were you one of its pupils and what do you remember about it [SCAN OF GIRLS HOCKEY TEAM 1920S; SCAN OF CUTTING AUGUST 1963 – IS THERE A PRINT IN THE NEWS LIBRARY, BARTON ROAD FOLDER]

Last week's picture of Coronation Street brought back memories for Jim Langford of Cambridge. He was born there in 1921, baptised at St Paul's church, attended the Institute across the road, threw fireworks in the reading room and was one of Miss Chandler's pupils at St Paul's School in Russell Street. Doud Driver tells me his great-grandfather owned no.28 Coronation Street which was a baker's shop run by the family along with 1-8 Drivers Court and nos.21 and 23 Russell Street. [SCAN OF ST PAUL'S SCHOOL 1975]

Bob Chapman and Mike Smith email to say the George IV Street photograph shows Wills & Thompson's garage. It was built, probably in the 1930s by four friends Wills, Thompson, Thorogood and Toppham. It was run by Messrs Wills & Thompson with the other two as sleeping partners until just before the war then they retired and Thorogood, & Toppham took over. During the war it was taken over by the military as a garage. Afterwards it reverted to the ownership of Thorogood & Toppham until sold to Camtax in the mid 50s.

Bob adds: "Albert Thorogood was my granddad and I spent a lot of Saturday mornings in the garage with him. One of the things he did was to charge accumulators; they had this large machine in the corner with what looked like dozens of wires coming out to accumulators and batteries. Opposite on the corner of Union Road was a blacksmith shop run by William (Bill) Chapman. In one of the houses shown on your photo lived a family who had a bakery on the opposite side of the road. They made muffins and crumpets which they took around the area on trays on their heads and ringing a bell"

This may have been Mr Albert Craske, do you remember him? [SCAN OF A CAMBRIDGE MUFFIN MAN – NOT MR CRASKE]

Memories 21st February 2007 by Mike Petty

Albert Northfield of Cambridge has been quick to respond to my mention of the Cambridge muffin man of Coronation Street. He writes: "I was one of the family that lived at 17 Coronation Street, the one you showed in your photograph. I was born in this house in 1926 and lived there for 25 years until I got married. I too went to St Paul's School with Miss Chandler as headmistress so all the comments brought back lots of memories of that area. Mr Albert Craske, was my grandfather who had the muffin and crumpet bakery opposite”.

Albert was featured in the News back in November 1980; then Mrs Clare Driver, one of his daughters, recalled how the muffin trade was seasonal, from October to Easter. In the summer her dad who was also a talented signwriter, would work as a painter. He was also a lay preacher at the Emmanuel Road Congregational Church, a prize-winning amateur gardener and won a medal for his singing.

He'd been an apprentice to a plumber before the Great War but served as a cook. Afterwards he thought he would like to set up on his own in a small way but was soon delivering muffins to places as far afield as March and Chatteris, travelling by train. [SCAN OF MARCH RAILWAY STATION 1920s]. Later the bakery employed three or four salesmen. Clare's mother worked there helping to produce muffins and crumpets which at one time were supplied to all the Cambridge colleges as well as several cake shops. After Albert died his wife kept on the business for some years. But it was hard work; muffins were made of a dough, crumpets from batter, they were all mixed by hand which meant a very early start to the day – they had to be up at four in the morning to beat the mixture.

Another reader who shared her memories in 1980 was Mrs D. Kitching who lived in Union Road as a girl. She recalled: “I remember a well-scrubbed bench where the muffins were laid out, and the lovely baking smell of the place.” If he'd sold out then she might go on to Mr Quelch's bakery; he was a very kind person to children who baked her a bread doll with current eyes and mouth and plaited hair for a birthday treat.

D. Harnett from Cottenham has asked whether I'd feature pictures of the Fitzroy Street area fondly remembered as a wonderful area to have lived in with lovely shopkeepers contributing to a feeling that it was all one big family. I have one taken by the late Tony Baggs of a shop on the corner of Severn Place in the 1950s or early '60s showing a white cat that sat at the door welcoming customers – but did you shop there, or who kept it? How many Wanderers were there, wonders John Green who's been researching the early days of cycling. He has two pictures, one captioned the Wanderers Bicycle Club 1900, the other “WCC 1898”. Were they the same thing? I can help a little; the earlier picture has a list of names, one of which is G. Edwards. In a report of the seventh annual dinner of the Cambridge Wanderers Cycle in December 1897 he is mentioned as being the club Captain.

In his address he conceded that not all cyclists were angels. There were men who went tearing about, whistling down the street, ringing their bells and expecting to have the whole road cleared for them. They should be prosecuted. [SCAN OF CARTOON OF SPEEDING UNDERGRADUATE ON BIKE]. But there was another class who went for a ride in the country and had a sort of liking for riding on the path. Now it was right that such a terrible practice should be cracked down on – and had the Chief Constable put a policeman in the road in proper uniform no one would have complained. But he had to go and put a man in plain clothes to capture cyclists. Mr Edwards was sure that the Chief deserved a rise in his salary for such a clever initiative! He brought the matter to the notice of the Mayor of Cambridge, Horace Darwin – who also happened to be the President of their club. Horace regretted that civic duties had prevented him joining in their wanderings recently. But, like a modern politician, he'd had used his bicycle to travel around town in all weathers. Some ideas just go round and round.

I also have another picture of what I believe to be the Wanderers taken on one of their outings on Good Friday 1902. This time they seem to have been out in strength, swamping any plain-clothed police surveillance

The People's Friend is not on my regular reading list, but I've had a letter from John Price of West Sussex who has seen a recent review they published of my book 'Vanishing Cambridgeshire', based on the photographic survey by the Cambridge Antiquarian Society.

However it was not the pictures that caught his eye; it was the mention of the game of bat and trap that was played by publicans on Parker's Piece on Good Friday and Easter Monday. John says that this is still played in a number of pubs in Kent. At present there is a considerable interest being shown by the American Baseball League in tracing the origins of their sport, which they believe originated from stoolball, rounders and bat and trap. A party, including a cameraman, are visiting England in mid June and would like to learn more about any of these sports.

Enid Porter in her wonderful 'Cambridgeshire Customs and Folklore' book noted that until 1910 the regulars of public houses within easy reach of Midsummer Common used to play Bat and Trap on Easter Monday near the lock-keepers house by Jesus Green Bridge. Barrels of beer were taken down to refresh the players. It was also a popular amusement at Sunday School treats.

The Folk Museum had a bat and trap set in its original box, dated 1860 together with hand-made traps. It consisted of a solid wooden shoe, six to seven inches long, in a central groove of which was inserted a spoon-shaped wooden trigger mounted on a pivot and with the handle extending over the toe of the shoe. The bat was a small cricket bat, about 14 inches long and flat on both sides, the ball could be any small hard one.

Any numbers of persons could play the game. The trap was placed on the ground and two boundary lines were fixed to mark the area into which the ball had to fall after it had been struck. The first player then placed the ball on the 'bowl' of the spoon-shaped trigger, hit the handle sharply with the bat and then struck the ball, as it rose, towards the boundaries. The rest of the players tried then either to catch the ball in flight or retrieve it from the ground, the one who got hold of it throwing it back towards the trap from the spot where he had caught or picked it up. The striker was 'out' and gave way to the next player if the ball was (a) caught; (b) did not fall within the boundary lines; (c) was not hit as it rose from the trap; (d) hit the trap when it was thrown back. The striker's aim was to keep 'in' until he had scored twenty hits or any other number previously agreed upon. Can you add anything to the story of this almost-forgotten game? [SCAN OF BAT AND TRAP IN FOLK MUSEUM]

But what of baseball? I know there was a game played at Fenners on 4th July 1918, the first time it had been played on the famous cricket pitch. 'To the uninitiated onlooker baseball appears to be a glorified style of rounders... but the participants and their supporters get wildly excited', the Cambridge Chronicle commented. Then in July 1954 the News reported that real American softball came to Cambridge City Football Club ground when the US Air Force Hospital Wimpole Park beat a team from USAF Molesworth. For British spectators the game was a succession of shocks. They saw an umpire hustled and pushed by players disputing a decision, two players somersaulting as they tried to catch a ball and some magnificent hits and catches that made it look like cricket. There was 'strike one', 'ball one',

‘blunt’ and a host of other expressions which were difficult to explain but easy to follow on the diamond-shaped field before the victorious team had notched up their win and were cheered again and again. John Carter took photographs of the event: were you amongst the youngsters who watched the action? [SCAN OF BASEBALL MATCH 1918 AND 1954]

Heather Squires from Cherry Hinton writes with her memories of muffin men: “My dear late husband, Thomas Squires, was the grandson of Mr Albert Squires of 27 Coronation Street. He and his wife Harriet had a small bakery at the back of the property where the muffins and crumpets were baked. Albert was given patronage by the late Prince of Wales who became Edward VII. Apparently he had sampled some of these muffins on a visit to Cambridge, liked them so much that, when he came racing, Albert sent a supply to Newmarket by bicycle! Harriet was on call to anyone in trouble, the dying, those in labour at child birth, the sick - people used to come and knock the door at all hours of the day or night asking for her help. Thomas often went with her - he remembered as a very small boy walking down Brooklands Avenue very late at night and being scared of the big trees! He attended boxing lessons for boys run at St Paul’s Institute a young man with a very Dutch/South African name - something like Fontenblaumb - does anyone else remember him, Heather asks. [SCAN OF GIANT TREES IN BROOKLANDS AVENUE c1905]

More memories of the Shrubbery School have come from Penny Duce who attended between 1956 and 1964 while Joan Carter was there at the end of the war when it moved to the Zion Baptist Chapel on East Road. She recalls that the girls’ uniform in those days was grey skirt & blazer, white blouse, red and white striped tie and grey hat in winter. Then the clothing coupons had to be saved for the summer outfit of a red and white checked dress and straw hat.

Memories, 7th March 2007, by Mike Petty

Girton has a football club with a impressive past. Fifty years ago the club could boast of winning five trophies in a single season including the Cambridge Daily News Sports Review Merit Shield. Their success was down to the floodlights they’d erected for training during the winter nights and the inspiration of F.C. Barrett, their president. The club has always prided themselves on their local players. Of these the most famous was Vic Watson who was born in the village in 1897. He was spotted by West Ham United when playing for Wellingborough in 1920, signed on for a fee of £50 and scored three goals for his new club in the first match. He went on to become their all-time champion goalscorer and played in the first Wembley Cup Final when an estimated 200,000 good-humoured spectators invaded the pitch which was eventually cleared with the help of a policeman on a white horse. He is still honoured on the Club’s website: “Vic....think most of us agree that we could do with you right now”, writes on fan concerned about their current difficulties.

Vic Watson also gained international honours, playing for England on seven occasions. After retiring in 1936 he returned to Girton where he became a market gardener and lived to be over 90 years of age. Now Girton United are planning for their centenary with a celebration dinner in April and a gala day in June. They would like to make contact with anybody who played or was connected with the club. You can email Barry.Arliss@ntlworld.com or ring Paul Crane on Cambridge 715720. [SCAN OF GIRTON FOOTBALLERS c1910 – WERE THESE VIC’S HEROES? My recent mention a Cambridge smell has reunited two old friends from across the world. Don Halls from Palm Springs California emailed “It was with great interest that I read Joan Collins’ memories of the Castle Soap Works at the foot of Young Street. I attended New Street School as a child and well remember that awful smell, I also remember them tearing down the original brick chimney and erecting the metal chimney she speaks of. My uncle Harvey Halls kept the Wheelwrights Arms on East road and the dancing bear she speaks of was kept in his stables". I have put him in contact with Joan who emails: "I am so glad to have made contact with Don. We are the same age and went to the same primary school in Cambridge, the Morley Memorial. We also have slight family links through an uncle of his".

Gladys Clements from Girton has emailed to say she remembers the Fitzroy Street bakers shop that I featured in Memories on 21st February. It was owned by her great uncle and aunt: James and Florence Stokes; the living quarters were behind the shop and farther back was the bakery which also had an entrance from Severne Place. Next door to the bakery lived her great aunt Amy who never married, and besides her lived Gladys' maternal grandmother, Emma Edwards. On the corner of Fitzroy Street and East Road was a coffee shop owned by her great uncle and aunt, George and Annie Stokes. It was mainly used by working, or unemployed, men, who were allowed to spend hours, or even all day, in the warmth of the shop over one cup of coffee.

Daniel Spencer of Fragment Films is still preparing his 'The Way We Were' television programme on King and Harper. He is now searching for anybody who attended their company sports days. If you can help then please contact him on 0771 4510514

Can anybody help with paintings by an artist of the Edwardian era called William Matthison. William attended Birmingham School of Art before turning professional in 1875 & made his reputation as a painter of rustic and coastal subjects. His career blossomed after he was commissioned to paint views that could be reproduced as postcards to meet the booming demand at the turn of the century. He also turned his attention to Cambridge; in May 1907 over 60 of his works were exhibited at Heffer's shop in Petty Cury. They were amongst those chosen to illustrate a book on Cambridge by one of the early Newnham College students, Mildred Toker. One of the paintings of the Bridge of Sighs was sold before the exhibition opened and the pictures proved so popular that the publishers, Black, later reissued some of them in a separate booklet. As well as views of the great colleges are illustrations of Peas Hill, St Edwards Passage, Madingley windmill and Magdalene Bridge showing the Nancy, a steam tug that made regular trips from Kings Lynn. But what has happened to the original paintings – do you have one on your wall. If so then publisher John Button of Stroud would love to hear from you. You can email john@bookcraft.co.uk, or contact me and I'll put you in touch. [SCAN OF PEAS HILL OR MAGDALENE BRIDGE]

Memories 14th March 2007, by Mike Petty

Kate Turner from Swaffham Bulbeck has been transcribing some of her late husband, Frank's recollections of his days working with animals. Frank wrote:

"I was born on the 4th of September 1918 at Great Shelford, the third child of Harold and Emily Turner. Dad worked for Arthur Grain, the founder of the firm of auctioneers and estate agents. He was a groom looking after a stable of horses as his governor was a keen hunting man. Dad also ran a small farm of about sixty acres for the Grain family. "There were eight milking cows, calves and young cattle, a few sows and small pigs. His days were indeed long and busy, the work being very hard. From being a small boy, any spare time I had after school was spent around the farm and it was here that I discovered my abiding love of animals - especially horses.

"The work of this small farm was done using two horses and a mule. Consignments of mules from the army used to be sent to the firm to be auctioned. On Mondays it was the general rule that Dad and his brother Ralph attended the Cambridge cattle market to help Mr Grain with the cattle, pigs and sheep. Once a month a special horse sale was held and it was my father's job to braid the horses' tails for the vendors who wished their beasts to be well turned out. As each horse came up for sale, it was run up and down by dad so that the prospective buyers could get a good idea of its action and how lively it was.

“After the cattle auctions finished, my dad and his brother would set off with the mule harnessed to a float (a sort of cross between a cart and a horse trap) filled with sheep and pigs which had been bought and had to be delivered to the new owners. To stop them escaping they were covered with a thick cord net. Running behind would be as many as a dozen fat cattle. All the livestock were to be delivered to several butchers in the surrounding villages as there were no abattoirs then! A good dog was a necessity to keep the following beasts in line and dad had several in his time, most of them Collies.

“The first "drop off" was at Cherry Hinton and then over Lime Kiln Hill to Shelford Bottom, on to Babraham and then Duxford to Great Shelford and home, late and very tired. On one occasion they had great excitement as they were going over Lime Kiln Hill. A young steer broke away from its fellows, jumped blindly in panic and ended up falling down the pit where now there is a caravan site. Thinking it would be dead, my father and uncle took the mule and float down into the pit in order to load the carcass onto it.

“As they approached the beast, to their amazement it came back to life and bolted in the direction of Cherry Hinton. A dear old lady, whose house was in the High Street, had her front door open and the demented animal rushed into her home, scattering tables and chairs, crockery and fire irons in all directions. It barged out again, but not before leaving its calling card. Eventually it was cornered in a farm yard. A vet was sent for and the creature was put down. This episode was unusual but things sometimes went wrong and animals escaped. The auctioneers were not best pleased; compensation had to be paid! Nor was my mother very happy. My father got home so late that night that his meal was completely spoiled!”

The people of Swaffham Bulbeck were incensed in March 1957 when one of their local landmarks disappeared. In a letter to the News ‘Aquarius’, later identified as Bernard Gill, wrote: “Sir - For the past one hundred years Swaffham Prior has had a fountain of pleasing and unusual design. It was circular, built of brick and crowned with a steeply pitched conical roof. Generations used it for the refreshment of men and beasts. Sheep-dogs lapped up water, wayfarers stopped to admire it. But a few days ago, with no warning, it was demolished and the materials carted away. Who is responsible for this vandalism?

The matter was aired at a packed meeting in the village when it was explained that the fountain had been erected about 1874 by the late Squire Allix to water animals using the road. The water was drawn from his own private reservoir until this was discontinued with the coming of mains water. He approached the District Council to take on the supply, but they refused. The fountain had become dangerous, neither the county council nor the Cambridge Preservation Society showed any interest, so it had been pulled down.

But some considered it ‘one of the finest pieces of Victorian architecture that should have been preserved for all time’. If so why had the parish council not taken action, and why had the villagers themselves not ensured that the hole in the roof had been repaired. And hadn’t they contributed to its neglect by seeing their children scrawling their sweetheart’s names on the walls ... It was too late except to do anything but lament its loss. The News cartoonist, Lewis Todd, gave his slant on the story, but do you have a snap or memory of it?

Memories 21st March 2007, by Mike Petty

Recently proposals have been aired to set up holding cells in shopping malls and supermarkets where pickpockets, shoplifters and others could be incarcerated for up to four hours before transportation out to police stations.

We used to have something similar in various Cambridgeshire villages where offenders would be held before being taken to court. The most prominent surviving one is at Litlington - a brick-built building with a barred door on the green. It was last used in the 1840s when the prisoner set fire to the hay provided for his bedding. [SCAN OF LITLINGTON LOCK UP 1923]

There was a similar lock up at Wilburton, as Albert Pell recorded: Their village cage was a square, brick building, small, and arched over with brick at the top. The door was narrow but stout, adorned with auctioneers' and other posters. He recalled one incident when a delinquent was apprehended, forced into the cage and locked in. A few children loitered about the door, indicating that the cage had a tenant. Then they ran home with the message "He's been a-thumping on the door and a-swearing and says he's not a-going to be kept in any longer - you can hear him 'scratting' like a rabbit". A crowd gathered to watch the jail break and were rewarded by the sight of two hands emerging from under the foundations; after a while a head, then bare shoulders followed and when hips followed that the onlookers ran off, only then sending for the constable. But he had gone off to milk his cow in some distant field and the village was left to the mercy of the former inmate who threatened vengeance if somebody did not bring him his jerkin - which was of course still securely locked up.

There are other tales of village lock-ups, such as at Soham when one inmate badly wanted his pipe. So his mate drilled a hole through the wooden door and inserted one of the long-stemmed churchwarden's pipes; the prisoner sat inside contentedly puffing away while his friends kept the bowl well-filled. At Melbourn a drunken offender's wife turned up early in the morning with a jug of hot tea which he drank a saucerful at a time pushed between the iron bars of the cell window. Refreshed, he was taken before the magistrates, convicted and went to the taproom of the Rose Inn to drown his sorrows - only to find himself in the cage again that night. The lock-up was demolished in 1847 and the materials used to build a fire engine house in Station Road.

At Stretham the Cage made way for a Mission Hall, itself now just a memory - but at least its name lives on in the lane alongside. Duxford lockup stood on the village green. During the Great War the village lamps were taken down and stored there for safe keeping, but the door was left unlocked and the lamps broken. Then the roof fell in, leaving just the four old flint walls standing derelict, with old tins and rubbish scattered inside and out. It was an eyesore and ought to be demolished, people felt in 1935. But what happened to it?

Another form of temporary imprisonment were the stocks such as those still to be seen on the green at Meldreth. Villagers say they were last used in 1856 when a parishioner became unruly and started shouting in church. Back in 1936 a motor coach containing sightseers on their way from London to Cambridge left the main road at Melbourn to see them. Some of the natives found very interesting the story the party's guide had to tell the visitors. He said the last legitimate occupant of the stocks was a drunken man in the year 1864 and told the old yarn of how the stockinged man's pals, hearing of his predicament, took him some beer, also some beer for themselves, and sat with him for company. When the village constable arrived to set the man free he was even more tipsy than before, and all his companions had qualified for the stocks! But what the guide did not tell the visitors – as old inhabitants were prone to relate – was that the day was a wet one and that the revellers borrowed a tarpaulin and pole and built a tent over the stocks to keep the man and themselves dry. Meldreth's ancient stocks, were damaged when struck by a car in July 1980 and left lying in pieces, but have been repaired. Will they form the model for the future? Memories 28th March 2007 by Mike Petty

Last weeks Memories had hardly hit the doormats before I had a phone call from Michael Waggett of Milton who'd spotted a mistake.

He pointed out that one of the pictures captioned as Meldreth stocks showed Melbourn church in the background. Melbourn did have stocks in the old days, they stood beside the cage on the village green and were used for vagrants, shopkeepers who gave short weight and landlords who sold more water than ale – as well as those who drank too much. But the cage had been demolished in 1847 and however hard I sought I could find no other picture of the stocks.

The more I studied the more something did not seem right. So I emailed a copy of the photograph to Colin Limming of the Melbourn Local History Society, publisher of a wonderful book of old photographs of that village.

He has replied: "There is an old saying 'the camera cannot lie'. Sadly, and probably for many years, this has not been true! The picture is of Meldreth stocks but superimposed on a Melbourn view. If you look carefully you will see that it was taken from outside what is now the Co-op stores and there could never have been a tree there. There is a tree by Meldreth stocks so you partially got it right calling it Meldreth stocks.

"It was probably the work of Percy Salmon who was a Melbourn man and a very accomplished photographer who mocked up the picture for his own amusement. Sorry for the confusion but blame Percy and I am sure the picture has fooled a great many other people"

And all this on the week leading up to April 1st!

So what do we know of the mischievous photographer

Percy R Salmon was a photographic prodigy. The son of a Cambridge policeman he started photography as a hobby as a lad of 12 and in 1891 won the Cambridge Camera club cup for the best set of five photographs taken in and around the town.

Later he studied in Paris and went on to travel the world with his camera, meeting Kings, Queens, Emperors and Statesmen and contributing to nearly all the English and American newspapers and magazines. He used his camera so skilfully and artistically that in all he won 16 medals for photographic studies mainly scenes of country life. He also maintained his contact with his home town through a series of articles in the Cambridge Daily News which recorded his journeys abroad.

Percy received many awards including a Fellowship of the Royal Photographic Society in 1898. They elected him an Honorary Member in 1947, 20 years after he had retired to live in Melbourn. There his journalist skills continued to be exercised as village correspondent for the "Cambridge Independent Press" and "Royston Crow". His pathos and humour, and his faithful recording of village happenings, caused his weekly column to be looked upon as a leading feature with readers.

His interest in photography continued. He was a contributor to the Cambridge Antiquarian Society's 'Cambridgeshire Photographic Record' and gave many lantern lectures illustrated by his views. Years later I discovered dozens of his glass slides in the basement of Botolph House, headquarters of the Workers' Educational Association who deposited them in the Cambridgeshire Collection

Percy Salmon died in August 1959 at the age of 87 but the importance of his photographs continue to grow as the years pass, and his skill in the darkroom 70 years ago managed to fool me – but not eagle-eyed Mr Waggett.

Do you have examples of faked photographs from the days before digital technology?

Anne Page is researching the history of Christ's Pieces. She knows the land was owned by Jesus College who sold it to the Borough Council in 1888, with a restrictive covenant that it should be kept for ever as a public space. What she cannot find is any information about the planting of the trees, or early photographs showing it as a public park.

Ena Mitchell was a passionate defender of Cambridge's commons and open spaces who produced two detailed summaries of stories relating to Parker's Piece and four Cambridge commons. Sadly she did not publish her notes on Christ's Pieces but I have searched my own files for various snippets that Anne might consider as she continues her research. Perhaps you can add to them

For years there was a bandstand with an interesting story. It had been constructed for the Royal Show held on Midsummer Common in 1894, then moved a few hundred yards to Christ's Pieces where it became the centre for much entertainment. Robert Austin remembered in 1956 how he had performed there as band boy, bandsman and conductor for over 45 years. He recalled the various local bands that had competed for public acclaim including the Volunteers Band forerunner of the Territorials, the bands of the Cambridge University Rifle Volunteers, Borough Police and the Cambridge Town Band, between all of whom there was intense rivalry.

In the early days the bandstand was illuminated by naked gas jets that usually blew out and had to be relit several times during a performance. There was no enclosure of any kind and often a noisy crowd of shouting children and young hooligans would mingle right up to the edge of the enclosure leaving the audience well on the outskirts. "It is high time that the foul-mouthed youths of the town received a caution, for there is a 'riff-raff' element among the youthful residents whose speeches could only be reported in an expurgated edition. Last Sunday evening was heard language from youngsters not in their teens that would have materially enriched the vocabulary of a London cabby. There is an undoubted feeling among hobbledahoys of the rougher grade that the utterance of profane speeches stamps them with the seal of manhood” a correspondent to the News complained in August 1897 in sentiments that continue to be echoed by each generation.

Popular concerts were very well supported: in 1910 a series attracted an average audience of 740 people which made a substantial profit, even at only one penny admission. More serious music by contrast traditionally fared badly and the following year an attempt to promote a series of symphony concerts featuring such names as Henry Wood Edward Elgar and Thomas Beecham flopped badly. The largest audience attracted to the bandstand was in the late 1930s when the Cambridge Band, an amalgamation of the Town and Albion Bands, performed there only a few hours after being “on the air” at Broadcasting House in London. It continued to be used during the Second World War with an underground shelter constructed in case of air raids; it was here that a suspected German spy was found shot dead in April of 1941.

However in April 1956 the bandstand was removed and no longer would its festoon of coloured lights compete with a lavish decoration of flowers to see which could out-rival the sunset whilst the band played at Cambridge's favourite outdoor venue.

But there have various other suggestions for the use of the Pieces. In 1903 M.A. Hyman felt it would be an ideal site for public baths: “ Vast number of undergraduates are at present unable to obtain the very necessary hot bath, as only a small proportion of licensed lodgings have fixed baths with hot water supply and few of the colleges are sufficiently equipped in this respect for those in residence. Country people of both sexes would also make use of the baths in the daytime”, he wrote.

Part of the ground was taken for a bowls green which opened in 1911 though plans drawn up by the Cambridge Sidewalk Surfers for a skate park on the site of the old bandstand in 1977 met with less support. It would have cost less than £1,500 and charge 10p a session - just high enough to make a profit but no so expensive as to keep people away.

But the biggest battles have come over plans to cut down trees for a car park and bus station in Drummer Street which were aired in 1925 and 1978, plans to drive an Inner Relief Road across it in the 1950s and an underground car park in the 1960s. Who knows what the future may bring, but what are your memories of its past.

This week one hundred house historians are touring Cambridgeshire visiting some of the most interesting examples of Vernacular Architecture, those houses which are typical of the area. They range from grand half-timbered buildings to cosy cottages whose brick Victorian skin conceals a much older structure.

Ena Wesley of Grantchester has personal experience of a childhood in one such old house, sadly not on the itinerary. She recalls:

“Merton Cottage at Grantchester, or Chapel House as it is now called, was originally a large farmhouse. Every room seemed to have its own roof, some tiled, some slated. It had at sometime been divided into two dwellings, simply by locking two doors! We lived in half of this house, which when it was all one contained five bedrooms, an ante room, a box room, a long passageway, a separate toilet and a dovecote upstairs. There were two staircases, an entrance hall, four living rooms, a dairy-cum-larder and a small passageway downstairs where most of the windows still had wooden shutters on them.

The first entrance door led into the main hall with its little carved wooden heads over the doors and a spooky little cupboard under the stairs. In those days a lectern, with a lamp over it, stood in the hall, a reminder that bible readings for the people of the village once took place there every week.

The second entrance door was a heavy solid oak one with handmade nails, bolts and latch. This led into a smaller passage with three doors leading off of it, all with lovely brass knobs. One of them, in our time a locked door connecting to the other part of the house, one into our living room and the third into the larder which ran the full length of the house.

The larder, (which had been a dairy), had great meat hooks on the beams from which the farmers had hung their hams and sides of bacon. The walls in here were made of clay bats and clunch, so entry by mice and the occasional rat was easy and often, and trails of young ivy grew through too! The whole room was kept cool with a brick floor, stone shelves and two lead pipes running the full length of the room. The wind used to whistle through these pipes with eerie sounds, especially in the winter.

Our living room, with its low beams and crooked doors, housed an old 'Kitchener' range. Fuelled by coal it had an oven on one side and a water boiler, (cracked in our time), on the other. Above it was a rack for warming plates or airing the washing. It must have been a splendid affair when new with its brass taps and fender. Black beetles, spiders and once even a cricket, lived behind this range, but what delicious meals mother used to cook on it. On the other side of this room was a built-in wooden dresser. Everything was kept in here, toys and books, polish and dusters, old shoes, pegs, papers, the lot. At the other end we kept all our food!

There were three fireplaces in the scullery, one an old bread oven with a firebox underneath, one an open fire with a 'spit and jack' over it and the other one the copperhole. It was so lovely and warm on a Monday if they were all alight, probably the only time we were warm in winter!

There was a tiny window halfway up our winding staircase where we would look out and watch the people in Chapel singing hymns. Our 'best room' was upstairs, decorated with rose wallpaper and what would have been fashionable again today: green, bobble trimmed, velvet curtains hanging from a mahogany pole at the sash cord window. The box room, that originally used to be the dovecote, led off to the right of this room. Down two steps and you were into mum's bedroom with its squeaky uneven floor and the ceiling all cracked. At the far end was a defunct loo, broken before our time but it must have been a grand affair when it was new. It had a wall-to-wall mahogany seat and a blue and white china flowered bowl, a pump to one side and a lead water tank above. Every bedroom had louvered panels over the doors and a cast iron fireplace. What bliss to have alight when we were not well, we never gave a thought to mum having to carry all that coal and ashes up and down the stairs. Among the many signs of better times were the remains of an old bell system, with wires going to every room.

Ena's description brings the house to life, something the house historians will be doing for themselves as they visit other properties in the next few days

Memories 18th April 2007, by Mike Petty

One of the most famous names in Cambridge retailing is Peak's. There were shops in King Street and Fitzroy Street but although they carried the same name above the door they were rivals, competing for the same customers. Relations between them were not always cordial: in October 1955 their arguments spilled over into the High Court after a customer ordered a refrigerator from one shop and paid for it in the other.

Recently Keith Peak, from Impington, has sent me his memories of a lifetime in the furnishing trade.

He describes how after a very unhappy time in business with his brother, H.W. Peak, Mr. Frederick George Peak decided to strike out into business on his own account. Plans were made very quietly, carefully and thoroughly and the left hand hardly knew what the right hand was doing. The prolonged search for premises came to a head early in 1936 when a shop at number 1 Fitzroy Street became available after the two former tenants, in grocery and ladies fashion, had gone bust.

After carefully checking the potential customer flow and noting the close proximity of New Square car park, Mr. Peak decided to lease these premises. The shop opened in March 1936 as Peak's Furnishers selling furniture, upholstery and bedding. In those early days it was possible to furnish a house completely for £100. A dining-room suite could be purchased for about £7.10s (7.50), stair carpet for 4.11d (25p) a yard, and linoleum for 1.9d (9p) a sq. yd.

As an opening offer to attract customers an easy chair was given away with every order of £10 or more. Special exhibitions were held in the Cosmopolitan Hall in Market Passage and the Old Post Office in Petty Cury. At one of these shows a three piece suite was available for £2.10s and twenty-two were sold. These exhibitions and vans, which were highly decorated, did a great deal in putting the company on the map.

Extra units were subsequently leased and exchanged until eventually there was one large shop on the corner of Fitzroy Street. It had an excellent frontage with large windows for display purposes and the exterior was illuminated with elaborate neon signs which lit up the street and could be seen well across New Square.

There were other sides to the family's business empire when Keith joined his father in the company in 1949 to be followed by his brothers.

The early 1960s saw expansion with the addition of a Sturton's shop at 19/21 Fitzroy Street, whose ground floor showroom was used purely for a large range of carpets and floor coverings in support of the furniture store only a few doors away. They also struck out into the city centre by leasing a very large shop in the newly developed Bradwell's Court. This offered a wide range of furniture, upholstery, bedding, fabrics and two new departments of nursery goods and toys. It was officially opened by the local Sea Cadets with trumpets blowing and flags flying and continued until 1971 when the lease was sold to Maples.

Peak's always placed great importance on local advertising and spent many thousands of pounds in the local press. Keith believes they were the first company to take a full page in the then "Cambridge Daily News" followed later by spot and full colour spreads. For special events such as the opening of the Bradwell's Court shop, anniversaries and shopping events supplements of several pages were taken in city and county newspapers.

Ever aware of changing trends they sought planning permission for a large "Out-of-town" super-store on Newmarket Road. But frustrated by planners and with the continued changes in the Fitzroy Street as the result of the Grafton Centre redevelopment the company moved all its activities to the Old Maltings in Ditton Walk

In 1971 the illuminated Peak's name above the shops in Fitzroy Street and Bradwell's Court were turned off and for the first time in over half-a-century there was no Peak retail furniture shop in Cambridge.

But did you furnish your first home from either of the Peaks shops. Eva Wesley has an old bill from the 'other' one in King Street – can you supply one for the Fitzroy Street store?

Two readers are seeking information on plane crashes during the second world war.

Ted Sedgwick would like details of a Stirling bomber that came down at Oakington on 14th March 1943 at nine in the evening. Ralph Warboys has memories of that village during the period. He recalls two incidents. On one occasion a Stirling taking off towards Westwick caught a railway loading gauge on its undercarriage as it crossed the railway line and crashed, knocking the bedrooms off a farmhouse and demolishing a substantial dove house. But it was on a Sunday evening – just at the time specified – that he heard a crashing rendering noise and rushed down Coles Lane to where a plane was burning fiercely opposite New Close Farm. Ralph and his brother helped to carry cans of foam that they squirted onto the wreckage although ammunition was going off all around them. All the crew died except the rear gunner as the tail had broken off with him inside it. You can contact Ted by email at Tedsedg@aol.com or write to me and I'll forward the message. [SCAN OF STIRLING AT OAKINGTON 1944] [SCAN OF OAKINGTON RAILWAY STATION]

But can you supply similar details on a Lancaster bomber that crashed at Stretham, near Ely "as a result of the dinghy coming out of its compartment and fouling the tailplane". This was possibly Lancaster ND553 which crashed 30 April 1944 as a result of such a mishap. Amongst the six fatalities from that aircraft, was a Flying Officer B. Jagger who had flown as a crew member on the "Dambuster" raid. John Beynon tells me a friend has acquired some small pieces of the plane and would welcome further information. You can contact John by email at 0956djbeynon@amservice.com. or write to me at the News

Jim Laney from Wokingham in Berkshire has written following my article on the village lockup at Litlington. He has been investigating the family tree and has established that one of his wife's ancestors, John Randall, hanged himself in the belfry of Litlington church on 21 January 1860. John was church clerk, obviously a man of some position in the community, but his young daughter had married in December the previous year and was to have a baby just a month after his death. The inquest verdict was that he was "in a state of temporary insanity". Jim is seeking further details but there seems to be no report in the local newspapers of the time. If you have any clues then please ring him on 0118 9894875 or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch. [SCAN OF LITLINGTON CHURCH]

Another distant reader is Mrs V. Barrett from near Stockport in Cheshire. She writes following a recent Memories article on Staffordshire Street. "How lovely it was; it brought tears to my eyes because I was a young girl in Staffordshire Street called Violet O'Dell and Boey O'Dell was my granddad. I knew the Gas Lane well, where we took the rabbit skins - my gran had skinned the rabbits for our meal - and the rags too. He had a big yard behind the house with goats, chickens and pigeons. There were 16 in that family. The Man in the Moon was my grandad's pub, he played skittles. I could go on and on, but it would take forever. My son still lives in Burwell and visits me, bringing the papers to read. I never forget my home. I'm 80 now so time is passing, but thank you for printing that page. I shall keep it now and read it often"

Skittles were in the news back in April 1932 when Mr E.C. Green told the annual dinner of the Cambridge League that he remembered it used to be played in a barn converted into an indoor skittle alley. Both the pins and balls were made of India rubber with the sides of the room padded so there should be no noise. After a time the game died out but had been revived with a Cambridge League started in August 1929. It met the requirements of local people and what a should be more natural than they should go to the poor man's club - the local inn where publicans went out of their way to provide every amusement such as darts, dominoes and shove ha'penny.

A different version of the game was flourishing in February 1977 when reporter Alan Kersey took himself off to a match at the Burleigh Arms on Newmarket Road, Cambridge. By then it was a macho game where teams of eight would hurl, toss or spin a flat, flying saucer-shaped cheese at a table resembling a large, sparsely padded armchair upon which were spaced nine wooden pins. The object was to knock as many down as you could in as few throws as possible. Get them all down in one go and you had notched up a "floozer". Hit the front and there was a derisive groan: a "tacker". Each player had a maximum of four throws then it was time for their opponents to respond. If at the end the score was tied it was down to each player having one final throw, most down wins.

In the old days coachloads of players used to arrive long before the game to limber up but by 1977 many of the pubs had closed and in others the game was in danger of disappearing. Landlords had thrown skittles out because it was too noisy, drowning even the noise of the jukebox. Perhaps they should have learned from the past and reverted to the rubber ones.

Memories 2nd May 2007, by Mike Petty

Two subjects vie for top billing this week; so what should it be: the Mayor of Cambridge or the Queen of Grantchester?

The former has been around for a much longer period, indeed the position dates back 800 years to a charter awarded by King John on 8th May 1207. So to celebrate there is an exhibition in the Folk Museum and next Tuesday church bells will be rung in the City Centre at lunchtime with a concert in the Guildhall in the evening. Then - great excitement - it will be open day at the Guildhall on Wednesday, 9th May with a Blue Plaque unveiled 12.30 pm and there will be free, specially-themed guided tours from the Tourist Information Centre in Wheeler Street. But if you can't manage to get the day off work to attend, do not despair. On Saturday 12th the tours and Guildhall opening will be repeated.

The Mayor is the personification of Cambridge, his presence is sought for many functions, each made the more important by his attendance. It is an onerous role that he will always remember. Some Mayors get invited to Coronations, other perform them.

In 1925 the civic head journeyed to the Central Girls' School for the coronation of Queen Effie Few who succeeded the abdicated Queen Gwendoline Marshal. The school was tastefully decorated with bluebells, cowslips, buttercups and violets while the girls, attired in white dresses, sang songs of spring as the Mayor proclaimed the new May Queen. After her enthronement the new Queen's subjects paid homage by placing flowers at her feet.

It was a ceremony by then well established. At the Eden Street Higher Grade the school's queen of 1900, Elsie Fisher, was sketched by the Cambridge Graphic. The school had made a special effort: teachers and girls transformed their room into a perfect garden of flowers, with a Royal dais, covered with a green carpet. The retiring Queen wearing a crown of pansies stood down at the end of a very happy reign and the new Queen, who'd been elected by her schoolmates, appeared to the strains of a stately march preceded by her bodyguard bearing garlands of flowers. [SCAN OF EDEN STREET MAY QUEEN 1900]

I have copies of pictures showing similar ceremonies at Melbourn Place in 1942, the Milton Road majesty of 1952 and the 1954 Queen's procession – though of which school I'm not sure, perhaps you can tell me. [SCAN OF MYSTERY PROCESSION FROM 1954]

It was not something confined to Cambridge. Eva Westley has been telling me how her sister Edie was proclaimed as Grantchester's May Queen in 1937. May Day was one of great excitement in those days. "Hoops, tennis rackets, sticks and baskets would all be decorated with wild flowers. King cups, buttercups, daisies, cowslips, cuckoo flowers and violets all gathered from the profusion that grew in the meadows, hedges and ditches at that time. After the crowning of the May Queen, by the Vicar on the Village Green, we would go all round the village singing our little songs and dancing on the lawns of the larger houses. Edie had a crown specially made by the boys in school, though Canon Hicken put it on backwards! [SCAN OF GRANTCHESTER MAY QUEEN 1937]

The children appreciated the beauty of the countryside around them at every season, as Eva remembers: "Spring was the time to seek out birds nests, pick flowers and skip in the road, usually with someone's mother's long washing line - so several of us could skip at once while we chanted all sorts of sayings and songs.

"The Summer meant picnics over the meadows and swimming in the river. There were always adults there to help us but if you could not swim by the time you were seven the boys would throw you in, you soon learnt then, you had no choice! We climbed the trees and rolled down the dips in the grass, we looked for tadpoles to take home, fished for tiddlers with a net and jam jar and tried to see how many sorts of dragonflies and butterflies we could spot. We played at the pond behind manor farm and the one in the Bridleway, with games like Robin Hood, where our bows were green sticks and string and our arrows were reeds pulled from the thatch on the barn roof when the bailiff was not looking. We played with whips and tops, which we coloured with chalk and games of hopscotch and marbles took place on the road. Autumn was a great feast time because you could gather blackberries, walnuts and beech mast or mushrooms to take home to cook. Then there were conkers to gather and string up for a conker fight and we would get bits of wool off the barbed wire fences, from the sheep, to take home and make soft little pillows for our dolls. Sometimes we would play all day in the stackyard, with its lovely smell of new hay, or in the cart hovels. In Winter of course there was always sliding, (skating we called it), on the ice, snowballing and playing in the drifts. On fine days bowling hoops made of wood or even old bicycle wheels but the best bit of all was carol singing around the village. We sometimes ended up with ten pence, or a shilling, (a shilling was twelve pence), wealth indeed until we had to give it to the Spitfire fund.

Were you ever a May Queen – or a Cambridge Mayor – and what are your special memories?

Memories 9th May 2007, by Mike Petty

In this week of celebrations of the 800th anniversary of Cambridge's charter, Sue Reeve from Sawston has lent me a picture of a Cambridge Mayor encouraging National Savings during an exhibition at the Guildhall in the 1950s. Amongst the people behind the table is Joan Searle who was one of the first women to serve on the counter at Cambridge Post Office in 1940. But what other faces can you name. [SCAN OF MAYOR]

Last week I had the opportunity to inspect a remarkable series of albums that record something of the history of West Wrating.

Its most distinctive house is West Wrating Park which about 1880 became home to a 'cram' school where tutors prepared about fifty students for army, air force, navy and all university entrance examinations. They included the writer Lawrence Durrell, who, despite individual attention, failed to meet the usual high standards and continued to fluff his Cambridge entrance examinations. Sport played an important part in the school life with cricket matches, football, golf, tennis, hockey and – in winter – skating on the moat at Scarlets Farm. The school closed around 1930 after which it was owned by a member of a shipping line, a Brigadier and then the London County Council who put in evacuees for the duration of the second world war. It later passed back into private ownership. Did you ever visit it? [SCAN OF WRATING PARK CRICKET TEAM c1890]

The village also boasts a windmill that became famous for a few years just as the school was closing. In 1932 Philippa Burrell came upon it by chance and bought it for £600 - including a cottage, granary and 20 acres of good farming land. High & isolated she found it a little paradise but worried about the mill with its broken sails, rotten windows and the rain going in. A millwright gave her an estimate of £100 for repair so to raise the money she made date cakes which she sold from an old pram on Cambridge market with a picture of the mill fixed to the side. It proved an immediate sensation and soon she was selling teas to hundreds of people who journeyed to see the mill, sitting contentedly on rustic tables in the orchard. After two seasons she closed the business – the mill was restored. It was not the end of the story for she wrote a play "The wind and the mill", a copy of the programme for which features in the West Wrating albums. [SCAN OF WEST WRATING MILL]

But do you have any other information about the village that could be added to their records. If so let me know and I'll put you in touch.

Readers have been able to assist John Beynon with his enquiries into a Lancaster bomber thought to have crashed near Stretham during WWII. Bob Giddens from Denny Abbey has shown me a copy of 'Beware of the Dog at War'. It reports that the plane was taking part in a trial of a new form of radar operated gun turret, codenamed 'Village Inn' as part of which it was subjected to a mock attack by a friendly fighter. During the bomber's vigorous evasive action its dinghy accidentally started to inflate and burst from its stowage hold in the starboard wing. It blew back covering one fin, causing the aircraft to flip onto its back. The pilot's immediate reaction was to haul back on the control column in an attempt to complete a full loop, but with insufficient height the plane smashed into the ground. Terry Beaumont has added more information but John is still seeking the actual location.

He has in turn been able to supply information on a Stirling aircraft which crashed at Oakington on 14th March 1943. This was Short Stirling N6086 "MacRobert's Reply", of 1651 Heavy Conversion Unit at RAF Oakington, which came down shortly after take-off on a night-flying exercise. Of the crew of seven three were killed and the remaining four injured. Terry Beaumont adds that the plane suffered an engine failure. All this is of great interest to Ted Sedge, who wrote to me, since one of the dead airmen, Tommy Davis was his wife's uncle.

Mr G.P. Caley from Cottenham has his own memories of wartime tragedy. He writes : "I was stationed at RAF Oakington on the crash tender with the ambulance standing by when we saw a plane taking off towards Oakington and trying to get airborne. But alas he could not get height, clipped a farmhouse and came down in the orchard, hitting a dovecote. We could see he was not going to make it so we rushed over to the scene where we found the crashed bomber on fire with the bullets going up and the poor doves flying round. We saw six of our comrades were killed but the tail of the bomber had broken off and we rescued the air gunner and put him in the ambulance. This was one of our worst crashed aircraft we attended to. I have a photo of the crew and crash tender that attended this fateful night."

Memories 16th May 2007, by Mike Petty

Tony Claydon, an Assistant District Commissioner of Cambridge Scouts, was sorting through a pack of memorabilia when he came across a picture of a group of scouts on Cambridge Railway Station. It shows participants at the World Scout Jamboree held at Sutton Coldfield and originally appeared in the Cambridge Daily News of 14th August 1957.

About 35,000 youngsters journeyed from across the world to be present including a group of Cambridgeshire lads. They established a camp with a decorated gateway surmounted by an effigy of an undergraduate in a tattered gown mounted on a bicycle (belonging to R. Gooby of Littleport) which pedalled furiously when the gate was opened. They were joined by 400 other local scouters who travelled on a train calling at Ely and March stations before returning that evening.

Then when the Jamboree was over some 400 scouts from 84 countries made their way to Cambridge for the 17th International Conference of the Association. They were welcomed by Mayor in the Guildhall where their uniforms presented a colourful sight. The bright blue caps from Finland, the flowing white kaffiyeh (a squarish scarf folded over into a triangle) from Lebanon, broad hats from Morocco and turbans from the Sudan mingled with green kilts from Ireland, grey-blue coats of Liechtenstein and red jackets of the USA. Amongst dignitaries present was the Chief Scout, Lord Rowallan. Working sessions were held at the Arts School in Bene't Street before the conference concluded with an address by the wife of the movement's founder, Elaine, Lady Baden Powell. [SCAN OF NEWS REPORT OF THE CONFERENCE, AUGUST 1957].

But Tony's photograph shows none of these. His lads were scouts from South Africa who paused in Cambridge for a week where they were guests of local families. They were taken on tours of the colleges, industrial visits and journeys to Newmarket and Wisbech before they made the long voyage home. [SCAN OF THE SOUTH AFRICAN SCOUTERS FROM CDN 14th AUG 1957]

Now this July Cambridge is hosting a reunion for people who attended that 1957 World Scout Jamboree, perhaps including some of the South African contingent. Tony would like to arrange a reunion with those who hosted them 50 years ago. If you can help then please contact him on 01223 248226.

Richard Bigg from Chelmsford has sent me a photograph of his dad, Walter (Wally) Bigg in a sports car registration number RX 8303, probably about 1930. He was an apprentice at King and Harper's where he worked until 1960 but whether it's their Bridge Street or Thompson's Lane garage Richard is not sure. Can anybody shed more light on it. If so email richard.bigg@virgin.net or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch. And do you know anything of Wills and Thomson the motor engineers of George IV Street; John Bull from

Kedington has sent me copies of a couple of bills they raised for work in 1936. [SCAN OF WALLY BIGG IN SPORTS CAR c1930, SCAN OF BILL FROM WILLS AND THOMPSON 1936]

Memories of Peak's furnishers have been pouring in. Mrs J. Jenner of Bourn recalls a shopping trip to King Street. She writes: "My late husband spend three months in Sudan in 1953, returning home in time for Christmas. In early 1954 his money came through and we furnished a two-bedroomed house with it from Peaks. Lino, beds, dressing tables, tables and chairs together with other furniture added up to £400. But because we paid cash there was a discount that paid for a single wardrobe". What was more the firm gave them a cup of tea and biscuits while they totalled up the bill. Some of those items are still in use. Ian Hopkins from St Ives has a copy of a hire purchase agreement from February 1959 when he bought a dressing chest, table and chairs from the Fitzroy Street shop, paying it off with 23 monthly instalments of £3 18s 0d. He doesn't mention getting a discount!

Memories 23 May 2007, by Mike Petty

Elspeth Cattermole from Buckden has recorded her memories of childhood in the Tenison Road area of Cambridge in verse. In one poem entitled 'Lie in the Dark and Listen' she remembers:

The war years brought excitement
To us children,
Though fear and instability to our elders.
Digging an air raid shelter in the garden
Was not unlike the making of a tent.
The seriousness of the situation
Was lost upon us.
And, like children everywhere,
We accepted things as they were.
My parents did not have a shelter,
So like millions of others,
We made for the area underneath the stairs
When the wailing siren went.

Here we would sit
Listening to the droning
Of the enemy bomber overhead,
Fearing the random bombs
The pilots frequently unloaded
Before they returned to base.
We were never bombed
But many were less fortunate.

As the world had drifted to war the Government ordered the construction of shelters and bunkers where people could take refuge from the perils of bombing.

By December 1939 a News reporter found work well under way with nine refuges ready for use. They included a shelter for 400 people in the cellars under Peas Hill, a trench on Midsummer Common would take 300 more while 50 could seek safety under Christ's Pieces. Basements were also pressed into use at Headley and Edwards' premises in Corn Exchange Street (200 people), Potts Brewery on Castle Hill (100) with another two at Robinson's

Garage in Regent Street (100 in each). Another hundred could seek refuge under Hills Road Methodist Chapel while if you were caught in a raid in Trumpington Street then 200 people could run to the basement of Scroope House – but not during office hours.

Many other followed, some of which still exist. Zoë Svendsen found an air raid shelter in the garden of her home in Cambridge and has become fascinated by such spaces, now largely ignored and forgotten. Who went down there? What did they think about?

Now she is part of a Lottery-funded Bunker Project, organised by a Cambridge-based creative group, METIS. It aims to record the memories and experiences of local people and share them with the wider public through a website, a DVD, an exhibition, and ultimately a theatre production. METIS is working with a local theatre production company, SCAMP, and are also recruiting volunteers to conduct interviews and research on this fascinating aspect of our recent history – training in research and oral history interviewing techniques will be given.

The group is keen to hear from anyone who went into an air raid shelter at home or at work, anyone who owns or knows of such a building or was involved in building them or who was a member of Civil Defence.

Bunkers were revived during the period of the Cold War. A 1960's-built top secret nuclear bunker that was to be the HQ for regional government in the event of a nuclear strike was constructed just off Cambridge's Brooklands Avenue. Elsewhere Royal Observer Corps volunteers, local government officers – and even librarians – took part in exercises to learn what to do in the aftermath of a nuclear attack. But how many would really choose to abandon wife and family to hide in a shelter in the company of people one had to be paid to work with? If you were one then METIS would like to hear from you. Dorothy Creek (nee Glasscock) from Barrington was delighted to see Ena Wesley's picture of the Grantchester May Queen as she recognised her sisters Margaret and Betty who have lived in New Zealand and the USA for many years. It jogged a host of memories for her – of taking a spoon to the Orchard Tea Gardens for free home made strawberry ice cream and collecting eggs from households to take to the children's ward at Addenbrooke's Hospital for Easter day breakfast. Then there was the annual concert by school children, the Christmas tea parties given by the British Legion – always with a conjuror and ventriloquist and the entertainments in the Cambridge Guildhall for Robins and Goodfellows. Dorothy also remembers the great R101 flying over the village, and the day Grantchester mill burnt down. People then were content with what they had, children more inventive and imaginative in their play; treats and outings were infrequent but what better than to have a picnic and your weekly comic in the meadows by the river?

Joan Clark (nee Stubbings) of Sheringham has occasion to remember May Queens – she was the Central School queen in 1940 when Miss Irvine was headmistress and has a photo taken at Stearns of Bridge Street to prove it.

Valda Smith from Impington believes my picture of the 1954 celebrations was taken in the field of the former Histon Junior School, since demolished for road improvements. The celebrations were the highlight of the school year. She was a Maid of Honour in 1937 when the event took place in the grounds of Homefields, the home of Mr & Mrs Stanley Chivers. After the house was taken down it was held in the school field, but was not the same.

As the digital tv switchover nears so we are being encouraged to invest in set-top boxes to receive the wonder of multi-channel television and numerous digital radio broadcasts. The only thing is that you will probably need a new aerial. It has been a problem faced by generations of radio and television viewers.

When I was a lad I had a Saturday and holiday job helping out at Jack Edward's electrical shop in Stretham. Part of my role was to hold the ladder as Tony Badcock connected the brackets to the chimneystack then carry up the new aerial, trying not to overbalance and send one of the aluminium rods through a window. Some chimneys were trickier than others, but we never resorted to using a bow and arrow!

But H.W. Peak of King Street did in January 1952, as the News reported: "How to put an aerial above your roof in three not-so-easy stages. 1: call the Fire Brigade. 2: Ask the Chief Fire Officer (Mr Tom Knowles) to fire a rocket attached to a rope over a T.V. aerial crossbar. 3: Use a bow and arrow". All three methods were employed in an attempt to bracket a V.H.F. aerial to their existing array. But the Fire brigade's turntable ladder was a foot short & the rocket missed its mark. Then an arrow from the bow of John Ridgeon (leader of the Cambridge Bowmen) went over the top. Attached to it was the rope with the new aerial which was then hauled up.

By October 1952 Cambridge television viewers were being promised enhanced reception once a new 50-foot-high aerial was erected on the Gogs. They would receive an almost unmarred signal well in time for the Coronation and the large "H" aerial on chimney-pots would no longer be necessary; instead a small rod could be hung from the bedroom window, engineers claimed. Ten years later in August 1962 the new-built Arbury area got cable TV thanks to a 170 foot-high mast in King's Hedges road.

Today shops are full of the latest flat screen gizmos but in the past not all promised improvements were what they seemed. In 1954 viewers were being warned that new multi channel convertors being incorporated in some makes of set could well be outdated and unserviceable by the time Cambridge came within range of the proposed new stations. To buy a set with a convertor meant paying 5-7 guineas more for what was likely to be a useless article, they were cautioned.

Earlier it had been wireless-enthusiasts who'd had the problems. In September 1922 set owners who were not also house owner-occupiers were discovering that landlords objected to the putting up of aerials. They were recommended to wait until it became certain how broadcasting would develop. "It is not making such rapid progress as people expected and those who wait a little will probably save money. By all accounts it will not be necessary to have aerials at all. Any ordinary electric light installations will provide all that is necessary for an efficient wireless aerial. If there is neither electric light or bells, gaspipes can be used, or failing this a wire garden fence, or it may be that nothing more than a pair of knitting needles will be essential", the News advised.

Music on the move presented other challenges. In 1923 passers-by in the vicinity of Newmarket Road were somewhat surprised by the appearance of a saloon car carrying a wireless outfit. The aerial was comparatively large, and was suspended from two poles at either end of the roof. The sight was sufficiently rare to cause much curiosity but, the News commented, “it is easy to foresee that in a few years, far from being a novelty, no car will be complete without its wireless installation”

In May 1953 there was another vehicle sporting an array of aerials on its roof. It was a Post Office Television Detector van that was touring Cambridge as part of an intensive ‘comb’ to find illicit television receivers. It could pinpoint houses containing working televisions even when the van was moving down a street while portable equipment allowed for detection of receivers in blocks of flats, viewers were warned

Now the news is of equipment-loaded vehicles cruising streets seeking to hijack wi-fi computer connections! So the world changes.

Memories 6th June 2007, by Mike Petty

The heroism of railwaymen who risked and lost their own lives to save those of others was recalled at Soham on Saturday with the unveiling of a plaque in the shadow of the war memorial.

Later in St Andrew’s Church the actions of the driver, fireman, guard and signalman were described. The congregation heard the now-familiar story of how in the early hours of June 2nd 1944 fire had been spotted in one wagon of an ammunition train. Driver Benjamin Gimbert of March and his fireman James Nightall of Littleport had uncoupled the blazing truck and started to shunt it away from the rest of the load while Guard Herbert Clarke and Signalman Frank Bridges tried to sound the warning. When the single wagon exploded Soham station was completely wiped out and Nightall and Bridges were killed.

It was a commemoration that echoed that of 1947 when a brass tablet had been erected on the match-boarded wall of a prefabricated hut been erected to serve as booking office, waiting room and control centre of the wrecked station.

But that year a similar incident had occurred a few miles away. In July 1947 a train of 40 open wagons carrying 112 lb American mustard gas bombs was passing through Six Mile Bottom when the stationmaster saw that a truck was ablaze. The burning wagon, this time the third from the engine, was uncoupled and the locomotive started to pull it away from the others.

“It was a spectacular sight. About fifty per cent of the bombs exploded with a ‘whoosh’ and a burst of flame which shot fifty feet into the air”, an eyewitness told the News. Poisonous fumes spread over fifty or sixty yards. Railway drivers, Frederick Smart and William Thorburn, together with firemen, Joseph Westland and Alfred Chandler, all of Cambridge, tried to subdue the fire with buckets of water fully aware of the dangerous nature of the contents of the wagon. They were presented with the L.N.E.R. Medal in recognition of their bravery.

Then in January 1950 two more Cambridge railwaymen, driver John Collingwood and guard Alfred Palmer were awarded the “Daily Herald” Order of Industrial Heroism, known as the “Workers VC” for an incident at the Air Ministry’s private siding at Lord’s Bridge. Coming round a blind corner their goods train had collided with a RAF motor lorry loaded with bombs. The lorry driver was knocked unconscious and trapped in his cab; the petrol tank was smashed and petrol splashed onto the bonnet which was smoking fiercely. Several bombs fell off the lorry and rolled towards a pool of petrol. Despite the danger the railwaymen released the driver, lifted him out of the cab and carried him to safety

Five years later in January 1955 there was an explosion at Lord’s Bridge station when fire broke out in a hanger containing mustard gas which was being used for experimental purposes. An area was cordoned off and fire tenders were quickly in attendance. Royal Air Force fireman, Corporal John Saunders went into the midst of an inferno of toxic smoke searching for casualties and preventing the spread of poison gas over a wide area. He, like the Soham driver and fireman, was awarded the George Cross for his bravery.

These events were reported at the time. But it was not until November 1979 that an American newspaper, the ‘Omaha World-Herald’ broke the story of how after a B-47 bomber crashed at Lakenheath RAF station in 1956 flaming fuel pouring from the ruptured tanks had engulfed a building containing three nuclear bombs. If they had exploded radioactive material would have been showered over a large area. A major accident had been averted when the base Fire Chief ignored the burning bomber and its four-man crew and concentrated on dousing the flames surrounding the nuclear storage building. The incident was kept secret at the time, the paper claimed, as the British people had not been told that nuclear bombs were being kept in the U.K. For the second time in twelve years Soham had escaped total devastation Cambridge may gain a new attraction if plans for a hot-air balloon to be based on Parker’s Piece come to fruition. It would give both visitors and locals the chance to see the city from an unusual vantage point.

The first people to glimpse Cambridge from a balloon were two undergraduates, Mr Poole and J. Armstrong who went up from Trinity Hall in 1785; later in July 1811 a Mr Sadler launched from the Great Court of Trinity College. Soon people were paying to watch men ascend into the sky. One of the pioneers was Charles Green who in May 1829 made his 115th aerial voyage from a field off Newmarket Road. He did not go alone – he went up on his trusty aeronautical pony. As they drifted over the countryside people dashed out to see a flying horse. His son meanwhile was more daring – he took his wife with him in the gondola!

If horses and women could fly then others could too. In 1830 Mr Green gave a ride to two undergraduates and soon such ascents were happening regularly.

But what was it like to actually go up in a balloon. In August 1902 Alphonso Smith, a bootmaker, described an trip from Parker’s Piece as part of the celebrations of the coronation of King Edward VII. The actual ascent was smooth, with the earth dropping away until they were up in the clouds – just how high he could not say as the pilot, Percival Spencer, had left the aerometer behind. It seems he also forgot the map as they were soon lost. He thought they passed over Fulbourn since he could see a large building which was probably the Asylum. After a while they came down over a village – “Where are we” they cried, but the rustics just gaped, too scared to answer. Fortunately a couple of cyclists were able to tell them they were en route for Linton. They finally landing in the middle of the coronation celebrations at Great Yeldham where the policeman promptly ordered all pipes and cigarettes to be extinguished for fear of explosion.

It's the landing bit that can prove problematical. Alphonso described how they dropped a grappling iron which missed a tree, then dragged along the ground for some distance before finally hooking in a ditch, bringing them down in a succession of heavy bumps.

There was another way: people jumped out. Parachute drops from balloons were an attraction as part of the Mammoth Show, held on Midsummer Common before the Great War. Miss Ena Spencer described her first jump: "I narrowly missed a ducking by landing on the towing path of the river Cam, but my brother had a prickly time by dropping in a blackberry hedge"

In 1955 Cambridge University Airborne Club organised a parachute jump from a balloon on the Pemberton Estate. In the first cage for jumping, which took place from the usual height of 800 feet, were four regular soldiers; they were followed by 28 members of the Airborne Club in drops of five, all of whom were attached to regiments of the 16th Parachute Division, Territorial Army. The wind was quite sharp and gusty and most of those who landed were dragged yards by their inflated canopies. Quite a crowd of spectators gathered to watch the descents with many cars and lorries drawn up on the Trumpington Road.

But the most frightening incident came in October 1965 after a wartime barrage balloon containing weather instruments broke free from its mooring at RAF Cardington dragging its wire rope thirty miles across country before it became hooked on scaffolding at St Johns College. Magdalene College was evacuated for fear that the hydrogen-filled canopy might be pierced and cause an explosion. It all passed peacefully.

But the idea of a tethered balloon as a permanent feature has been aired before. In the 1820s there was a huge expansion in the number of young men seeking to study at the University and even Trinity College was experiencing difficulties in accommodating them all. One solution that was canvassed was to moor houseboats along the river at the back of the college, another was to float a balloon and allow the students to sleep in the sky. That idea did not find support – only time will tell if history repeats itself.

Bryan Manning from Cambridge has responded to my request for memories of tv aerials.

In 1952 his father Rupert, who was a builder with a long ladder, saw an opportunity of diversifying into the new boom industry of erecting television aerials. Soon he was working for small television shops as well as big companies like Wards, Millers and H.W. Peak whose boss, John Peak came up with a bright idea.

He had his own light aeroplane and flew over different housing estates in Cambridge dropping leaflets saying that anybody who took one to his shop in King Street could have a television fitted free for two weeks in time for the Coronation.

Soon Bryan and his brother Malcolm were heroes to children in street after street as they climbed up to the roof with their new aeralis. A fortnight later they went back to take them down again – the offer was over. But there weren't many to take down – the children saw to that as Bryan recalls. "They asked their friends 'Are you keeping yours', and when they said 'yes' went crying to mum or dad saying 'My friend is keeping their television'. What could mum or dad do! Only say ok, we'll keep it" [SCAN OF CORONATION PARTY for children in the Petersfield and Bradmore Street area of CAMBRIDGE – CHILDREN WERE EQUALLY DELIGHTED WHEN THEY LEARNED THEY COULD KEEP THEIR TELLIES]

James Craig has emailed seeking your assistance in solving a family mystery. He has an old photo taken by Starr & Rignall, the Cambridge photographer, showing a number of service personnel, both officers and other ranks. Amongst them is his relative, Andy McCoubrey. Andy was transferred from the Royal Artillery to the Intelligence Corps and for a time served at Bletchley Park where his Commanding Officer was a Captain (later Major) Hugh Skillen. But what was Andy doing in Cambridge – where was the picture taken and who are the other men. Can anybody help. Dennis Merry from Teversham has called with more information on the Soham explosion. He was one of the brave railwaymen who drove the ammunition trains on their long, slow overnight journeys from the Whitemoor Yard at March. Some nights they carried ammunition, other nights aviation fuel, both potent loads. Dennis was at the railway sidings near Brooklands Avenue when he heard the bang and initially thought a bomber had crashed. He still can't understand what caused the bombs to explode; had it been a hotbox – wheel bearing – that overheated it would not have actually caught fire unless something had leaked, similarly any stray sparks from the locomotive would have needed something to spread the flame. Railwaymen at the time speculated on the possibility of sabotage. It may never be known. But Dennis has more reason to remember it than many, for he was the Fireman on the train that was sent to drag away the tangled wreckage of the locomotive that had been blown apart by the explosion which claimed the life of his colleagues.

Margaret Reeve from Newnham had her own memories of the trauma of war. In 1937 she'd applied to train as a nurse at Addenbrooke's Hospital in Trumpington Street but the Matron would not take local girls as there'd be too many distractions from their studies. Undaunted she started at a cottage hospital in Wisbech where she had much more responsibility and got on well. After a year she transferred to Cambridge where she commenced her working day by polishing the brass name plates and door knobs of the doctors' rooms in the Outpatient's Hall. After war broke out she moved to a hospital in Bournemouth where she became a night-sister working twelve-hour shifts with constant air-raids during the day. One night they got a call to prepare as many beds as possible for an influx of soldiers from Dunkirk. Soon the hospital was bursting with exhausted, dirty, hungry men who'd been saved from the beaches. One of Margaret's lasting memories was of seeing a row of men sitting in beds with their chests in plaster casts where they'd jumped from the cliffs and broken their spines. Later she moved back to Addenbrooke's Hospital gaining a Sister's post on Goode Ward where she nursed until her retirement in 1976. Margaret was a founder-member of the Addenbrooke's League of Nurses, many of whom were present at her funeral, and an active member of Emmanuel United Reformed Church where a thanksgiving service to celebrate her life will be held on 27th June.

Richard Bigg emails to thank News readers for their help in identifying a picture of his father taken at King and Harper's garage. He writes: "It has really struck gold. I had two people in Cambridge who knew dad get in touch, then I had an E-mail from Palm Springs California !! A chap there knew Cambridge and K and H and had a little story to tell me about the firm. We exchanged a number of E-mails then, to cut a long story short, it transpired he was the brother of the wife of one of Dad's brothers. He knew a lot about the Bigg family and eventually he rang me and we had a long chat"

Gordon Jackson has taken some time to catch up with one of my articles – but he does have an excuse – he's in New South Wales. He emails:

"I recently was sent a copy of Evening News, dated February 4th 2000 by friends in Cambridge. They thought that I might be interested in your report and pictures of "Street Party for Victory" and Richmond Road School. I was very interested. Firstly the Richmond Road and Oxford Road VE party. I can remember the day very clearly. Looking down the length of the table, I was the first boy at the top of the table. On my left was my Sister, who at the time was only three years of age. I attended Richmond Road School and can remember Miss Chandler very well. Some years ago I made a trip back to my hometown of Cambridge when I went down memory lane, and visited many places of my childhood including a walk down Oxford Road and Richmond Road (which is where I was born). I also spent some time looking at the Richmond Road School. Apart from a fresh coat of paint, it still looked exactly the same. I thought the above comments might be of some interest to you." Indeed they are – and I'm sure Gordon would be keen to share his memories with other school chums. You can email him at geajackson@bigpond.com or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch. [SCAN OF THE STREET PARTY]

Ann Haslop has also been remembering times past: She writes: "My husband's family were bootmakers in the 1800s and originated in Trumpington (though I think earlier they were from Northampton). In 1871 they lived at 57 Fitzroy Street, we do not know whether it was a shop or just their dwelling, it would be wonderful to see a photo of Fitzroy Street taken at this date. His grandfather who lived in Priory Road, was at first a greengrocer in the Fitzroy Street area, then a Hansom cab owner and later a taxi driver operating from Priory Road". The story of such trades-people is one that is seldom told, but every community had its bakers and butchers, saddlers and shoemakers, general stores and newsagents. Many have passed into history, others continue to serve. One such is Bonnett's who have been baking in Somersham for over 200 years. In the 1950s the business was run by Bessie Bonnett whose head baker was a man called Billie Barlow. Older villagers still remember the chant: 'Bessie Bonnett's best-baked brown bread, baked by Billie Barlow, builds bonny babies'. The firm delivered door-to-door; starting with a horse and cart they moved on to motor vans but still keep one of their old three-wheeled delivery bikes that they use for special deliveries and sales of hot-cross buns on Good Friday. [SCAN OF A TYPICAL BAKER'S DELIVERY MAN – NOT SOMERSHAM]

Bank holidays are a day of rest for most tradesmen – but not Burrows of Ely who have been supplying people with their newspapers and magazines since 1899. Their working day starts around four in the morning when the papers are received, sorting them into rounds so they are ready for the boys and girls who deliver them to homes throughout the ever-expanding city. But it is not just papers and magazines, they also have a bookshop which stocks a wide range of local publications, in one of which they themselves feature. For Rex Sly has charted the story of traders in places like Murrow, Benwick, Gedney Hill and Gorefield, a tribute to the hardworking fenland folk who continue to serve their localities. (Fenland Families by Rex Sly, Sutton Publishing, ISBN 978-0-7509-4327-7 £14.99) [SCAN OF SWAVESEY BUTCHER'S VAN – TYPICAL OF THE DELIVERY VANS (not in book)]

Ken Isaacson remembers when Soham had thirteen butchers, nine drapers, six cycle dealers and twenty-eight shops selling groceries, sweets and cigarettes. Then there was Henry Munns' ironmongers which was managed by his diminutive daughter, Dot. She would open up the shop in the early morning and display her wares out on to the pavement. "There were spades, shovels, draining tools and forks for all jobs such as digging, muck spreading etc. Hoes, scythes, sickles, hedging hooks, darnells, mattocks, copper bowls, buckets, scuttles, carborundum stones, hammers and all hand tools. Rolls of chicken wire, sheets of galvanised iron, pig and chicken feeders and troughs, rat and mouse traps, rabbit snares and a lot more. Inside the shop she sold kettles, saucepans, frying pans, washing boards, knife cleaning and sharpening boards, crockery, sticky fly papers, rat poison and all kinds of nails and screws which she weighed out on the scales on the counter. There were many other items to choose from in the shop, she also sold cartridges and 'Brocks' fireworks for November 5th", Ken recalls. Now his memories "Home Sweet Soham" are available from another local tradesmen, Fuller's undertakers of 23 Hall Street Soham for £6.75 – plus £2.25 postage

Tobacco advertising has been banned for years. But on the corner of Rose Crescent and Market Hill in the centre of Cambridge there's praise for a tobacconist, even though the shop has been closed for nearly 25 years.

Bacons supplied smokers in Cambridge from about 1813 until 1983. Their ledgers recorded the names of famous customers including the Prince of Wales – the future King Edward VII - when at Trinity, Charles Kingsley – author of 'Hereward the Wake' and Alfred (Lord) Tennyson whose statue in the Trinity College chapel shows him with a pipe. But the most famous was a now largely-forgotten Victorian poet named Charles Stuart Calverley.

He had a varied academic career, being sent down from Oxford for what was described as 'desultory and idle habits' – mainly smoking and staying out late. So he switched to Christ's College Cambridge where he flourished – and not only for his studies; he once jumped over a horse and cart in Green Street and stole the inn sign from the Green Man, Trumpington.

But all of this would now be forgotten were it not for his addition to smoking. He wrote an 'Ode to Tobacco' in which he named his favourite shop. Bacons, who produced various brands of their own, realised the advertising potential and promptly brought out 'Calverley Cigarettes' bearing his picture on the packet. Then when their old shop on the corner of Rose Crescent was knocked down and rebuilt in the mid 1930s the famous poem was fixed to the wall. [SCAN OF CALVERLEY CIGARETTE PACKET, SCAN OF BACON'S OLD SHOP ON CORNER OF ROSE CRESCENT]

But even then there was concern about the impact of smoking on health; part of the poem reads

I have a liking old

For thee, though manifold
Stories, I know, are told
Not to thy credit:

How they who use fusees
All grow by slow degrees
Brainless as chimpanzees,
Meagre as lizards.

(Fusees were long-burning matches, ideal for lighting cigars in rough weather)

But while rich undergraduates would pay any price in reason for the tobacco which appealed most to their palate, people in Mill Road liked a lot for their money and in 1902 were buying cheap cigarettes in packets containing showy photographs. Even this was too expensive for many. In 1904 a Waterbeach schoolboy who'd become hooked on tobacco purloined a silver watch which he sold to fund his habit. Later when automatic cigarette vending machines were introduced three Somersham lads were convicted of filing down farthings so they would fit in the slots - a packet of ten Player's cigarettes cost 6d.

Undergraduates were not allowed to smoke in academic dress; in February 1920 the Duke of York, later King George VI was stopped by a Bulldog – University policeman – outside the Union Building and fined six shillings and eightpence. Some years later the King recalled the incident and referred to the cigarette as the most expensive one he ever smoked! Other Proctors sympathised, having made the lad snub his cigar out one offered a finer specimen out of his own case, provided it was smoked in the privacy of the student's room. [SCAN OF UNDERGRADUATE BEING STOPPED FOR SMOKING]

Smoking in the street caused concern in December 1925 - "I should not advise anyone, particularly a young lady, in search of fresh air, to visit Petty Cury on a Saturday night - for the atmosphere is 'too blue' to be healthy, and reeks of cheap cigarette smoking, indulged in by ill-bred youths and flappers alike", a correspondent complained.

The issue of whether people should smoke at work was also being hotly debated in December 1922. It had been suggested that Cambridge dustmen men should be allowed to smoke on duty - but the men had to go through people's houses to collect their bins and this would bring the unwelcome smell of tobacco in place of the stench of refuse. One councillor was realistic; Councillor Lunn told his colleagues, "The men do smoke in any case, so you might as well realise it as shut your eyes to it!" Now of course it is the other way round – tenants are being asked not to smoke in their own homes in case it pollutes the atmosphere for visiting council officials.

By November 1978 a Cambridge Evening News survey showed that at the Guildhall, County Hall and Fisons workers could smoke freely and even health-conscious Cambridge United players were at liberty to clog their lungs up at work. CCAT students – now Anglia Ruskin University - were free to smoke during classes, but only if a majority of them vote to do so at the beginning of a session.

But reaction was even then setting in; at Jesus College undergraduates had voted to remove ash-trays from their library and United Taxis banned passengers and drivers from smoking in their vehicles. Now it is banned in pubs. It's enough to drive a smoker to drink!

Cigarettes were a regular gift in Hospitals at Christmas – at Addenbrooke's Hospital in 1903 the patients of the men's surgical and accident wards had a present of cigars pipes, tobacco or cigarettes, which were greatly appreciated.

In 1927 Jul 30 A young man, fashionably attired in a brand new plus-four suit paused at the cigarette machine outside the New Theatre, Cambridge, and inserting a sixpence drew forth a packet of cigarettes. Instead of shutting the drawer in the orthodox manner he turned his back on the machine and applied pressure by a retrograde movement. "Snap" went the drawer, taking with it about six inches of the seat of the young man's voluminous "bags". Finding himself held captive he appealed for sixpences to release the drawer but none would do the trick. "Debagging" was out of the question and the prisoner would not hear of being "cut away". After twenty minutes one bright person tried the very obvious idea of pulling the handle of the drawer and he was released amid loud cheers.

Smoking at the New Theatre posed problems in 1901 – there was no smoking in the auditorium or public passage so extra smoking rooms were constructed for the men to smoke between acts

Tramps preferred what they called 'hard-up' – cigarette ends which they picked up from the pavements. They had to surrender them when they went into Mill Road workhouse – so 'Weary Willie' concealed his stumpy pipe in a toe of one of his big boots with his matches and kerbstone mixture' in the other. At Christmas it was the custom to give workhouse or hospital inmates gifts of tobacco and snuff - it aided digestion and was one of the pleasures they enjoyed. But non-smokers complained they received nothing equivalent to the tobacco received by smokers.

Memories 11th July 2007, by Mike Petty

In last week's Memories I mentioned a complaint from 1925 about youngsters congregating in Petty Cury on Saturday nights: "The atmosphere is 'too blue' to be healthy, and reeks of cheap cigarette smoking, indulged in by ill-bred youths and flappers alike", a correspondent lamented.

But Victor and Muriel Challis from Cambridge recollect that they too did something similar a decade later

"An event, which took place mostly in Autumn and Winter, was known, colloquially, as the 'Monkey Parade'. On Sunday afternoon and evening flocks of teenage folk would descend upon the city centre (then known as 'down the town'), and circumnavigate the square formed by Petty Cuff, Market Hill, Market Street, and Sidney Street. The boys, well behaved and smartly dressed, would try to walk in the opposite direction to that taken by the girls. The girls, in turn, would look beautiful and shy, and usually 'hunted' in pairs. Many a lasting romance was formed by the good-natured banter and modest 'putting on the style' thereby”.

Much of the route that Victor and Muriel took would be unrecognisable to the youth of today as both Petty Cury and Market Street have changed out of all recognition since the 1930s. [SCANS OF PETTY CURY, SIDNEY STREET AND MARKET HILL IN THE 1930's]

Like youngsters of today, they had a love of music, but again fashions have changed.

“On Summer Sunday evenings, a different venue was used for the 'Circumvating parade' and its romantic outcomes. A very elegant bandstand stood central on Christ's Pieces. It was enclosed by a good sized area fenced in by hedging and railings. Underfoot was a tarmac floor and there were mixed coloured lights on the roof of the building. This venue was universally known as 'On the Prom'. On Sunday evenings there would appear, from far and near, a military-type Band. Its members clad in brilliant uniforms, all toting shining beautiful brass or silver-coated instruments, always a big drum, lots of small cornets, larger euphoniums, larger still double bass 'Goliaths'. A programme was of stirring lovely music, a march by Alford, extracts from Gilbert and Sullivan, Viennese waltzes, or from the Shows. Entry to the hallowed area and a seat cost the princely sum of three pence. The other alternative, apart from sitting on the grass, was the circular gyrating round the outside of the enclosure in the hope of getting to know a member of the other gender.

“There was no vandalism, no 'Hoodies', no fights, and a good understanding of it being the Sabbath. On some weekday evenings, there would be a dance held in the enclosure, again for a very small entrance fee. A band of some four or five musicians would supply the dance music. One certainty was the quickness of worn out shoes due to the asphalt surface! In those peaceful days there was seldom a thought of what was to come later in 1939,” Victor recalls

Villagers too used to know how to enjoy themselves, especially on Feast day.

“I can remember lots of very wide eyed children who could hardly take in what had happened to their village street, but who were determined to be in on the fun, waving, jumping up and down with excitement, or chasing the balloons which occasionally broke loose. The mixed sounds of the jazz band, cheering, choruses, and steam whistles seemed to echo the blend of relaxation, worship and work which make up village life. Thousands of people thronged the stall, tents and the arena. They bought and sold, listened and learned. Strolled and sat in the sun and, over and above everything else, had a jolly good afternoon.”

But this is not something from the 1930s – that was a description of the Cherry Hinton festival of 1985. I had the pleasure of attending last year's fair and have booked my diary for September 8th this year too. It really is a good old-fashioned community event. If you've any connection with Cherry Hinton – or even if you haven't - you should really not miss it. Contact Karoline Sparkes - [karoline.clive@ntlworld.com] for more details. Memories 18 July 2007 by Mike Petty

Gavin Holman from Harrogate seeks your help. He is carrying out research on the history of brass bands in local communities, and asks if you know of any information about extinct bands in this area.

The late 19th and early 20th centuries were the "golden age" for these bands numbering, it is said, up to 40,000 distinct bands at their peak. Many of these were associated with local industries, often being a "works" band. Others provided a musical focus for many small towns and villages in the days before the gramophone and the wireless. Today only some 1,500 or so are left active in the UK. Sadly many of the bands left little in the way of information about their existence, and what does exist is widely scattered with individuals, local archives and national collections.

Part of Gavin's task is to identify these lost bands and collect together material to provide a central database. So any information you can provide would be gratefully received. Even knowing that a particular band existed is significant to him.

Much of the information he's collected is available online, as a freely available resource, at <http://www.ibew.co.uk>. I've browsed his files. In it there are references to the Cambridge Salvation Army, City of Cambridge and Cambridge University Brass Bands, though with little of their history. There's also March Brass 2000 which was formed in 1891 when the town boasted the largest railway marshalling and storage yard in Europe. It was known as the March Railway Silver Band until they changed their name to mark the new millennium.

Gavin has notes on Littleport Brass Band who were started about 1880 with Teddy Dring as the first bandmaster while Chatteris Town Band can trace its history back to 1882 and Wicken first came together to celebrate the Coronation of King George V in 1911.

But do you know more about these or other bands that no longer exist.

To start the ball rolling I've checked for mentions of brass bands that I've carried in my 'Looking Back' column over the last decade. They include reference to a Saffron Walden Brass Band who played for the town's proclamation of King Edward VII in 1901, and for the Rev Latimer Neville's jubilee as rector of Heydon – he was also Master of Magdalene College at the time.

Sawston Brass Band – looking remarkably smart in their new uniforms – welcomed returning soldiers from the Boer War at Linton in July 1901 – and headed their village Friendly Society parade in July 1902. That month Haverhill Old Brass Band played at a Sunday School treat – when 1,500 children were attired in their summer dresses – while in August Newmarket Town Band entertained the King of Barotseland when he visited Dalham

In July 1904 the News reported: "Isleham band furnishes a striking example of what can be accomplished by steady and determined work. It was only formed a year ago but has become an important and appreciated institution. Its members have had to work hard and faced their first public performance on the occasion of the Harvest Festival last October with trepidation. Recently they have given short open-air sacred concerts on the green on Sunday evenings after the services at the various places of worship. It is to be hoped that their success will stir up the inhabitants of other villages". But what happened to them?

The Cambridgeshire Collection's files include photographs of Burwell and Soham Excelsior, Fordham, Fulbourn, Haddenham, Ickleton and Manea bands from the pre Great-War period.

In July 1923 Ely City military band held its first annual dinner when the Chairman referred to the earlier Volunteer and the Cambridgeshire militia bands. It was greatly to the advantage of the town that they had been able to form such an excellent band as they had now. That was a thing that every citizen in Ely could congratulate himself on, he said. The Band continues to flourish.

In 1927 the Cambridge Albion and Cambridge Town Bands amalgamated to form the Cambridge Silver Band. They decided to buy a complete set of new triple silver-plated instruments made by Messrs Hawkes of London including the famous 'Profundo' basses as played by the St Hilda Colliery Band. This would greatly improve the tonal qualities of the band and there was not another in the eastern counties with such instruments

Neither of them had taken part in a Brass Band Contest held in Cambridge Guildhall two years earlier. In fact the Cambridge Railway Silver Band was the only local competitor – but they won it to great excitement. “There was a furore of applause from the large audience present, and the bandsmen themselves momentarily lost their heads in their enthusiasm. The dignity of the large hall, which had rung for well nigh two hours with the blare of brass instruments was quite forgotten. Hats were thrown high into the air and trombones and cornets waved to delighted friends among the audience” the News commented.

But when in November 1980 there was a local brass band championship it was Soham Comrades’ Band who won, snatching the title from Littleport with Chatteris Town Band third. In the contest for small bands Waterbeach took the first prize, Wicken was second, followed by Cottenham, Haddenham and Burwell.

Now all this is doubtless very patchy – but its over to you to fill in some of the gaps and ensure our musicians are not forgotten.

Please let me know at the News but also tell Gavin so that he can add it to his files. You can email him at gavin@ibew.co.uk or drop me a line and I’ll put you in touch

Memories 25th July 2007, by Mike Petty

The monsoon summer has brought floods to many areas of the country. It may be unusual but it is not unique. There was a spate of flooding in 1968 when St Neots was inundated in July, Broughton was cut off in August and Newmarket, Linton and Sawston were amongst the places that suffered in September after torrential rain brought renewed chaos. More recently on 7th August 1981 the region was counting the cost following storms that saw at least five homes in Cambridge damaged by lightning together with two at Abington and water eight inches deep in houses in Eaton Socon. Then last year a cloudburst saw water flowing dramatically down village streets.

But in August 1912 there were only five rainless days throughout the whole of the month – though April had seen a record drought. Things came to a climax on Monday 26th when a tropical downpour lasting twelve hours produced six inches of rain before mid-afternoon. Rivers could not cope with the deluge, the banks gave way on the Little Ouse and crops were abandoned. At Yaxley the Black Horse river burst its banks and water spread as far as Holme woods where the great Whittlesey mere – drained in the 1850s - re-emerged. Smoke hung over the fen as the coal-fired pumping stations worked at full pressure to try and keep pace with the rush of water through the breached banks. Corn shocks floated, hay fields were ruined and many root crops had to be left to rot. It was the worst flooding within living memory.

Although Cambridge itself escaped it organised collections for people in Norwich who experienced something of the trauma currently being witnessed again. [SCAN OF HARVESTING BY BOAT AT RAMSEY 1912]

Another issue currently in the headlines has been the proposals to charge motorists to enter and leave Cambridge at peak times. This again is not a new suggestion. Cambridge Town Council used to charge a toll for all carts crossing Silver Street bridge (though people came in early and left late to avoid paying) until it was challenged by local businessmen in 1824 and the charges pronounced illegal. The council claimed the money went to maintain the roads, but they had previously been so inefficient that a new body – the Cambridge Improvement Commissioners – had been given the responsibility instead.

But there were other charges. In the 1700's turnpike trusts were set up with tollgates where travellers had to pay to pass. In 1730 Cambridge residents petitioned parliament after a gate was erected at Trumpington which meant they had to pay to leave Cambridge, even if they were only going to water their cattle. A turnpike road notice still stands in Castle Street, [SCAN OF TURNPIKE NOTICE, CASTLE STREET] with former toll houses on Newmarket Road and Chesterton Lane. This latter continued until 1852 when as Town Clerk, Charles Henry Cooper recorded 'the Turnpike Gate which had long been obnoxious to the inhabitants of the Town was entirely removed'. Most tollgates were removed within the next 30 years although one continued between Burwell and Fordham until December 1905 and another on the road from Chatteris to St Ives until the 1920s. [PHOTO OF CAR AT BURWELL TURNPIKE GATE DEC 1905 - THERE IS A PICTURE OF THE NEWMARKET ROAD TOLL HOUSE IN NEWS LIBRARY]

But communications are the lifeblood of a town, as St Ives discovered back in the 1820s. It was a major centre of the cattle trade with cows from Scotland, Ireland and the North of England driven down to be rested and fattened on the commons before being sold at their market and taken on to Smithfield in London. It was also an important distribution point for goods brought by river and a major hub of road communications with links to Huntingdon, Somersham and Earith on the north side of the river and to Cambridge and Godmanchester to the south. However traffic was frequently held up due to flooding of the Great Ouse washes so a new causeway was constructed to carry travellers to the historic chapel bridge. But when they tried to raise extra tolls to pay for the work people boycotted St Ives and started going to Huntingdon instead. When they were abolished in 1833 a great crowd assembled to watch the tollgate taken off its hinges; the town band turned out, the church bells rang and there was a brilliant display of fireworks.

Perhaps if the Cambridge charges come in it will be their turn to benefit. [SCAN OF CROWDS ON THE HISTORIC CHAPEL BRIDGE AT ST IVES (NOT THE CAUSEWAY BRIDGE THAT LEADS UP TO IT)]

Memories August 1st 2007, by Mike Petty

Recent news headlines have been of people queuing for water in the flood-stricken areas of the country.

But queuing for water has been a concern here too. During an 11-month drought in 1976 the taps in various parts of the county did little but gurgle and gasp as supplies ran out and standpipes were erected in village streets. They returned during the water-workers strike of 1983. [SCAN OF SHELFORD STAND PIPE 1976]

Just fifty years ago, in July 1957 the News sent their – then young – reporter Colin Moule [LATER EDITOR OF THE CAMBRIDGE WEEKLY NEWS] to investigate the situation in Duxford. "In the village water is at present like gold: like an oasis in a vast desert", he found.

There were 63 known wells in the village, the previous year 40 had dried up and 13 others were unsatisfactory. Dr J. York Moore of Sawston, who had been monitoring the situation for some time, told him that wells had been drying up earlier each year - in August 1955, in July 1956 and June 1957. One had stopped working in June 1956 and had not been used since.

Miss Harriett Hewitt, then 74-years-old, lived in a four-roomed cottage in Ickleton Road. The well she shared with some of her neighbours had dried up and she had to go once a day to a pump about 250 yards away to fetch water. "If I want extra water, then I have to go twice", she declared. "I think it is terrible". Mrs Pamela Jones, a housewife with two small children who lived in St John's Street, obtained her water from a pump about 200 yards from her home. "I have to go about three or four times a day", she said.

Villagers criticised the delay by South Cambs RDC in not going ahead with a comprehensive scheme for piped water from Dotterell Hall. The council promised Duxford would get water in 'about a years time'. Lewis Todd, the News' cartoonist came up with his own interpretation of the situation. [SCAN OF NEWS REPORT AND CARTOON]

But they were not alone. In 1945 an official county council report showed that less than half of rural homes had piped water, the others had to work for every drop at the pump or well. Often this meant a considerable walk, one in five households were over 100 yards away from a pump, and on arrival there might be a queue.

Even if you had the luxury of a pump opposite your front door it was a mixed blessing as from six o'clock in the morning onwards there was an almost incessant squeaking and rattling as people came for water. It took fourteen full strokes to fill an average size bucket, remembered Miss E.M. Barraud of Lt Eversden, who could judge it to the half-inch even in complete darkness. Not that she went to the pump after dark, except in an emergency - only amateurs or natives afflicted with town visitors given to endless ablutions went to the pump at night. At least pumping was a sociable business; in just half-an-hour you could see almost everybody, hear all the news and more than all the scandal. [SCAN OF PUMP AT STAPLEFORD]

But plans for piped water were resisted by many parish councils. When in 1922 Ely Rural District Council announced that it intended to go ahead with a scheme the Stretham representative voiced his opposition claiming the natural supply was good and ample. However Mr Savidge the village baker disagreed. Half the population, he said, used one pump and that was subject to contamination from the roads. Whenever it rained the water supply was muddy. "I cannot drink it, nor can I get other people to eat it" he complained, adding "I dare not go to the Parish Council meeting for fear they crucified me, because everybody there was against it. Everybody in Stretham would like good water, but they don't want to pay for it". It was 1931 before piped water finally came.

Even in go-ahead places like Littleport water was not always on tap. In 1921 as temperatures rose ever higher the water supply dried up and lorries had to be brought in from Ely, with men women and children queuing for water at a half-penny a bucket. [SCAN OF PUMP AT LITTLEPORT 1905 – NB THIS DOES NOT SHOW THEM QUEUING TO BUY WATER]

Today one can buy bottled water with added flavours such as apple, lime or elderflower. This too was something our forefathers knew all about – only it was somewhat different. In 1889 one correspondent to the Cambridge Daily News described his village's water as 'covered with a green, slimy substance, and full of living creatures and to add to its high flavour most of the liquids from the adjoining farmyard closets and pig sties are drained into it'

And – some old timers will claim - "It never did me no harm!"

Memories 8th August 2007, by Mike Petty

Cambridge is a city that seems constantly to be changing. People making their way down St Andrew’s Street recently cannot have been unaware of the disappearance of Bradwell’s Court.

In its day it was seen as pioneer in city centre shopping – Cambridge’s first shopping arcade. It brought an additional 20 new shops and showrooms in a continuous covered walkway from Drummer Street bus station to the city centre. There was a courtyard in the centre that would get sunshine all the year round while a three-story block facing Drummer Street would provide a waiting room for bus passengers with offices on the upper floors. There would even be a basement car park for 21 cars and over 100 cycles.

The Court had been a joint venture between two colleges - Jesus and Christ’s - and Ravenscroft Properties and was designed by the Cambridge architects, Hughes and Bicknell who took special care that the scheme harmonised with the adjoining college buildings.

While Cambridge gained up-to-date shopping it had lost two old areas. One was Bradwell’s Yard which had included cottages as Paul Griffin, one-time head of Cambridge Anglo-World Language Centre recalled in the News back in September 1987. His recollections will jog many other memories.

“It was 1946 and my wife and I, newly-married, had to find somewhere to live in Cambridge. Everything was in short supply and the best we could discover was a very thin cottage sandwiched in a row of buildings in Bradwell’s Yard. The cottage was used by Mr Roe, an antiques dealer for storing furniture but he agreed to store it somewhere else and put in an electric supply. There were only three small rooms occupying the same number of floors. There was no bath, no washbasin, an open-air lavatory across the yard shared with the next cottage and the only source of water was a tap over a sink. But it became home. We were happy in that little cottage, but thank goodness it is in the past now”, he concluded.

The Bradwell family were builders. One had worked on Clare College in the 1660s and another is commemorated on a tombstone against the wall of St Andrew the Great church just across the road. He was David Bradwell who designed the Victoria Homes almshouses in Victoria Road in 1837 while a namesake occupied the yard until it was demolished for the arcade in 1958

The new redevelopment also saw the end of Christ’s Lane which had linked St Andrew’s and Drummer Streets. It could get muddy, as a correspondent to the News complained back in 1897: “During the last two years it has been a veritable quagmire, I came through last evening and the mud was several inches thick through the lane. When is Christ's Lane to be paved in such a manner that that it shall be as pleasant to walk through as it is walking across Christ's Pieces? ”

Nor was it always a quick route as Mrs J. Jenner of Bourn recalled in June 1999: “There was a toll bar about half way up which was always open, except for Rag Day. Then the students held it shut and put sludge around it about an inch thick and ten inches long. This meant that people passing had to give them something to walk through the small gap in the sludge. The opening was only wide enough for one person at a time to pass. They gave mums with prams a helping hand by lifting the pram over the barrier”.

The barrier had put been there to deter traffic though in June 1924 a Spanish student was killed when he swung his motor cycle into the lane at speed and ran into it.

The City Council wanted the barrier removed in May 1952 so that the Lane could be opened out as a thoroughfare to be used by buses. This would alleviate congestion and provide relief for Emmanuel Street. – something that never happened.

But for many the main memory will be of the man who looked after people's bags. Jim Wooders sat by the wall near Milton's Walk to watch the parcels and sometimes cases, when people had a long wait for coaches. He charged according to the length of time parcels were there. Those to be collected before noon were placed on his right, between then and two p.m. were in front, and two to four or five on his left. He charged 1/- a parcel for each period of time. Each customer was greeted by 'Good Morning' or 'Good Afternoon' and he touched his cap to lady customers.”

Whatever happens in the new development, that is one facility that would be appreciated.

Memories 13th August 2007, by Mike Petty

Longstowe is a small seemingly insignificant village of around 300 inhabitants, spread out sparingly along two roads, the A1198 and the B1046 just south of Caxton. It has no facilities except a fairly decrepit village hall.

To its community however, it is home, to some a lifetime's home. In common with many villages, it consists of newcomers and 'old village', but the 'old village' is fast disappearing as young people move out and the elderly pass on. Now a number of residents have set themselves the task of capturing and distilling what is left of living memory, as Jane Bowden has written to tell me

Her own research into village history began with the home she first rented. St John's Farmhouse had once belonged to St John's College Cambridge whose archivist, Malcolm Underwood, was able to show her masses of documents. They included diaries recording the Bursar's annual visits to the farm which describe how he took the train from Cambridge to Longstowe (a station closed by Beeching in the 1960's) and walked the eight mile walk back at the end of the day. They are laced with local gossip and character descriptions of the family who lived and worked the land between 1838 and 1897. By good chance, Jane also met a lovely lady who was in service at the farm during the 1930's, and after a search of the internet tracked down the family of a former tenant of the farm in 1623.

However history is not just old documents. When mains drainage arrived various interesting domestic objects turned up in the trenches dug to connect the house to the sewer, including an old flat iron, tethering rings, and a lot of nice old bottles and bits of pot. General maintenance one summer meant that the front of the house was removed to reveal the internal wooden frame structure, which she took photographs of.

Since then Jane has moved down the road to Glebe House, the original part of which was probably built in the mid 1600's. She's come across the will of a Rev John Crosse 1729 in which he bequeathed the house to the church. But there was also an extended Crosse family living in Longstowe at that time, which has set her off on another quest.

In fact she has become hooked on the history of the whole village, spending hours in the County Record Office working through the parish registers. Then there are books to read, the internet to search – but they may be there another day. People's memories may not.

Dick Murden, one of the 'old' villagers, has over the years become a custodian of village photographs, artefacts, maps and a fund of knowledge. Lately, he has been particularly keen to get down on paper as much of his treasure trove of information as possible, trawling his own and other people's memories for anecdotes and family stories.

Dick was educated at Longstowe School, which closed in 1961, and he was there during the war years which gives his account of school life an extra dimension. And just a few years ago, as if by miracle, the school Log Book from 1920-1961 turned up in a neighbouring village, in the back shed of a house once occupied by the late headmistress.

After school Dick went to work on the farms. He remembers in detail the rhythm of the seasons' work, and the day-to-day labour on the land, vividly recalling the constant activity and sounds which were a part of every farmyard. The farms have now largely disappeared, and those remaining have changed beyond recognition.

If you have similar memories that can help the village record more of its past then email Jane - jane@ftls.co.uk - or drop me a line and I'll put you in touch.

And If you are researching your own village or area of Cambridge I'd love to hear from you – perhaps other readers can help

Wander through the centre of Cambridge in August and the air is full of the sound of every language under the sun. French, German, Italian, Spanish – and a host of others. It can present problems for the police to whom they sometimes look for assistance.

But 100 years ago the problem, though magnified by an influx of 1,400 people from across the globe, was simpler. For many of them were all speaking the same language, Esperanto.

In August 1907 Cambridge was hosting the third International Congress of the artificial language that had been created during the period 1877-1885 by a Pole, Dr Ludovik L. Zamenhof. He'd intended that it should become the second language of all the different-speaking peoples of the world

The News was not slow to welcome the visitors for the concept had seized Cambridge like a raging fever. “Genuine and spurious Esperanto fills the air as the autolycus of the gutter shouts unintelligent jargon to a street comrade and calls it Esperanto. But when a picturesque figure from the Swiss Canton appeared in the street the impudence of the street Arab was silenced. He was impressed by the tight green breeches and head capped by genuine Alpine hat. A Turk and Indians in national costume add considerably to the effect of this new kind of circus”, it reported.

The newspaper covered the events in great detail with one article actually in Esperanto. Even a sermon by the Rev J.C. Rust, Vicar of Soham, vice-president of the British Esperanto Association, was reported virtually word for word. It was the first to have been preached in the new language and was enthusiastically received by a packed congregation at Great St Mary's. A similar address was given to the Catholic delegates at Our Lady's church.

The Rev Rust had been one of the supporters when a society for the promotion of Esperanto within the University and Town was set up in October 1905. They had met in the home of Dr George Cunningham on Kings Parade when Alex Wood had been amongst those advocating classes for teaching the language. One of the early converts was Miss Mary Start, a remarkable lady: though blind from birth she was a professional masseuse, played chess and had read practically every book published in Braille.

The University gave a formal welcome to delegates at the Fitzwilliam Museum and there was a reception in the Fellows' Garden of King's College. But hopes that of an honorary degree being bestowed upon the language's inventor were disappointed. Various senior academics participated. The Professor of Latin, J.E.B. Mayor, gave a speech but he was upstaged by one of Cambridge's greatest 'characters', Oscar Browning of King's College. He dressed up in a green swallow-tail coat to take the part of Samuel Pickwick in an adaptation of the trial scene from 'Pickwick Papers' at the New Theatre.

There was a military display on Midsummer Common – though it was somewhat embarrassing that the band played the wrong national anthem – and many Esperantists attended the sports organised by Cambridge Police Athletic Society. There Dr Zamenhof presented an Esperanto Cup for the policeman who had performed the most efficient ambulance work. It went to Sergeant Gates for his action in saving the life of a man who had taken poison.

But this was not the first contact the policeman had established with the group. For he had been on duty as the delegates from around the world had made their way to the Guildhall at the start of their meeting. They had been keen to try out their newly-acquired linguistic skills. One word they were successful with was 'policano', though some had problems with the pronunciation. Here Sergeant Gates had been able to help, for he was an Esperantist with a better understanding of the language than many members of the Congress.

Perhaps this was first example of Cambridge police demonstrating the language skills that officers on patrol in the city centre need to exercise every day.

Memories 27th August 2007 by Mike Petty

The problems of commuting to Cambridge on the A14 continue to dominate the headlines. One answer for at least some people may be the Guided Bus route that is now being constructed.

It is an idea that has been going the rounds since at least May 1981 when ecologists proposed a bus which could run on railway lines as the solution to transport problems in local villages. It would travel from Cambridge city centre to Huntingdon using British Rail's tracks, with stops at Mill Road, Chesterton and North Arbury as well as the former stations en route to Swavesey. From that point the lines had already been removed but it would run along the trackbed to St Ives and the Hemingfords. Time may tell whether the idea will prove successful.

But David Hurry remembers back to 1966 when he started work at the Hills Road depot of Eastern Counties and travelled in on the company's prestige Route 151. This linked Peterborough, Huntingdon and Cambridge and was always worked by the newest buses. He recalls:

"Journey time from Huntingdon to Cambridge was scheduled to be 50 minutes along the old A604, diverting only into Fenstanton. The road was then a three lane single carriageway. There were proper bus stops at the turns to both the Hemingfords, Land Settlement Turn,

Conington & Fen Drayton Turn, Boxworth & Swavesey Turn (Trinity Foot), Lolworth Turn and Dry Drayton Turn. Some had bus shelters but others did not, so they were very windswept, the road being rather exposed. Stopping at these points would be unthinkable on the present-day A14, yet there were also unofficial custom-and- practice stops at just about every farm gate.

“Service 151 was always worked by 'country' crews, so passengers saw familiar faces. George Goult and Lydia South were the best crew, Lydia always calling out every stop very precisely as it was being approached, then giving George two bells to continue, or one to stop, long before he needed to start slowing down. They really did get the best out of their bus and always made up any lost time. There was another driver, Ernie Garlick, an American, who often sang to himself as he was driving along. It was not unusual for him to swing the steering wheel from side to side in time with what he was singing. The front of the bus would noticeably keep changing direction, even on a perfectly straight road, but it never caused any problems.”

One of the long-serving drivers for Premier Travel was Fred ‘Smudger’ Smith who remembers some of the coaches he drove on the London run in the 1950’s. “GV 5160 was a good one but BAJ 161 used to kick you like a donkey when you swung the handle to start it. With the Daimlers you had to watch that gearchange pedal or it would knock your foot back. The AEC Regal (BGV 401) was a lovely vehicle but a rum 'un to drive! It had a high speed back axle and low speed steering. The heater was very good and the cab was always nice and warm. I drove it back from London one night when the smog was really bad. It took me 7 hours and 20 minutes to get from King's Cross to Haverhill. (The official journey time was 2 hours and 53 minutes.) My conductor, Jimmy Farrar, walked in front as far as Whipps Cross and I don't think I changed up a gear until I got to Bishop's Stortford. I went for a wash at the Acme Cafe at Stortford and I was yellow!”

There were other hazards too in the days before flashing indicators. In July 1955 bus driver Patrick Conway told Cambridge magistrates he’d been travelling along Newmarket Road, intending to turn right. He gave a hand signal and pulled into the centre of the road. As he did so a car behind began to overtake forcing a motorcyclist to swerve. The motorist said he thought the bus had stopped for passengers. One answer would be for conductors in Cambridge to give hand signals from the rear of the bus to supplement those of the driver, as they did in London. But quite how would one indicate a right turn from the back of a bus? And do you remember hand signals anyway?

The conductors were the people who had most contact with passengers. Amongst them were Frances Jeffrey who worked the Cambridge buses together with her driver-husband Jeff for fourteen years until March 1984, though probably the best-known of all was Gladys Hughes who was a conductress with Eastern Counties for 42 years, issuing ‘billions of tickets’ before retiring in December 1983.

Now Paul Carter has researched the story of all Cambridgeshire’s bus and coach operators in the postwar period for his new book ‘Cambridge 2’ in the ‘Super Prestige’ series by Venture Publications. (ISBN 978 1905 304 158 £17.95). It includes many small operators including Jennings of Haslingfield, Percivals, Progressive and Fordham and District who on one occasion sent a 32-seater to take Lode cricket team to Harston. They found that almost everybody in the village wanted to go to support them. The coach eventually left with around 65 passengers on board, including the local policeman!

Memories 30th August 2007 by Mike Petty

Life on the buses is not just a matter of driving and conducting: there is the essential back-room work too, as David Hurry recalls in a new book.

I joined Eastern Counties at their Cambridge depot in 1966 as Office Junior, General Dogsbody and Teaboy, although my official title was Depot Trainee. I soon gained experience in the enquiry office (attached to the garage), cash office, operations office, private hire department and stores.

The main business at Hills Road was operations. The cash office employed four staff who just counted cash. Uniforms for crews were delivered as required from a central store. New staff did not always get new clothes! Maintenance was done mainly at the Newmarket Road workshops.

The prestige route was the 151 to Peterborough which was always worked by the newest buses and was the one David used each morning get in from Huntingdon. It was a much easier ride in those days.

“Journey time from Huntingdon to Cambridge was scheduled to be 50 minutes along the old A604, diverting only into Fenstanton. The road was then a three lane single carriageway. There were proper bus stops at the turns to both the Hemingfords, Land Settlement Turn, Conington & Fen Drayton Turn, Boxworth & Swavesey Turn (Trinity Foot), Lolworth Turn and Dry Drayton Turn. Some had bus shelters but others did not, so they were very windswept, the road being rather exposed. Stopping at these points would be unthinkable on the present-day A14, yet there were also unofficial custom-and- practice stops at just about every farm gate.

“Service 151 was always worked by 'country' crews, so passengers saw familiar faces. George Goult and Lydia South were the best crew, Lydia always calling out every stop very precisely as it was being approached, then giving George two bells to continue, or one to stop, long before he needed to start slowing down. They really did get the best out of their bus and always made up any lost time. There was another driver, Ernie Garlick, an American, who often sang to himself as he was driving along. It was not unusual for him to swing the steering wheel from side to side in time with what he was singing. The front of the bus would noticeably keep changing direction, even on a perfectly straight road, but it never caused any problems.”

One of the long-serving drivers for Premier Travel was Fred ‘Smudger’ Smith who recalls his memories of some of the coaches he drove on the London run. “GV 5160 was a good one but BAJ 161 used to kick you like a donkey when you swung the handle to start it. With the Daimlers you had to watch that gearchange pedal or it would knock your foot back. The AEC Regal [BGV 401] was a lovely vehicle but a rum 'un to drive! It had a high speed back axle and low speed steering. The heater was very good and the cab was always nice and warm. I drove it back from London one night when the smog was really bad. It took me 7 hours and 20 minutes to get from King's Cross to Haverhill. (The official journey time was 2 hours and 53 minutes.) My conductor, Jimmy Farrar, walked in front as far as Whipps Cross and I don't think I changed up a gear until I got to Bishop's Stortford. I went for a wash at the Acme Cafe at Stortford and I was yellow!"

In the 1950s there were other operators. Fordham and District bought a new coach in 1953, but the roof leaked and soaked the local cricket team. On one occasion they sent a 32-seater to take Lode cricket team to Harston but found that almost everybody in the village wanted to go to support them. The coach eventually left with around 65 passengers on board, including the local policeman!

Memories by Mike Petty 3rd September 2007

This Saturday it's Cherry Hinton Festival when the Recreation Ground in the High Street will be filled with fairground amusements, stalls, pat dogs, skateboards, Morris Dancers, Samba bands, folk music and a variety of entertainment. It's an occasion for Cherry Hinton folk, old and new, to celebrate their community, but they also welcome 'outsiders' too.

A stranger can often appreciate things that residents take for granted as Chester Jones reflected when he visited Cherry Hinton in March 1927. "There is something highly delightful in strolling through a village looking for attractive houses and cottages and other architectural fragments which may remain. The hideousness of more recent buildings often makes the search a difficult one."

Amongst the items he singled out was the parish church of St Andrew which still stands much as he saw it. Then he continued his exploration: "the charming Red Lion with its tiny window panes is presided over by a tall and stately fir tree. Opposite are two old semi-detached cottages whose plastered walls are a colourful orange. Close to them is perhaps the ugliest house in Cherry Hinton, but we need not dwell on it. Further down the lane, if we can get through the mud, we shall see some more old houses and a great barn on which innumerable persons have cut their names and initials."

He was concerned that steps should be taken to preserve what had survived: "Several cottages are in a sorry condition and should be repaired at once; judicious restoration can do much to make tumbled-down dwellings once more safe and comfortable to live in. Near to the Red Lion is an old house of red brick, delightful in its simplicity. Its sound state of preservation is in striking contrast to the group of ghostly cottages near the railway crossing which are now in a sad state within and after every high wind are less and less like human habitations. To repair them is now beyond the realms of possibility. On the other side of the railway, at Church End, are several thatched cottages and one with a pleasant mansard roof."

Even 80 years ago people were lamenting the changes. "The discerning stranger notices the incongruity of new houses, the hideousness of garage signs and those monstrosities which our happy-go-lucky methods have allowed to spoil the character".

But all was not lost: "The straggling and untidy appearance of Cherry Hinton is partly due to the yellow brick erections of the last century, but a great deal could be done to improve it. The pleasing red colour wash on the walls of the Hall Farm is a step in the right direction. Among other things, grass might be persuaded to grown neatly in the proper places and the pond, pleasant as it is with a background of big trees, could be much improved."

Cherry Hinton had one redeeming feature: "there is a surrounding belt of agricultural and park land isolating the village from the neighbouring inhabited areas. The greatest care should be taken to protect this from building".

Reflecting how beautiful England must have been a hundred years before, Chester lamented that man cannot have loved the countryside for he had done little to beautify it and a great deal to spoil it. He concluded: "There is enormous scope for improvement and recovery if there can be aroused sufficient public understanding and enthusiasm to suppress the activities of pernicious persons and gradually wipe out all evidence of their energies".

The buildings may have changed, the old times passed away, but the Cherry Hinton festival captures something of the atmosphere of olden days, making it well worth a visit. And if you are interested in days gone by then come along to the History Marquee where you'll find Michelle Bullivant from the Cherry Hinton Local History Society, Bernard Amps who'll help you trace your family history, the Cambridge Preservation Society, displays from the Cambridge Folk and Soham Community Museum, along with antiquarians, archivists, archaeologists and others who have a passion for the past and a joy in sharing it with you.

And while you're there see what survives of the Cherry Hinton that Chester Jones sketched 80 years ago.

Cherry Hinton Festival on the High Street Recreation Ground will be held Saturday 8th September from 11 to 6pm with a grand opening by a Dalek at noon

Judy Wilson is seeking memories of Matthew's, the grocery store and café in Trinity Street, as she's writing the history of the firm and the family. In particular she's trying to track down details of a tragedy.

In her research, Judy has come across two brief mentions of a fire above the shop when a girl was burnt to death. She has a copy of a page of the Cambridge Daily News of May 26th 1948, when an old newspaper seller was recalling his memories. He reports that he was selling papers when this tragedy happened, about 50 years before. Someone she's met in Impington also has a recollection of being told the story. It could have been at the very end of the 19th century or early 20th century. Does anyone know any more about this incident?

What is known is that in 1829, David Matthew, aged just 20, travelled from London to Cambridge. Only three years later he established the business of what became Matthew & Son at 19-21 Trinity Street in the premises where Heffers Bookshop is now. David was the first of just five members of the Matthew family, over just three generations, who were to run the grocery and wine business for the next 130 years.

Deliveries were made three times a day, in 1913 still largely by eleven horse-drawn vehicles though by 1922 they had moved on to motor vans. Orders could be made by telephone (Cambridge 15) and the firm had two telephone lines. Their staff also called to take orders personally, daily at the Colleges and twice a week at customers' homes in the town.

Cambridge residents and former members of staff who remember Matthew and Son always mention the smell of coffee. A large coffee roaster stood in the window and beans were freshly ground for each customer. But tea was also a feature of the shop, "specially blended to suit the water of the district". By 1936, their catalogue listed 40 blends of tea compared to 18 blends in 1913. Whether you preferred coffee or tea you had to have milk – and that was delivered straight to your door. There were a number of dairies who used horse-drawn milk floats but do you remember when it came direct from the cow? David Swann from Scotland Road tells me that he's heard that milk used to be delivered to Trinity Hall on the hoof – the cow was driven up to the college and milked on the spot. But do you remember this happening – and does anyone have a photo. [5682 - SCAN OF MILKMAN IN SCOTLAND ROAD 1920's]

Paul Griffin has emailed from Southwold with his memories of Bradwell's Yard where he lived in a cottage owned by Stanley Woolston, who was the soul of kindness to an impoverished post-war couple. Stanley was an antique dealer who numbered Queen Mary amongst his clients. She would occasionally appear at the entrance to the yard or at a window of the shop and look out on the chaos of bicycles and washing amongst the mean dwellings. Paul asks to see a picture of it before it was swept away for Bradwell's Court. [SCAN 6814 – BRADWELL'S YARD 1930's]

Mrs S. Bristow from Cambridge has fond memories of Longstowe, the village in which both her parents were born about 1910. Her father, George Webb, ran a coal firm with his family while her mum, born Margaret Franklin, came from a large family of nine children. Most of her brothers emigrated to Canada and fought with the Canadian army during the First World War, another joined up under age and was killed in the front line shortly after landing in France. Many of her family lie at rest in the village churchyard.

Last week the News broke the story of the proposal for an outdoor ice skating rink on Parker's Piece. It would, said the organisers be the first time the city had had hosted such an attraction. But we've had them before.

The first three months of 1895 were bitterly cold: frosts of 15 to 20 degrees every night froze vast areas of ice and led to skating matches in the fens. At Newnham a Mr Bartholomew flooded four fields and waited for nature to do her bit. Then he installed a floodlight generator and with good ice, a bright moon and music by the University Volunteer Band who sat 'enclosed in walls of snow', an enjoyable time was had by all until half-past ten. The Cambridge Express described the scene: the ground was 'brilliantly lighted with powerful arc lamps and had been enclosed with canvas which was studded with myriads of Chinese lanterns'. His 'ice carnivals' attracted several hundred people who flocked to skate – many in fancy dress. There were crowds of cooks, clowns, proctors, bulldogs and clergymen. Not all were what they seemed.

Enid Porter, the late curator of the Cambridge Folk Museum, recorded a Tale from the Fens told by Chafer Legge who lived near the Ship Inn at Brandon Creek. It was there that he met a University Professor and they got talking about fen skating. Then Chafer got a letter from Mrs Henry Sidgwick, the Principal of Newnham College, who invited him to travel to Cambridge and teach her students to skate. It was an adventure not to be missed.

Chafer recalled: "We walked down to the river with a crowd of happy young women following us, and what a time they had, and so did I. I never expected to have so many pretty wenches throwing their arms round my neck to keep themselves from falling over. A lot of college chaps were soon on the spot, wanting to lend a helping hand, but they were chased away by a couple of 'Vice Principals' – thin as harnsters (herons) and looking as happy as dying ducks in a thunderstorm".

One thing he noticed was that there seemed to be a lot of parsons – including five archdeacons and two bishops - skating and talking to the girls, so he asked one of the college chaps about it. The undergraduate said that only parsons and curates were allowed in Newnham College – a women-only college - but you could hire the outfits for five bob from a little shop in Petty Cury. Those clothes had been in Newnham College so many times that they could find their way there without anyone inside them!

The skating in 1895 proved so popular that a concert by Marie Lloyd due to be held in the Arcade Music Hall had to be cancelled and the venue closed down. The Arcade had been opened by Ernie Hayward, an enterprising local concert promoter, in the original Corn Exchange building on the corner of Downing Street. It had previously been used as a shopping mall until 1884. Now the new Grand Arcade shopping centre is being built nearby

It was probably there that an indoor skating rink opened in January 1876 though it did not last long. More recently plans for a skating rink in Barnwell Road in 1980 came to nothing while in April 1981 Cambridge City Football Club announced that it hoped to set up a rink at their Milton Road ground using synthetic ice. It would be housed in a semi-permanent aluminium and heavy-duty PVC structure which could also be used for five-a-side football, tennis and exhibitions. They hoped it would prove a licence to print money. But like many such schemes it failed to prosper. Perhaps the new one will prove more successful.

None of this was on Parker's Piece – but it has been used for skating before. In the hard winter of February 1963 the Piece became covered with packed ice & snow which was swept away to provide a rink on which many demonstrated their skills. Do you remember it?

Memories 24th September 2007, by Mike Petty

Recent Memories articles have encouraged readers to add their own recollections. A picture of an air-raid shelter in Gwydir Street brought back memories for Colin Moule of Chesterton. [COLIN WAS A LONG-TIME CEN REPORTER AND EDITOR OF THE CAMBRIDGE WEEKLY NEWS]

He writes:

I grew up during the war years (I am now 71) and lived the whole of that time at 6, Ainsworth Street in Cambridge. My earliest memory is of sitting under the table with my sister Kathleen (she was originally an evacuee but stayed on with us and grew up with our family after her mother died in London) when a stray bomb hit Vicarage Terrace and killed a number of people early in the war. I can still hear the crump of the bomb and I was then only about five years old!

For a time we used an air raid shelter in the garden of our neighbours (Parren the milkman at No 8) and again I vividly remember scrambling with my family down their garden path in the light of the flares dropped by the German bombers as they tried to hit the railway behind our houses. I remember being quite scared. Soon afterwards my father Percy built an elaborate air raid shelter in our garden. It was an Anderson, sunk well into the soil and covered in earth on which we grew flowers and vegetables. You entered by concrete steps protected by a solid concrete blast wall.

Inside the shelter we had an oil lamp and a couple of seats as well as a bunk bed. We were well prepared! Of this shelter I recall the dank, earthy smell that you sometimes pick up in the bowels of multi-storey car parks. The table in our living room stood in as a shelter during a sudden daylight attack when a bomber came along the railway line and hit some houses beside Mill Road bridge. My grandmother was looking after us that particular afternoon and ordered my sister and I under the table.

My father was an air raid warden and used to stand during air raids just outside our passageway on one side, with Mr Parren on the other. One night we were taken by surprise when the air raid siren sounded immediately after a bomb hit the Methodist Church in nearby Sturton Street. Many windows were broken by the blast and, because he was late getting outside, my father was inside the house when the bomb struck. When he got outside, my father found a red-hot piece of shrapnel in the wall where he normally stood. My brother Robin still has that piece of shrapnel.

Of air raid shelters in general I remember we had one at the top of our street and another outside our school (St Matthew's Junior) at the top end of York Street. My classmates and I dashed into this on one occasion, complete with gas masks, during a sudden daylight raid.

There was also another shelter at the rear of houses in York Street along a dirt roadway that bordered the Co-operative Wholesale Society's slaughterhouse (later to become the Beehive Centre). I remember that a group my friends and I used to play in this one. On St Matthew's Piece at the end of Sturton Street there were a number of earth-covered shelters on which my schoolfriends and I used to play during the lunch break. I distinctly remember sliding down one of these with my friend Tony Frohock from Ditton Fields on June 6, 1944 - D-Day. He had been home to lunch and told me that a thousand ships had gone across to France!

Other shelters I recall were those on Christ's Pieces and what was known as Donkey Common at the Mill Road-Gonville Place junction. As you will now realise, shelters played a big part in our lives during the Second World War! Some still exist: at Castle Street Methodist church we still have a blue You May Shelter Here sign - housed in the underground boiler room which, we think, may have been used as a shelter.

Colin's memories have formed part of 'The Bunker Project' a Heritage Lottery-funded initiative recording the experiences of the people who lived and worked in Cambridge's hidden war spaces. Now the results of their work will be presented at a display and performance at The Junction on Clifton Road, Cambridge next Friday night, September 28 at 8pm. All are welcome, but be warned: small children may find some of the material as disturbing as the small children who lived through those turbulent times.

And if you were one of those, and have memories to share they'd love to meet you – tickets are free from the box office on Cambridge 511511 or you can contact SCAMP, 44 Church Lane, Arlesey, Bedfordshire SG156UX (Telephone 01462 734843).

There's more wartime memorabilia on show at West Wratting village hall on Sunday September 30th, from 10-00am to 6-00pm. Amongst the fascinating photographs and documents will be a display of the history of the RAF airfield at Wratting Common which was operational from 1943 to the end of the war. It will make a good venue for a Sunday excursion.

Memories 24th September 2007 - A run on the bank:, by Mike Petty

Last Monday I joined hundreds of prudent people queuing in Sidney Street in an attempt to withdraw their own money from one of the country's leading banks. Many had made long journeys to get there, taken time off work or disrupted their schedules to spend hours and hours standing in a line. One lady had queued more than once, having even got inside the bank itself before being turned away. She was due to be disappointed again as a Manager explained that the doors would be closed long before she reached them. They had every position manned – all two of them – and were processing eight people every hour!

People wondered how in this age of automated banking a simple transaction could take so long. They criticised the management, the government, the system – but there was little criticism of the bank staff on the front line who were working extra-long shifts in the face of a never-ending demand. They were probably the reason why people resignedly walked away and may possibly be the only reason they will ever want to go back once the present crisis has been sorted.

It was all very reminiscent of the run on the banks in December 1825. Then the problem had arisen after many of the small provincial banks had started issuing their own banknotes, leading to criminality and fraud.

In 1819 three parcels of notes from various of the Cambridge banks – including Mortlock, Hollick and Skrine - had been stolen from the greatcoat of James Eccles, the man employed to transport them to and from London, whilst he was refreshing himself in the bar of the Flower Pot public house in Bishopsgate Street, London. Then in 1822 there'd been a number of forgeries of Foster's banknotes in circulation and the bank had issued a reward of £100. This had proved effective, a parcel of 159 forged notes was found dumped beside the road from Saffron Walden to Audley End.

Similar things were happening throughout the country and it got so bad that in 1825 London bankers decided it was time for drastic action. They withdrew all their one and two-pound notes in circulation, substituting gold sovereigns and refused to honour other banks' paper promises.

Everywhere those with banknotes rushed to swap them for gold, which led to banking chaos. In Yorkshire the bank of Wentworth and Co suddenly stopped payment & soon a hundred other country bankers fell victim to the panic, the Peterborough bank of Simpson and White amongst them.

All of this impacted on banks who held notes the others had issued. In Cambridge Thomas Fisher, John Mortlock, Hollick and Foster stopped payment. University colleges and graduates beat a path to the bankers' doors – not to withdraw money but to offer it, tendering large sums of cash if that would help avert collapse. But this help was turned down – it had no prospect of working John Eaden was a Royston banker who saw it from the other side of the counter. On 15th December his depositors started to demand their money and soon their small stock of gold & coins ran out. His partner, Mr Barker set off for London for a supply, returning laden with £5000 and on opening the bank was beset by an immense crowd: they had to send for constables to keep the rabble from rushing in. The crowds continued on Saturday – 'but we observed they were people of the lowest class - scarcely a respectable man among them'. When Hollick & Company's Bank suspended payments it added to the general panic. There were so many people that the constables guarding the doors were hard pressed to maintain order.

Inside the bank the supply of gold sovereigns was rapidly dwindling so Barker went down for more money. He was gone two days while the queues continued. By the time he returned the crisis seemed to have peaked - most people had already taken their money out. Then came relief – it was Christmas Day.

It had proved a trying period for the Prime Minister, Lord Liverpool, and the Chancellor of the Exchequer. They urged the Bank of England to reintroduce one and two-pound notes and instructed the Mint to produce more gold sovereigns. By getting their men to work overtime and pushing their new machinery to the limit they were able to produce some 700,000 sovereigns a week. The crisis was averted and the financial world breathed again.

John Eaden penned an account of the run on his bank which concludes: "We learned a severe lesson. The painful anxiety I underwent during this Flood of Adversity, far exceeded any thing of the sort I was ever before called upon to endure. I was indebted much to the members of my Family for their sympathy, activity & energy by every one displayed and the unexampled kindness of our friends. May such a calamity never over-take me again, nor any one that belongs to me."

This may well be sentiments being expressed by Northern Rock cashiers this week!

Memories 1st October 2007, by Mike Petty

Eric Squires started singing when he was seventy. But before that he'd played a wide range of instruments from piano – he bought a baby grand that was too large for his lounge and had to demolished a wall to get it in – to guitar, keyboard and saxophone.

But then he'd plenty of time to practice, for Eric's musical career started at Cherry Hinton British Legion hall in 1936 and went on from there. Just think of a Cambridge dance band and he probably played with them – The Stirlingaires, Chick Asplin, George Freestone, Bob Kidman, the Norman Shepherd Sound, Ken Stevens and of course Reg Cottage's Orchestra, a name forever associated with the Dorothy Ballroom.

Eric played there – but also at The Rex, Cambridge Guildhall, Cambridge colleges, American bases, Royston Town Hall – where the stage sloped so much that they had to put a wedge under the piano to stop it sliding off. – and a vast number of others. Not all were equally well-equipped; one night he turned up to perform for a wedding at Waterbeach only to find that the piano was so battered that it was totally unplayable. So they phoned another band with a accordionist – he came to Waterbeach, Eric took his place at the Dot piano.

There was a camaraderie about the music scene in those days, musicians played for many different bands. All it took was a telephone call and that was enough to set up a new combination.

There was a dress code – it was a bow tie, black jacket and trousers and white shirt – sometimes worn over pyjamas when the weather was cold and with mittens for the sax players

Eric was out night after night – he never missed a gig. He travelled in a variety of motor vehicles; one broke down in Mill Road when the wheel fell off. Then there was the Ford Consul which had space for the drums in the boot but the double bass had to be strapped on top and tied to the front and back bumpers. On occasions it was so foggy that one of the group had to walk in front to show the way. But there was not much traffic about late at night then – in fact when playing at a Police Ball one CID officer told him they kept an eye on cars out in the early hours and had often logged his red Wartburg estate.

That was worrying for if there was one thing Eric knew better than dance halls in was bars. In the days before breathalysers musicians played at their best after a drink or five; the Live and Let Live in Mawson Road was one of his favourite haunts but there were very many others.

Eric drank – and played – with dozens of other musicians including Percy Seeby, Sandy Sandfield, Sid Barret, Andy ‘Tubby’ Talbot, Charlie Wynn, Jeff Grundy, Bill Smee. But he appreciated the talents of many others, visiting the Cambridge Corn Exchange in November 2002 to see ‘Status Quo’ when he was the oldest person in the room, aged 81. “Very good”, he commented, “After a quarter of an hour my ears adjusted and I could hear them fine”.

Unlike the ‘Quo’ Eric never made many records but his son, Russ, resolved to ensure that a professional-quality CD was produced, hiring the ‘Zig Zag Studios’ in Hilton for a session with Eric on keyboard, Russ on bass and John Richardson on drums. They played the music Eric loved – quicksteps, rumbas, waltzes and foxtrots but with a blues jam to warm up with.

It was enough to persuade Eric not to retire after all; despite suffering a stroke he took more bookings whilst still in hospital. He recovered to play ten tea dances – each of three hours – which took great strength and dedication. Eric played his last gig on 4th December 2003 – just one of over 10,000 in a career spanning eight decades. He was still writing music and practising on his keyboard the day before he went into hospital for the last time. The final score was left open: it was ‘I Got Rhythm’. He still had a lot of music in him. He wasn’t ready to go.

Now Russ Squires had compiled a tribute. “One lifetime’s not enough” is not just an account of his dad, it’s a record of many of the other Cambridge music men whose talents brought immense pleasure to generations..

If you ever danced the night away to the sound of a live band, or if your dad was one of those up on stage, then you must get a copy. Its on sale at Heffers or other bookshops at £11.50 (ISBN 0-9554481-0-7) or available direct from Russ Squires, PO Box 577, Cambridge CB1 0FA who still has a few of that CD ‘Long Overdue’ still available for £10.

Memories 8th October 2007, by Mike Petty

The arrival of large numbers of economic migrants into a rural community was traumatic. They brought a different culture, different values, spoke a language locals could hardly understand, took village houses and jobs and their children swamped the village school.

Its not the Cambridgeshire of today – it’s the Cambridgeshire of the 1930s.

It is hard to comprehend the extent of the misery of people’s lives during the years that followed the Great War. In autumn 1932 local farmers complained that prices were down by 25 per cent and agriculture was bankrupt. Land was going out of production as farmers could not afford to crop it yet we allowed foreign food to come in with wheat was being imported from Germany.

However farming was not the only area of hardship. There had been great disputes in the shipyards and coal mining industry with two-and-a-half million men were unemployed. Desperate men like Tim Foster got on his bike and cycled from Durham to Derbyshire in search of work. He returned home with his tyres punctured and, with no money for repair materials, had to ride the last 23 miles with the tyre stuffed with grass.

Then the Government came up with a great idea. They would set up a 'Land Settlement Association' to buy up agricultural land to create smallholdings, then offer them to the unemployed men from the north.

One of the estates to come on to the market was that of John Evison of Fen Drayton. It was sold prior to auction and in November 1935 the first ten settlers arrived from County Durham. They were based at Drayton House as they trained for new career. Others followed

Their arrival transformed the village; they spoke with strange thick northern accents and were soon housed in newly-built cottages, far superior to the dilapidated homes of some of the old villagers. They packed the local Methodist chapel, filling it with their singing; their children boosted school attendance – and filled the non-flushing lavatories.

There were benefits: extra people meant more buses, providing everybody with new transport links to St Ives, and the Land Settlement brought extra work for village folk too with local farmers being contracted for jobs such as ploughing and combine-harvesting.

But not everyone welcomed the northerners – they were a race apart, some found them 'cocky'. The children were vociferous and noisy, many had never done an honest day's school work in their lives and were clever only in dodging school work, the teacher complained. The adults visited the pub on Sundays and inevitably there was the call 'Go Home You Miners'.

Those pioneers, brought from their homes to an area so different from their own had to undertake hard, boring work outside in all weathers – all weather had been the same in the underground mines. They faced crop diseases, potato blight and fowl pest; they suffered throughout the Second World War when husbands were called up with Land Girls and Prisoners of War drafted in. They faced the challenges of a post-war world of Government rules and restrictions when the prospect of a quick profit by selling outside the Association's markets was denied them. There was the growth of more and more greenhouses, once more altering the appearance of the area, the coming of the Common Market and then in December 1982 the news that the Land Settlement Association scheme would be ended.

But by now they had become an integral part of Fen Drayton. As the outbuildings were razed, the hustle and bustle of farm and delivery vehicles and supermarket lorries disappeared and the community changed once more. In came high-density houses – in came more strangers.

The story of Fen Drayton and its Land Settlement Association has now been recorded by Pam Dearlove in a new book 'Go Home You Miners!' (ISBN 978-0-9556678-0-0 price £8.95) Its available from the Norris Museum, Fenstanton Post Office and bookshops or from Pam via her website www.gohomeyouminers.com

Memories 15 October 2007 by Mike Petty

Last week I had the pleasure of escorting a number of American teachers around part of Cambridge, which is how I found myself in Little St Mary's Lane. They admired the church and its garden, but it was the houses on the other side that caught my attention.

For while researching for my 'Looking Back' articles I had just come across an advertisement for the sale of one of these, the former Half Moon inn, in October 1957. Originally the pub stood on the corner of Trumpington Street but moved when its site was acquired for the Emmanuel Congregational Church. In its new home it became very popular with soldiers camped on Coe Fen during the Great War – indeed it seems their bad behaviour may have been one of the reasons that the licence was withdrawn in 1917! [SCAN OF LITTLE ST MARY'S LANE AND AUCTION DETAILS OF THE HALF MOON IN OCTOBER 1957]

On the way home I popped into the News where I found a letter written by Tony Chapman from Cambridge who remembers when the Half Moon was still a pub with Annie Twinn as its landlady.

Annie later moved to the Spotted Cow in Northampton Street which was owned by Hudson's Brewery of Pampisford. In 1907 it was serving about 27 gallons of beer a week together with five dozen bottles of beer or stout – not bad considering there were eight other public houses within a radius of 160 yards. The Spotted Cow was divided into two compartments with a kitchen and two bedrooms and it was here that Mr Chapman's parents lived in two rooms until the pub was pulled down. It had closed by March of 1931

Tony continues: "Annie Twinn moved into Gentle's Yard, off Northampton Street, and my father sat with her every weekend while she looked after the bikes of the village boys from Madingley, Coton and Girton who cycled in for the evening. Dad was an invalid and she would give him a shilling or two for his evening's work".

Tony has many memories of Northampton Street and Catter's Yard (the modern day Kettle's Yard) where he lived until 1932 when he moved to the (in those days) lovely estate of Darwin Drive, off Histon Road. Other readers have been in touch following recently Memories and Looking Back articles.

Margaret French from Stapleford spotted a snippet in 'Looking Back' which mentioned the Rector of Stiffkey being seen in Cambridge in September 1932. She writes: "I was very interested in this because my mother always told us of the time she met him on the station. She was with a friend when she spotted him and said 'It's the rector of Stiffkey'. He heard her, thanked her for recognising him and shook her hand. She said she was very embarrassed!"

She had every reason to be, for at that time the Rev Harold Davidson was the centre of much attention. For he'd lead a double life: as well as his congregation in Norfolk, he'd commuted to Soho where he ministered to a rather different flock of down-and-outs and prostitutes. His secret came out after he was late arriving back from Soho for the annual Remembrance Day service and the Bishop of Norwich hired a private detective agency. When he went to trial his face, his life and his family were plastered across every newspaper in the country from February to October when he finally became one of the rare priests to be unfrocked. Following his conviction Harold tried to raise money for an appeal by exhibiting himself in a barrel at Blackpool – the incident referred to in the News report. Later he joined a fair to preach from the lion's den but trod on the lion's tail, which was how he met his end. [SCAN OF CAMBRIDGE STATION IN THE 1930S, COPY OF NEWS ARTICLE FROM 16 SEPT 1932]

Harold Davidson, the Rector of Stiffkey in Norfolk was perhaps better known as the Prostitutes' Padre. He was thrown out of the Church for immoral behaviour in the 1930s. For he lead a double life: as well as his congregation in Stiffkey, he commuted to Soho where he ministered to a rather different flock- down-and-outs and prostitutes, who he had helped for years.

His secret came out after he was late arriving back from Soho for the annual Remembrance Day service. The Bishop of Norwich hired a private detective agency and when the matter went to trial he was convicted of immoral behaviour. Following his banishment from the Church Harold tried to raise money for an appeal by exhibiting himself in a barrel at Blackpool. Then he joined a fair to preach from the lion's den but trod on the lion's tail, which was how he met his end.

here were few people living in England in 1932 who did not know the name of the Rector of Stiffkey. His name, his face, his life and his family were plastered across every newspaper in the country from February, when his impending trial was announced, to October when he finally became one of the rare priests to be unfrocked. People followed him wherever he went. They descended on his parishes by train, car, coach, bicycle – any means of transport they could find to see him in person, to shake his hand or to hear him speak. They continued to follow him till his death.

It was the media trial to end all media trials as the prosecution peeled his life to pieces in their attempt to accuse him of Immorality. It was the last Consistory court trial to be held in England under the old Immorality Laws of the Church. The Laws were repealed in the wake of it.

The press had a field day. The Chancellor of the diocese of Norwich who was to sit in judgement on the case, allowed the prosecution's request to have the trial transferred to London with reporting restrictions lifted. They could report whatever they wished. The actual proceedings were printed in every newspaper and avidly read by those who couldn't attend.

Counsels sparred against each other day after day, over the way the trial was being conducted. The controversy between them was such that they refused to sit in the restaurant at the same time during meal breaks and they glared at each other in the corridors. Each side became fiercely determined to win.

People queued from early morning to get a seat in the public gallery to watch the action. Crowds lined the streets 4 deep around Church House and later the Law Courts. Nothing like it had been seen before. It ignited public opinion right across the divides.

As the trial progressed enormous public sympathy began to extend to this tiny 57-year-old cleric who was so valiantly defending what he believed in. People pressed money into his hands for his defence if they saw him walking in the street; taxis gave him rides in London without charge. He was described in the press as having “the look of an intellectual and the gait of a man of the world.” He came out of it to a world largely convinced of his innocence but with a guilty tag tied to his name.

For the remainder of his life he continued to fight for the repeal of the laws under which he had been tried and for the reform of Consistory courts bringing them in line with courts of law; to ensure what had been done to him could never happen again and so that in future an accused priest had the right to due process.

He died 5 years later after being mauled by a lion. He was buried in Stiffkey at the request of the villagers who called him the only real priest they ever knew. They’ve cared for his grave ever since.

Over the last 70 years, books and documentaries have attempted to relate the story of this extraordinary enigmatic clergyman. Now for the first time his family have come forward to write the real story of his life and to bring out the truth behind the sensation.

Memories 22nd October 2007, by Mike Petty

Last week Cambridgeshire police visited more than 60 garages across the county to establish a new Forecourt Watch group. It was intended to crack down on motorists who fill up with petrol and then drive off – a crime known as “bilking”.

By one of those curious coincidences I recently carried just such a story in my Looking Back column – it came from 75 years ago. On rechecking the cutting I see that even then it was known as ‘bilking’

The Oxford English Dictionary gives various definitions for the word; one is “To ‘do a person out’ of his due; to cheat, defraud; to evade payment of a debt” with an example recorded from 1672. Another is “To elude, evade, escape from, ‘give the slip’ to” which also dates back to the 1600’s

That being so the victim back in 1932 was ‘bilked’ twice.

This is the story as it was reported in the Cambridge Independent Press on 21st October 1932:

‘A Cambridgeshire garage man’s amazing ride on the running board of a stolen car, whose occupants had tried to bilk him of the price of a quantity of petrol, has just come to light. The garage man was Mr Butler, who owns a filling station on the main Cambridge-Ely road, near the outskirts of the village of Milton

To a ‘Press and News’ representative he stated: “Two men drove up to my filling station in a large Talbot saloon car. They were both quite well dressed, and one of them asked me to put ten gallons of petrol in the tank. Just as I was screwing on the cap after filling up, I noticed the car begin to move. I jumped on the running board as they drove out into the road. They said they had not finished, and drove into the draw-up again.

“Instead of paying me, however, one of them used abusive language, and the car drove off at a high speed out of the garage and down the road towards Ely. I managed to get my head in the window and cling on. To try and throw me off they drove on to the grass verge and tried to knock me off against the telegraph poles. I tried to get hold of the wheel, but there was a man between me and the driver, and he got in the way

“They drove off the grass verge again and went on very fast through the village, and kept telling me to get off. I said I could not at the speed they were doing. They slowed down a little and I prepared to jump. Just as I had got one foot off the running board the man nearest me gave me a push. I went over and over in the road, and was picked up by a lorry driver. Completely dazed. When I came to the car had vanished”.

The car was later seen at Clayhithe where two men inquired the way to the Newmarket Road. It was later traced as one stolen in the London area.

Steve Wilkinson from Histon writes: “The article about ice-skating on Parker’s Piece (Memories 17th September) brought back long term memories for me! Way back in late ‘40’s, I was a Choirboy at St. Andrew’s Church, Old Chesterton, and I remember ice-skating on ‘The Willows’ at the end of Cam Road. The land belonged to Herbert Charles Banham who was a well-known boat builder. I seem to remember a model railway going round it as well but each winter a great part of the garden was allowed to flood and if deemed safe, ice-skating was allowed. Coloured fairy lights were placed around the garden and music was played on a gramophone and relayed via a tannoy system. I seem to remember when Mr Banham died, flooding, hence ice skating, ceased and the land and bungalow were subsequently sold for development. I also remember ice skating on the Sewage Farm along Milton Road when the powers that be turned the proverbial blind eye.” [SCAN OF CAM ROAD – NOW ELIZABETH WAY – WHERE BANHAM HAD HIS HOME]

The sewage farm at Milton was a popular venue in the winter of 1925-1926 when the News reported that skating was continued with safety and there were quite a number of people, chiefly Varsitymen, making gay while the ice held. The council tried to crack down with notices of ‘keep off the ice’, barbed wire entanglements, and a policeman on skates taking the names of trespassers. Despite this there were hundreds taking the risk of being prosecuted rather than miss the opportunity of such splendid sport. As the freeze continued there were some 500 people on the ice on a January Sunday in 1926. I also have a note that the skating championship of the fens was held at the Cambridge Sewage Farm in February 1954. Does anybody remember or have snaps they took at the time?

Memories 29th October 2007 by Mike Petty

MARGARET SHEPHARD from Longstanton has responded to my plea for memories of the Land Settlement at Great Abington

She writes: "It was in spring 1949 that we came to the Great Abington Land Settlement Estate, looking for a new life.

"We had a young family, were optimistic, not afraid of hard work, probably foolish and with very little money But we wanted to be independent and to farm. The Land Settlement offered us a start.

"Our holding was comprised of 22 acres of land, a two-bedroomed house, a 60-foot greenhouse, a poultry house and a general purpose building for storage and livestock. We were delighted with our kingdom. There was a living room, a tiny dining room, a kitchen, where the bath was, and a separate loo halfway up the stairs. The bath had a wooden cover which made a very useful worktop, when not in use.

"There were 60 holdings on the estate and apart from the central management area there was a propagation centre, a machinery pool with staff to work the land and experts to advise on horticulture and livestock management. The office marketed the produce and bought all livestock, and all plants were bought from 'The Prop'.

"We were there for seven years, growing lettuce, tomatoes and cucumbers under glass, together with mushrooms and outdoor crops, including asparagus with a few acres of cereal or sugar beet at the bottom of the holding. The salad crops were cut or picked three times a week, packed into trays or boxes and collected from the side of the road. They were taken to 'The Office' where they were graded and despatched to the markets - usually Covent Garden. Eggs were similarly dealt with once a week - we had a flock of 100 laying birds which ranged freely together with three or four sows whose progeny were reared to bacon weight and Gwennie the goat.

"It was hard work, with not many days off in the year. We were often on the job by six in the morning or earlier to have the produce ready for collection. Tenants could grow what they wished, but mostly we grew what paid the best! We paid a monthly rent with a day of settlement at the end of each month, and if sometimes the monthly cash flow was not all it might have been, then the management was understanding. It was a good time we spent there, a happy time where we made good friends. When we came there were still some of the original Durham mining families working holdings but mostly the tenants were incomers such as ourselves, all keen for a life in agriculture and eternally grateful to the Land Settlement Association for a foot on the first rung of the farming ladder."

Don Unwin from Histon has shared with me his memories of skating at Banham's meadow "As a young boy I was taken by my Dad and taught how to skate on both that flooded meadow and the sewage farm at Milton in the late 1920s. Dad was a typical fen skater, he used to skate around the sewage farm at a frightening speed, wearing long Norwegian runners. I used Mum's normal skates, she used to go skating with him before I was born. The meadow Mr Banham used to flood was between his bungalow and the river.

"The model railway was not on that meadow but on a piece of rough ground on the other side of Cutter Ferry Path near Banham's boat yard.

"H C Banham was President of the Cambridge Model Engineering Society, and he and his wife were great friends and benefactors of the society He let us have the use of the land free and allowed us to use a load of old concrete air raid shelters as beams for the track. We started work there about 1950. I did the surveying and the layout of the large oval track with 21/2 inch and 31/2 inch gauge rails."

Don has sent me a photo taken in 1955 of a happy train load of children behind a loco built by the driver. He was Bert Jeavons, H C B's engineering workshop foreman.

The Model Engineers moved to a new track in Fulbrooke Road in 1959, where they still have public running days with trains giving rides.

Memories 5th November 2007, by Mike Petty

Reminiscing in the News is nothing new. Those olden days, we are led to believe, were more peaceful with none of the mugging or gun-crime we worry about now – but not according to John Bailey who in November 1932 recalled the Fen Ditton area as he'd known it in the 1880s. It was not a pleasant place:

"I knew Fen Ditton when there was no railway and no bridges. I see the constant stream of horses and carriages through the village street to the Paddock at Ditton Corner during 'May Week'. This was the village lads' harvest and sometimes we picked up a pound each during that week. In those days Tom Tuddenham kept The Plough, Jack Turner the King's Head, and Joe Sargent the Blue Boar, three excellent landlords.

I wonder how many can recall our school days when Miss Fothergate was the mistress and Miss Green and Miss Peachey were the teachers. We had to take twopence every Monday to pay for our schooling. Then there came a day when my mother told me that there would not be any more money to pay for school. I went to school that morning fearing I should be sent back home to fetch the usual fee – I was not old enough to understand anything about the law – and I was surprised when the mistress did not ask for it, nor did she get her book to put it down. That fact remains very vivid in my memory.

Where are those boyish pals of mine who went to the school with me? There were Few, Hayhow, Gunting, Pamphlin, Harry Newman and many others. We were just mischievous boys, up to any boyish prank, often to our own discomfort.

I think Newman was the leader in the really harmless tricks we used to play, but Pamphlin was the force that held us together, for he was the master of the school and held his own more than once when it came to a 'set-to' with another scholar. We used to settle our little differences in the spinney in the evening down Long Lane, where the railway bridge now stands. They were quite harmless little scraps, and George Pamphlin always remained the cock-of-the-walk. But George was a king-hearted lad. I am sure he would give his last copper to a beggar on the road. He was the best fighter among us, and he knew it, but he never sought trouble: it had to be forced upon him before he threw his jacket on the ground and rolled up his shirtsleeves, I believe he joined the army. Harry Newman was more of a thinker. Mr Frederick Bailey had him bound apprentice to a carpenter in Cambridge and he became an excellent craftsman and a power in his native village. He was a strong churchman and remained in the choir until he died. I understand a brass plate has been placed above the seat he occupied for so many years. Hayhow is, I believe, engaged in one of the colleges at the present time.

The old Ditton Lane was very lonely in those days. There was not a house in it and at one time a deep pit existed from which coprolites had been dug, that was partly filled with water. That was a real danger. Halfway down the lane was a grass lane leading to the holts, called Cut-throat Lane, and many people had a holy fear of it after dark because of the tales that were told concerning its history. Its reputation was made worse by the schoolmistress, Miss Fothergale, being struck from behind with some hard object, which rendered her unconscious, by some unknown person, who robbed her and left her. Fred Plumb found and assisted her home. That lane is now incorporated in the field.

For seven years and nine months I walked along that lane, night and morning, after the above event until November 1887 but I went armed. Once I was stopped at the same spot. I stepped into the road and at the same time I fired a shot into the air. This had the desired effect. I called after a retreating figure, "I've got five more barrels and, by gosh, I'll use them if you come any of your Fothergale tricks with me". I spoke to no-one of this. I waited. Afterwards the village policeman one day said to me, "Do you ever see anyone hanging about the lane at night". I asked him why? He surprised me by saying "I thought you did, as you carry firearms". I asked him to tell me who told him, and he did. I told him only one person knew I carried a pistol and that was the man who stopped me in the lane a few weeks ago.

In those days there were no houses after the Globe Inn on the Newmarket Road until you came to the toll-house at the corner of Ditton Long Lane, with the exception of Elfleda House. This was Ditton as I knew it.

Memories 12th November 2007, by Mike Petty

Once more the centre of Cambridge is undergoing transformation with the opening of the new John Lewis store with a postal address of 10 Downing Street. But who remembers another business that used to operate from that part of the street.

For about 150 years it was the home of Runcimans veterinary surgeons. Just before they left in the mid 1970s the News sent its reporter Deryck Harvey to interview the principal, James Runciman.

He could trace the firm's history back 150 years. His grandfather had started a practice at Ely and five of his sons qualified as veterinary surgeons. It could be a dangerous job: in April 1905 James's father met with a serious accident while driving his trap along the Mildenhall Road towards Littleport. His horse shied on meeting a motor and plunged headfirst into a deep ditch, breaking its neck. Mr Runciman had been thrown after it and the trap overturned on top of him. He managed to extricate himself and was taken to the house of Mr Glover, a farmer, where he was treated with the greatest kindness.

He survived and three years later moved to Downing Street to provide cover for an eminent veterinary surgeon named Banham who wanted a few days break. He never left. The Cambridge surgery was based in the stables of the old Bird Bolt Hotel, an ancient hostelry that had made way for a handsome new headquarters for the Norwich Union Insurance Company with its ornamental white stone façade that opened in 1906.

Banham had remodelled the inn yard with a long room in which he used to give lectures in elementary veterinary science to undergraduates who were taking agricultural courses. There was a forge with three fires and six men with stabling for 20 horses together with a set of horse stocks – the blacksmith used to put awkward animals into them for shoeing. The stables opened out onto the pavement in Downing Street. When the horses had their heads out over the bottom halves of the doors people had to step out into the street to get past.

At the turn of the century horse were an important part of the Cambridge scene. There were various livery stables around the town: 100 horses were stabled in Hopkin's Yard, Trumpington Street. Captain Cooper had 50 in King Street, the Lion Yard had room for another 70.

It made work for various veterinary surgeons including Harry Hills who had premises in the University Arms Hotel yard and Dr Waterhouse in Silver Street. About 1910 they amalgamated with the Downing Street practice.

The head groom at the beginning of the century was Jack Midgeley who lived in King Street. He was quite a short tubby, thick-set man with bow legs and a forthright manner. Everyone called him John Bull, James recalled. "He would not let anything go out of the yard if it wasn't turned out properly. The horse had to have his mane and tail combed and water-brushed and his hooves oiled. If I was going out riding he would inspect me too, probably taking a rubber out of his pocket to dust my boots. If you weren't turned out in proper order, you wouldn't go out of the yard, never mind whether you were the boss or not"

James recalled that in his younger days there was so much work that the vets would walk to their work – it wasn't worth putting a horse to a gig or getting a car out. But times had changed: "As I first remember it, if anybody had a sick dog or cat, as a general rule they would have it destroyed and start with a fresh one".

The surgery ceased when the old Norwich Union building was redeveloped. Its replacement at 10 Downing Street was topped out in September 1975. Now another firm trades from that address.

But do you remember when it was Runcimans?

Memories 19th November 2007, by Mike Petty

Studying local history is one of the best ways for a relative newcomer to feel part of the community and Bridget Smith has taken a special interest in the village of Hemingford Grey. She soon found there was a lot to learn.

Soon after coming to the area in the 1970s she was walking across the meadow to St Ives after the hay had been cut and spotted what some ancient ditches, dating perhaps from prehistoric times, she thought. She mentioned this to one of her older neighbours who quickly put her right! They were not ancient at all, in fact, as a boy, he had been part of the group who, at the beginning of the second world war, had been given the task of digging a network of ditches across the meadow to prevent enemy planes from landing!

Going back earlier than living memory Bridget was fascinated to contrast the rather solemn language of the Parish Council minutes with the more racy newspaper reports - such as when the leading Non-conformist Liberal councillor clashed with his opposite number from the Church of England Conservative side over whether to commemorate Queen Victoria's Jubilee by building a Reading Room or erecting a lych gate to the new cemetery. The Reading Room won but 20 years later the cemetery got its pretty gate too.

Old photographs were invaluable, she found, although people rarely snapped the mundane things that she now wanted to see. For example the Hemingford local history society has been searching, so far in vain, for a picture of the village pond that was filled in in the 1950s. But stories about it abound. One tells how a rather pompous village lady dropped off to sleep as she drove back from St Ives in her horse and trap only to wake up marooned in the pond, taken there by her independently minded horse.

The Hemingford regatta is the oldest village regatta in the country, and is still going strong. Bridget has lent me a photo taken in 1955 which shows the crews racing towards Hemingford Grey Church in the final of the Vicar's Sculls trophy event where bells and fireworks from the tower proclaim the winner.

Her photo shows the boathouse (built about 1906) which had a purpose-built artist's studio upstairs. It was demolished in the mid 1970s. If you have any memories of this she would be very interested to hear them as her latest project is researching the artist colony that lived and worked in the villages of Houghton, Hemingfords, St Ives and Holywell between 1880-1930.

Bridget's giving a talk in St Ives Library on 27th Nov at 7.30 p.m. and would be delighted to see you there. A few days later, on Saturday December 1st the Hemingfords' Local History Society will be hosting a drop-in day, entitled 'Writers of the Hemingfords', at The Reading Room, High Street, Hemingford Grey from 10.00am to 3.00pm. Members who have published books on local history will be present, there will be displays of photographs and books for sale – but most of all they'd love to hear your reminiscences or see your snaps.
